The German prisoners are, however, working around here and are paid, I think, 20 centimes a day—we have five working for us, clearing up rubbish, etc., and helping Pierce, an English member of the Mission, who is a mason and is now repairing the school-house, which has been about half destroyed.

At present there are very few inhabitants here, I believe about eighty out of a normal 300. We are getting acclimated now and used to the sights of the war zone, so that we do not gasp whenever we see a shattered house, but the awful waste and destruction in houses and farm-land alone are appalling, I say, farmland, for it is cut up into trenches and shell-holes right and left and it will be long before it is restored to its proper fertility.

There are gun emplacements and bomb-proof shelters scattered everywhere—the labor and size of them are tremendous and how a farmer can plough over a concrete gun emplacement for a battery of six guns while he is all the while running the risk of his horses and plough disappearing into the bomb-proof is a very serious question for him.

J. H. H.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

The following letter is from one of the men who are repairing the houses of the village of Gruny, France. This village was not completely demolished and more efficient service can be rendered in repairing damaged buildings than in erecting maisons-démontables. It is south of Ham, which is the centre of our Reconstruction Work, in the region of the Somme, southeast of St. Quentin. This section is behind the recent British drive toward Cambrai.

MAISON DE LA VIGNE VERTE, GRUNY, SOMME, FRANCE,
Tenth Month 21, 1917.

In some ways this is a sort of glorified college life mixed up with the Stone House and Cherry Brook. There are no lessons to worry your evenings—to be sure one should study French, but most every night you're too sleepy to do anything at all.

Our fire-place here at the Green Vine is the most popular centre. Seven of us have this little two-room house at the end of the village—Maison François cannot hold us all; but we do not mind having to go there (it takes three or four minutes) for our meals, as it is so much more fun up here than tucked away in the little rooms down there. Then, too, we had the fun of cleaning out this place and arranging things for ourselves. The Germans had lived here and we found it just as they had left it.

Strangely enough, there is a fair roof—probably the best in the village—and there are no holes picked in the walls for the dynamite—most of the houses that were not destroyed have these little holes; we believe the scheme for the utter destruction, evidently planned, may have been frustrated by an unexpectedly hurried retreat, or perhaps the lack of explosives, for some of the houses were merely pulled down by teams of horses. The bricks are held together by their own weight largely, as the mortar is like clay and a good pull on a couple of important uprights could easily wreck any one of these cottages and barns.

The main street (Grande rue) is lined on either side by continuous high brick walls—the barns bordering each side are usually joined by the 12-foot walls that are deemed necessary. One enters a house usually by a high arched gateway through the barn, then across the barn-yard, which is a court entirely surrounded by buildings—the house being at the back, with the horses close to the kitchen—often under the same roof. Each house is a frame house, yet, all huddled up together within the high walls they seem little worlds unto themselves.

The oddest thing is the way these little worlds are jammed up so closely together. The limits of the village are very sharp. Every house is of brick—one-story and attic or granary—with roofs of slate or tile. The roofs are a joy—they all have different slopes and angles and the lichens make them sink easily into the surroundings. Maison François, our headquarters, is the one house that is at all noticeably different from all the rest. François was the busiest man of the place. His gate posts are higher (twelve feet), really quite fine, with stone tops and vines climbing over them. There is a front yard before the house and the barns are at one side, shut off by more high walls. The garden back of the house must have been beautiful, but here again high brick walls used to shut off the view of the open country just beyond. But now we can see out—the whole back wall has been pulled down, and on one side is a row of six or eight farm-wagons with wheels all chopped to pieces.

Our main work has been with roof repairing. We secure the tiles and slate from houses that have been completely destroyed—if the roof beams are on the ground we are at liberty to use that material. Two houses came down, leaving the slate roof in rather perfect condition, variously draped over the heaps of bricks that once were walls. I have removed several thousands of slates. Just to-day, I did my first work with tiles. Russell and Hadley had put up new rafters and cross-pieces to hold the tiles and three of us hung all one side of a roof in one-and-a-half hours.

To-day we have a cook! So far the fellows have been given three days of cooking right down the list, and we've had some very fine meals. One man gets breakfast—he has an assistant who carries water—that's a job! Some sixteen pails per day and the well is several minutes off and very deep. Till to-day, a second man has prepared lunch and dinner. We have great hopes that the cook will be a success, as most of the women about are afraid to undertake such a job. Davies—one of the Englishmen—has charge of the food and menus, and we have orange marmalade every morning in large quantities!

It is splendid to see things getting done; jobs being finished, and finished in such a way that they are neither blots in the landscape nor obviously repairs. I am thinking especially of one slate roof that was in a most helplessly moth-eaten condition—now it looks as though nothing had ever happened—even lichens are growing on the slates. It will be that way with much of our work; although it will not be as easy to show off or to point out what we have done—it is far more satisfying to think of healing without leaving conspicuous scars.

The school-house is one of the biggest jobs, and the first one to be undertaken. It was very badly damaged and is requiring a lot of brick work. Pearce, an Englishman, is a professional mason; he has been working hard at this, and fine progress has been made; yet you do not notice the new work at all without careful examination of the color of the mortar. They had a little ceremony of a cornerstone when the work was first begun. The idea was originated as a sort of a joke but it developed into something quite serious. The neighborhood was invited and the Mayor read a document composed for the occasion, explaining the work of the Friends, and proposing to place a tablet in the spot later on. A cent, an English penny, and a French sou were put in the wall, along with a copy of the Mayor's speech, signed by all witnesses. Another signed copy of this paper is held by the Mayor.

Grundy is going to be an active centre indeed; for besides our work, there has moved in a section of the agricultural équipe at Golancourt—"Burny" Walton (English), Calvert Kellenn, Lewis, Marshall, Macy, Downing. They are quite separate from us. They have their own dugout and a room in a half-gone house; they get their own meals. Their four horses are kept in our stable. It's fine to see them about their fall plowing, and to know that many of the neglected acres about here will again yield. Gardens must have been the special joy of these people, for even now in gardens neglected for years there bloom wonderful roses and other flowers. And behind most houses—now well-nigh covered by ranker growths—you find charming little box-wood hedges. On the tables in the dining-room now are nasturtiums, in an odd coffee vessel, a beautiful bunch of roses, deep red buds, pink ones and some little clustered buds, a low brown jardienerie filled with calendulas and a yellow daisy-like flower, maid-in-the-mist, doll's-eyes and deep purple asters and another bunch of maroon-colored asters with pale blue ones, a semi-wild type.

CARLETON MACDOWELL.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

WOODPECKERS have made havoc of many a line of telegraph poles by eating the heart out of the wood. There are human woodpeckers who interfere with the world's work in much the same way. By their pessimism and discouragement, they steal away the strength and eat out the heart of those who are bearing the burden.—From Forward.

THE "ONE-HOSS SHAY."—Automobilists often see cars drawn up by the side of the road, out of the way, and deserted by their former passengers. A quick glance suffices to show a broken wheel, a smashed radiator, bent mud guards, or some other evidence of a collision. It is a melancholy sight.

How different was the end of the deacon's "One-Hoss Shay," of which Holmes wrote! All parts were equally strong, so it lasted a hundred years and then fell to dust all at once, when the earth shook with the Lisbon earthquake.

That is the way we should live out our useful and vigorous days, and not be pulled to one side of the road, untimely wrecks of intemperance or passion or carelessness, smashed up, rather than honorably worn out.—From Forward.

A DEVOTED FATHER.—One so often reads about devoted mothers that for a change it is pleasant to hear about a father's love. Not far from my home is a trio of handsome canaries, fine, plump specimens of birdhood, with the sauciest black eyes and the sweetest warblings imaginable. When they were little unfeathered things only three days old a terrible calamity happened—their proud little mother found the door of the cage open, and wandered to unknown parts, though suspicion rested on the family cat. Thus deprived of the one who had done everything for the wee birdlings, the question of the owner was, "How shall I ever raise them?"

The birds' father, upon whose shoulders no great responsibility had hitherto rested, seemed to know what had happened and was equal to the emergency. More devotion he could not have shown. He fed his tiny offspring from his hospitable beak until the crisis was past and the young birds able to look after themselves. Then he started a singing-school and proved an excellent master, if the writer is any judge of music.

"I have raised many birds," narrated the owner, "but none have equalled the three canaries that were brought up almost entirely by their father."—EDITH M. RUSSELL, in Our Dumb Animals.

A MULE OF PERU.—This marvelous feat was related to a lady traveling in Peru via trail and mule-train, by the priest who claimed to have owned the daring and resourceful animal he told about. In Peru many of the trails are mere ledges cut out of the solid rock, the precipice falling away for hundreds of feet to the river below on one side and rising equally steep and straight on the other side.

This priest was journeying on his mule over just such a trail, when suddenly to his horror on rounding a bend, he saw that an avalanche had swept nearly twenty feet of the trail completely away. The trail was narrow; he could not turn and he dared not dismount. Far below roared the river, above reared hundreds of feet of sheer rock. Giving up for lost, he took out his beads and began to say his prayers before going to meet his Creator.

The mule in the meantime had been viewing the situation intently. The priest felt him move, then the animal reared straight up on his hind legs. His master thought he was about to plunger over the edge and clung to the saddle thinking the end was near—but no, slowly the mule turned on his hind legs, turned until he was facing back down the trail. Then he came down upon all four feet again and commenced the return journey.

It was a wonderful display of intelligence and courage and one that is scarcely credible, but the priest vouched for its truth while others admitted that the trail had been swept away and that the mule had in some way brought his master safely back. Later, to the priest's great sorrow, the valuable animal was stolen and he never saw him again.—W. G. RUSHWORTH, in Our Dumb Animals.

GET STILL.

Get still. Many a time in each life questions of importance arise to be settled; decision is to be made, and as the anxious heart considers the reasons on both sides, the many things to be said for and against, and the result occurring after either step is taken; all peace goes, and a restless, troubled longing to know God's will takes the place of peace.

We have all experienced this restlessness of spirit, and have found the more we thought over and considered the question to be decided, the more impossible it was to reach any conclusion. The time passes, and as the moment for action comes, the troubled one does the wrong thing, oftentimes, and more time is lost in wondering why God did not guide us, when we asked Him to.

Get still, and you will understand it all. "My people shall dwell in quiet resting places," saith the Lord, and it is in quietness that God's voice can be heard and His will concerning us be made plain.

Stop thinking over the question to be decided, and fix your eyes on Him who has promised to be your wisdom; and trust Him to make your way plain when the time comes. Do not spend your life in planning, and only asking God to guide your plans, but live the life of a little child. Let God do the planning, and your part be simple obedience to His will.

It is our anxiety to know His will, and our impatience to know it at once, that interrupts our communion with Him. As He went before the children of Israel, to search them out a resting place, and when He had found a spot suited to their use, walked with them, and spread His sheltering wing over them to protect them from every foe, so He will supply our every need.

"He found him in a desert land, and in a waste, howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings; so the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him." (Deut. xxxii: 10-12).

Again I say, think on Him, His love for you, His promise of guidance; and in the quiet hush that will come over your heart you will hear His voice saying: "This is the way, walk ye in it."—Advocate and Guardian.

BEBOLD HIM NOW WHERE HE COMES,

Not the Christ of our subtle creeds,

But the Lord of our hearts, of our homes,

Of our hopes, our prayers, our needs.

—RICHARD WATSON GILBERT.

REPORT OF THE FRIENDS' REST CENTRE, FOURTH AND ARCH STREETS.

In the Sixth Month of this year the Friends generously responded to a request from the Playgrounds' Association of Philadelphia for funds to operate and carry on the work of the Rest Centre, in Fourth and Arch Streets Grounds.

The following expenses of operating the Rest Centre (opened from Sixth Month 14th to Tenth Month 31st) were defrayed.

RECEIPTS	$340.00
Salaries of Superintendent and Caretaker	$281.51
Playground Material and Incidentals	36.30
Sign Cleaned and Repainted	2.00
	319.81

On Deposit $ 20.19

It is with great pleasure we are enabled to submit a report of a very successful season.

ATTENDANCE.

Children (ten years of age and under)	5,018
Adults (Girls employed in factories excluded)	1,023
Total	6,041

We believe it will be of great interest to the Committee of Six and the Society of Friends to learn that one of the most important phases of the Rest Centre movement has been undertaken this season.

During Ninth and Tenth Months, Anne Longaker, Superintendent of the Rest Centre, devoted a few hours each day to Social Work, visiting the homes of the children and becoming acquainted with the mothers and especially their environment in an effort to be of assistance morally and materially. While it has been possible for us to furnish clothing (which has been donated) for a few families, at the present time the children are especially in need of assistance. A special invitation has been extended to the mothers to visit the Centre and if this is impossible to kindly send the children.

The progress in manual work continues to advance as demonstrated by the display of hand work, sewing of aprons, raffia, knitting, &c., at the exhibition Eighth Month 27th.

Due to the acceptance of a position in the Social Service Department of the Episcopal Hospital the resignation of Anne Longaker was received Tenth Month 31st, and it was thought advisable to close the Centre on this date.

The Officers and the Directors of the Playgrounds' Association extend their hearty appreciation for the privilege granted to operate this Centre, for the special interest displayed by the Friends in visiting and encouraging the children and their teacher, also for their financial assistance, which has made it possible to conduct this work.

Respectfully submitted,

KATHERINE B. BROWN,

Chairman of Rest Centre Committee.

ELEVENTH MONTH 14, 1917.

MEETING AT "THE SCRUBS".

(AN ENGLISH PRISON.)

It is the largest meeting in the county, I am told, yet it is the most difficult to get into (and, so it is said, the most difficult to get out of). It is the shortest, I believe, and when it closes, scarcely one of us feels that the time has really come for "shaking hands."

Our "presiding elder"—the prison officer-in-charge, who decides when our worship begins and when it ends, is not in deep sympathy—and regulates our gathering like a clock, exactly thirty minutes, and no longer. He is much perturbed by the fact that Friends in the body of the meeting take vocal part, but I think he is accustomed to such events by now.

Though we form a large gathering numerically (as many as 220 have come together at a time), we, more than 80 per cent.

of us, are not members, but attenders only. We have returned to eighteenth century Quakerism in our strict simplicity in dress, gallery Friends being the only exception to this rule.

Our meeting is not even an allowed meeting, and we send no representatives to Monthly Meeting—much as we should like to do so. Though we are a living meeting, we are obliged to wait until some visiting minister faces us before our presiding elder considers us ready for our brief period of worship.

It is impossible to picture one-tenth of the power that is generated in this half-hour of Fellowship. One attender says, as he leaves the gathering, "I could go now to face the rack, if need be, for the Truth," and another tells of the Vision-Beautiful who has come to him in the quiet of his cell after the meeting—a vision which has scattered doubt and fear—and has made him stronger than ever in the Faith which is in Christ Jesus.

And what can I say of the prayers! They are indeed wonderful utterances, uplifting, humanizing, brimming over with faith and courage, and brotherly kindness, while the ministry is clear and definite in purpose and plain in teaching.

It is inevitable that there should be something of a stir in the congregation when a visiting minister rises. The visitor comes in from outside. He is in touch with passing events, and he is, above all, a change from the ordinary. Nevertheless, his part in the meeting is usually brief. He and his companion may have the burden of the meeting upon them, but there is generally barely more than ten minutes for them both to get their messages delivered.

For this purpose it is well that those who come to this meeting should be fitted with the ministry of fellowship and not be prodigal of words.

But the problem that is heavy upon me is not the conduct of Wormwood Scrubs meeting, but the conduct of the meetings which so many of our 220 young men will attend when they are liberated. They have learned that a Friends' meeting means unity, sympathy, liberty and love.

Let them not be disappointed when their time of imprisonment is over and they come to see what a real Quaker meeting is like.

AN ATTENDER.

Reprinted from The Australian Friend.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL.

A NEW EDUCATIONAL VENTURE AMONG FRIENDS.

ELBERT RUSSELL.

The present year is marked by the beginning of two new educational ventures among Friends—the Thomas Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford and Woolman School, under its new management. The fields of these two schools are quite distinct. The former is a school for college graduates exclusively, while the latter admits all who are qualified to profit by its courses. The emphasis of the former is upon scholarship, the latter puts the stress on training for religious and social work. It aims to foster the religious life of the students through the influence of the school life, and to increase their practical knowledge of Friends' ways and needs through acquaintance with meetings in the neighborhood of Philadelphia. There is the most cordial co-operation between the management of the two new schools. Members of the faculty and Board of Managers of Haverford are on the teaching staff and Board of Managers of Woolman School. On the other hand, Woolman School has already begun to be a feeder of the Brown Graduate School. One of its first students under the new régime was a college graduate, whose growing interest in religious studies led her to become one of the first students of the Brown Graduate School.

Woolman School was started in 1915 by Friends who were impressed with the need of trained workers. They wished a name that would not seem to limit its usefulness to any section of the Society and named it after John Woolman, one of the worthiest representatives of undivided Quakerism. Last spring the management was re-organized and made quite representative.

Elbert and Liewetta Russell, members of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, who have devoted themselves for many years to the cause of religious education among Friends, were secured as Director and Hostess of the new School.

The permanent location of the School has not yet been decided, but it seems almost certain that it will remain in the vicinity of Philadelphia. For the present it is glad to avail itself of the generous offer of the owner of the present very suitable site, in Swarthmore, who allows it the use of the valuable property for the taxes.

The purposes of Woolman School are, to promote religious and social education in the Society of Friends, that the rank and file of the membership may have a more intelligent grasp of religious and social problems; to train Friends for religious and social work, so that those who have received special gifts or who have been called to special service may be able to do their work more efficiently; and to provide a centre for the promotion of Friendly interests and activities, somewhat as Woodbrooke Settlement has been in England. The managers and instructors believe in the mission and message of Friends for this present age, and they feel that the Society cannot adequately fulfil its mission in this present crisis except by the co-operation of all its branches. While the School is interested in the Society as a whole, and wishes to serve it as largely as possible, its location as well as its policy make its greatest field among the non-pastoral Friends in the East.

At the suggestion of members of the Friends' Service Committee, Woolman School offered courses in conversational French and in Social Service this term for the benefit of students wishing to prepare for reconstruction work abroad. The School opened with twelve students in attendance. One of these has since been sent on to France and another was called to fill a vacancy in the principalship of a Friends' school. Four of those remaining are taking the French with a view to reconstruction work.

The first generation of Friends included many educated men, such as Barclay, Penn, Ellwood, Stubbs, whose Biblical and religious knowledge greatly aided the "publishers of Truth." The next generations failed to keep up the succession of trained men. This was one important cause of the decline of the Society in the eighteenth century, when it had no schools of higher learning and little or no Biblical and religious instruction. Friends have occasionally regarded education and spirituality as though they were mutually exclusive, but Woolman School is founded in the conviction that a more thorough education in religious matters must be a vital part of our equipment for doing the great work laid upon young Friends both during and after the present world crisis.

AGRICULTURAL MISSIONARIES.

[This title in the Boston Transcript attracted our attention. We feel sure our readers will be glad to have the view of India contained in the article.—Eds.]

Sam Higginbottom, the young missionary superintendent of agriculture at Ewing Christian College at Naini, near Allahabad, who is trying to solve the problem of feeding and clothing the millions of India, writes to this column as follows under date of Ninth Month 17th:

"We have had good rains in our part of India and the season is now far enough advanced for us to feel reasonably sure of a bumper harvest, and all our silos will be full. Last year, at this time, the floods came and we saw our standing crops washed away. This year the river has been normal and so our crops are better than ever because of the silt left by last year's floods, and we will get great gain out of our loss. We are growing for the silo giant millet (some of it is sixteen feet high already), and sorghum and a little corn. We mix with these cowpeas, and sun hemp, a legume to enrich the food.

"The last two home mails have cheered us greatly, as we have heard of six American agricultural missionaries who are going to help us tackle the great problem of feeding India's hungry and clothing her naked. Three of these men will teach here in Allahabad and three will go to the native States to carry on the work there which has begun so well.

"I think India must be the most fortunate country on earth, certainly the least affected by the war. Last year we had bumper harvests of everything, and owing to our distance from European markets and the difficulties of shipping, prices have stayed pretty low, and the poor people have actually been getting cheaper food than before the war.

"We are much interested in the great task of America in trying to feed the Allies, and I do not believe there is another country on earth so well situated to help the United States in this as India. India is the second in the quantity of cotton she grows. Owing to bad methods and bad seed, India produces only eighty pounds of clean cotton per acre, against two hundred pounds for the U. S., and four hundred pounds per acre for Egypt. Last week I was on a committee to improve the cotton production of India. In Gwallor State, where I act as Director of Agriculture, we have over a million acres of good cotton land waiting for the application of intelligence and skill. The poor farmers are living a miserable hand-to-mouth existence on a soil capable of growing magnificent crops of cotton, sugar-cane and wheat. It is mostly land formerly occupied by opium, and I rejoice greatly that it falls to my lot to turn these fields to the production of crops useful to man. So you see why I rejoice at the coming of these six American agricultural missionaries, and why I pray that we may get six hundred more. We have the land, the climate, the farming population, but the people are cursed with ignorance, poverty and superstition, and can do little to help themselves at first. A lot of enthusiastic American missionary farmers could do to-day for India what a few years ago they did for the Philippines, i. e., help it help itself.

"Owing to the fact that the ship he was on was sunk we got a new teacher, Kenneth McAfee. We are sorry the ship went down but we are glad to get him, and hope this work is God's providence for him. We are still praying for class-rooms and a laboratory, I often wonder how Cornell or Michigan or Ohio State would teach agriculture without these things. The boys we have trained and turned out are in great demand, and with our present staff and equipment we can turn out so few, where we ought to be turning out scores.

"The Leper Asylum grows in numbers; we have now over four hundred of these poor sufferers to care for. Two dear little girls that had been given up by their leper mothers to my wife to be cared for in the untainted girls' home, after being there for some months, developed the disease and had to be sent back. These are the things that shake my nerves."

NEWS ITEMS.

REPORT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

Reported last week	$228,799.46
From meetings	2,073.12
From fifteen individuals	1,329.01

$232,201.59

CHARLES F. JENKINS,
Treasurer.

The first meeting of the Friends' Educational Association will be held at Friends' Select School on Twelfth Month 15th, at 2:30 p. m. The meeting will be addressed by Lida B. Earhart, Ph.D., who will speak on "The Relation of Proper Study to Good Teaching." Dr. Earhart was formerly instructor in Elementary Education in Teachers' College, and is now the Principal of a large public school in New York City. She is the author of two books on the subject of "Teaching Children to Study," that have been widely read and favorably criticised.

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD addressed a large audience (estimated at 1000) at a joint tea meeting at Fourth and Arch on the 26th ult. His lantern views of the desolated districts and of the reconstruction work gave reality to his explanations and appeals. He had the rapt attention of his audience for two hours.

On Fourth-day evening, the 28th, Alfred Kemp Brown and W. Blair Neatby addressed a good audience at Fourth and Arch. The subject announced was the "Conquering Forces of Christianity," but W. Blair Neatby amended this to "Christ's Conquering Peace." So far as we have known there has been no more appealing and convincing presentation of our peace testimony than was afforded by that occasion. That evening Alfred Kemp Brown went to Boston. W. Blair Neatby remained for the Monthly Meeting at Arch Street and for the week-end Fellowship Conference at Haverford. He and Joseph Elkinton went to Boston Seventh-day night. The three Friends will be in New England this week and back in Philadelphia early next week. The English Friends plan to sail for home near the end of this month. They have found all doors open for service in our Yearly Meeting and their coming has in many places seemed to be a special providence.

ARTICLE BY T. EDMUND HARVEY, WRITTEN FOR NEWS SHEET NOW PUBLISHED BY ENGLISH AND AMERICAN WORKERS ABROAD.

"L'UNION FAIT LA FORCE."—Those of us who have worked for the Belgians know their national motto: let us take it unto ourselves and strive to realize through our Association the true strength of a body of people united by a great common ideal.

Our work is not done. Still greater things lie before us, and we begin to see as we turn eastward a vast field of practical service that demands the very best we can give. Beyond this again lies the more permanent service of which Carl Heath speaks, and which needs of most earnest and concentrated attention, for we have had the privilege of much varied experience of men and movements abroad in time of war, and must strive for continuity in our work which may then lead to Quaker embassies when Peace comes.

We cannot afford to face the future as individuals, liable to lose touch with each other when our immediate work abroad has finished. Every past member of the various expeditions abroad must remain as anxious to help the work as when he or she was wearing the red and black star. We all need each other, for only as a corporate group can we face the coming challenge of the world; only as a united body can we hope to vanquish some of the difficulties before us.

So let us one and all join the Association and combine to make its News Sheet our bond of union in the various forms of rebuilding to which we shall be called.

REBUILDING.—It is well that we who have worked together in this common service should not have waited till the war is over to band ourselves together in fellowship, so that we may have some visible link with our co-workers scattered near and far, helping each other the better to realize, in all our groups, that we are members of a wider company, and that the task to which we have set our hands is but the beginning of a far greater rebuilding, without which our battered civilization must ere long fall in ruins. Judged by material standards, the best work that our little company has done or can do is but like a tiny islet in the vast ocean of human need and misery. Yet we would not make this our canon of failure or success. The dynamic influence of a single kindly act of unselfishness cannot be measured by statistics. The help which is passed on from life to life is not to be reckoned up in terms of houses or clothes or tools and furniture, or even the healing of sickness; it is like the seed corn which some day may produce many another crop in distant fields. Most of us have seen at some time or other something of the sacramental efficacy of some simple act of unselfish labor. Such moments seem to give us a glimpse of the plan of the Master Builder, and help us to go back to our little corner of work with the knowledge that He has a place for it all. LABORERUS. T. E. HARVEY.

The Council of Westtown Mothers met at Friends' Institute, Fourth-day, Eleventh Month 14, 1917, at 2:30 o'clock. The first half hour was social. The regular meeting began at about 3 o'clock. The minutes of Third Month and Fifth Month were read and adopted. Then the Treasurer's report was read.

A Nominating Committee was chosen to bring forward names for officers and Executive Committee at the Spring meeting, viz.:—Elizabeth S. Abbott, Lydia Leeds, Elizabeth Howell Bacon, Caroline Warren and Charlotte Haines.

It was moved and carried that twenty-five dollars, part of the dues from the Council, be given to Westtown for some good purpose, to be decided by the Executive Committee and the Westtown teachers.

It was further moved and carried that a short sketch of the Minutes be printed in THE FRIEND.

George L. Jones then addressed the meeting. He gave us a general review of the physical and spiritual life at Westtown, as it seemed to him, since the opening of the School in the Fall. This was so intensely interesting that it not only thrilled one with the feeling "all is well with my child," but made every one present resolve that, "I must do all in my power to make Westtown even more perfect, if possible."

George L. Jones said they at Westtown feel keenly the responsibility of taking boys and girls away from their fathers and mothers. He said they have problems some schools do not have. Co-education brings up some of these.

He said that at the present time different problems arise from those of a few years ago. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting itself is passing through a time of change,—is fluctuating. At times it is extremely difficult to know what the decisions at Westtown should be. He also said that some things, as automobile riding on First-days, can be done safely in a family, but can not be done in groups of two hundred. He said he should welcome any constructive criticism for the benefit of the School.

He also told the mothers that "the School opened very pleasantly with a most excellent group of boys and girls, who have a fine school spirit." Also, they have "an excellent senior class; one with fine Christian, generous attitude."

Ellen Cope is doing more individual corrective work for the girls, quite a little corrective gymnastics under the doctor's directions.

The afternoon exercises are being handled a little more fully and carefully.

Fannie Beal has two classes in sewing. The first one for the Fourth Class, the other optional to the remainder of the School.

Westtown is supplying a distinct need by having "teas" in Central once a week, with about twenty-five pupils and a few of the Faculty. They plan to go the rounds of the School.

Through Mary R. Williams, Mary Edgerton and others, the relationship of the School towards the help is being shown. In meeting their physical needs, steam heat and bath-rooms have been added to the help quarters. In order to supply opportunities to their spiritual lives, arrangements for a few of the girls to spend a social evening with them, was thought wise.

George L. Jones has a concern that there might be developed more fully among the boys at Westtown, opportunity for vocal and other outward expression of the religious life within them. On the girls' side the Northfield meetings, the knitting and other workings for the war sufferers are distinctly outward expressions of Christian spirit. He hopes the teachers will make it easy for the boys to open out to them on religious subjects, for, he said, "Westtown has nice boys and good boys and they have the right attitude towards the right thing."

He also said Westtown should be a centre of radiating influence in the neighborhood and should be ever interested in it.

Carroll Brown has a First-day School class in the neighborhood and this is a means through which some of the boys, by assisting, might give outward expression of Christian spirit.

George L. Jones wished for all the boys and girls at Westtown, and for all others, that "we might have large enough heart and great enough spirit so that the petty things of this life would not allow our vision of greater things to become dim." He said that he wished for "the simple, childlike, basic Christianity of the Dr. Grenfell type," and that Westtown might always be open for larger vision, for larger opportunities.

The meeting then adjourned.

The Treasurer received dues from thirty-five mothers.

SARAH H. CHEVNEY,
Secretary and Treasurer.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

NEW SELECTIVE SERVICE REGULATIONS.—The new Selective Service Regulations prescribed by the President on Eleventh Month 8, 1917, provide for an entirely new method of procedure in selecting men for service. Failure by any man who is registered to perform any duty prescribed thereby at or within the required time is, according to the Regulations, "a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment for one year and may result in the loss of valuable rights and immediate induction of such registrant into military service." It is, therefore, important that Friends understand these Regulations, the primary purpose of which is to classify all men of draft age who are not already in the army so that the government may know the place in the military, industrial or agricultural ranks of the nation in which it thinks a man's experience and training can best be used.

CLASSIFICATION.—For this purpose registrants are to be divided for military service into five classes. Those in Class 1 will be called first, in the order their numbers were drawn by lot at Washington last summer. After all the men in Class 1 have been called, those in Class 2 will be called in the order of their order numbers. Class 3 will be called in the same way after Class 2 is exhausted, then Class 4. Men in Class 5 are not subject to call. The effect is, therefore, that men in Classes 2, 3 and 4, are given a temporary exemption or deferred classification, and those in Class 5 a complete exemption.

REVOCAION OF ALL EXEMPTIONS.—In order to start with a clean slate all exemptions and discharges granted prior to noon, Twelfth Month 15, 1917, are on that date revoked and cancelled.

QUESTIONNAIRE.—All registered men who on Twelfth Month 15, 1917, have not been actually inducted into the military service are required to answer a sixteen-page Questionnaire, the first page of which gives the five classes into which the men are to be divided, followed by the following series of questions: 1, General; 2, Physical Fitness; 3, Legislative, Executive and Judicial Officers; 4, Ministers of Religion; 5, Divinity Students; 6, Military or Naval Service; 7, Citizenship; 8, Officials, Federal Employees, Pilots and Marines; 9, Religious Convictions against War; 10, Dependancy; 11, Industrial Occupation; 12, Agricultural Occupation. There are in all about 147 questions.

AFFIDAVITS.—There is at the end of the Questionnaire an affidavit which the registrant must make and the supporting affidavits for those having dependents or agricultural or industrial claims are also given in the Questionnaire. Additional affidavits may also be filed, in which case they must be written on one side of a sheet of white paper approximately the size of the Questionnaire. In accordance with Section 10 of the Regulations, any affidavit required thereby will be taken free of charge by any member of the registrant's Local or District Board, by any person designated in accordance with the Regulations to act as a legal adviser to registrants, and by any postmaster within the same local jurisdiction as the registrant.

CLAIMS FOR EXEMPTION.—On the first page of the Questionnaire the "registrant or other interested person" is to state the class in which he claims he should be classified. This is the only opportunity he has of claiming exemption, and he can enter claims for exemption on as many different grounds as the Regulations recognize and he believes he is entitled to, by making crosses, in column A, opposite the proper subdivisions of the classes.

Just below, but not in Class 5, there is a space for claiming exemption on conscientious grounds. Friends who are conscientiously opposed to participation in war should be careful to claim exemption on that ground by putting a cross in this space. Though such a claim does not entitle Friends to be placed in Class 5, it does entitle them to a certificate of exemption from combatant service (new form No. 1008), which they should insist on receiving.

MAILING QUESTIONNAIRE.—Beginning about Twelfth Month 15th each, Local Board is expected to mail each week-day except holidays, Questionnaires to five per cent. of the registered men in its district, who have not already been drafted and accepted for service. Therefore, within less than a month all Questionnaires should have been mailed. Daily a notice (Form 1002) of the order numbers of those to whom the Questionnaire was that day mailed is to be posted in the office of the Local Board. This is official notice to the registrant that a Questionnaire has been mailed to him.

TIME LIMIT FOR ANSWERING QUESTIONS.—A registrant is required to answer the Questionnaire, marking thereon all his claims for exemption and file it with his Local Board, within seven days after it was mailed, not including First-days and legal holidays. Failure to receive the Questionnaire does not excuse a man from answering it within the prescribed time. It is his duty to watch the notices posted as mentioned above, obtain a copy of the Questionnaire, and answer it within the time limit.

CLAIMS OF EXEMPTION ON BEHALF OF ANOTHER.—Any person may claim exemption or deferred classification for another on a form (No. 1001A), which is a duplicate of the first page of the Questionnaire, and can be obtained from the Local Board, provided such claim is filed with all supporting affidavits with the Local Board, seven days after the Questionnaire was mailed.

EXTENSION OF TIME.—The Boards may grant an extension of time for filing claims for exemption when it is shown to their satisfaction by the registrant, or some other person for him, "by affidavit that failure to make claim within the time limits was due to causes other than the fault or neglect of the claimant," or was due to the fact that evidence which did not exist or could not be obtained within the time limit can be produced.

FAILURE TO RETURN QUESTIONNAIRE.—Any registrant who fails to return the questionnaire within the seven days is to be classified in Class 1, and is considered to have waived all right to claim exemption, and will be so recorded by the Local Board and reported by them to the police as a delinquent, unless some one on his behalf has, within the time limit, claimed exemption for him or application is made for an extension of time as stated above.

All claims for deferred classification except those on the grounds of Industry or Agriculture which have to be forwarded by the Local Boards to the District Boards for action, are to be passed upon promptly and the registrant notified within four days after the questionnaire was filed by him of his classification. If he so desires he may within five days after the notice of his classification was mailed to him appeal their decision to the District Board. To so appeal he or someone authorized by him must go to the Local Board and sign the claim of appeal printed on the last page of the Questionnaire. Notice of the decision of the District Board on such an appeal or on the claim for deferred classification on the grounds of industry or agriculture will in due course be sent to him by the Local Board.

APPEALS FROM DECISION OF DISTRICT BOARDS.—The person who made the claim or appeal may, if there was one dissenting vote in the District Board, appeal to the President dependency cases of unusual hardship, industrial and agricultural cases, if such appeal is recommended by a member of the Local Board and by either the Government Appeal Agent or the Adjutant General of the State. The appeal must be made within five days after notice of the decision of the District Board was mailed by the Local Board if the registrant was classified in Class 1. If he was classified in Classes 2, or 3, or 4, he must wait until the men in the preceding class are all called into military service. When all of the preceding class are called into service the Local Board will attach to the Questionnaire a certificate to that effect, and any appeal must be made within ten days. All such appeals are made at the office of the Local Board on the forms printed on the last page of the Questionnaire.

The above information does not, of course, undertake to give a digest of a large part of the new rules and regulations which cover over 120 pages. The responsibility rests upon each man to keep himself informed of the duties he must perform. Legal advisory Boards are to be appointed in each Local Board's district to give information and assistance. A reprint of those portions of the Questionnaire which are of special interest to Friends, with information in reference thereto has been prepared and copies thereof can be obtained upon application to this Committee.

In many ways the new method systematizes and simplifies the draft. Friends are no longer required to make affidavit as to their conscientious objection to war or file an affidavit of the clerk or minister of their meeting in reference to their being members. In the future registrants will deal only with their Local Boards, unless summoned to appear before the District Board.

F. ALBENON EVANS,
Assistant Secretary.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

The following is a brief summary of the situation in the various camps:

CAMP DEVENS, MASS.—The number of Friends in Camp Devens is small. Some have refused to put on the uniform and are not accepting any pay or saluting the officers, but are performing some services in the hospitals. These with other conscientious objectors, have been formed into a company which is stationed at the Base Hospital. Those Friends who do not wear the uniform are not allowed to leave camp, but otherwise are given the same privileges and treatment as the soldiers.

CAMP DIX, NEW JERSEY.—There are now at Camp Dix four Friends who have taken a firm stand from the very first against performing any service whatsoever under military orders or against wearing a uniform.

They have only been in camp a short time and so far have not been put together, though it is hoped they soon will be.

One of the Friends a few days ago was put in a small orderly-room at one of the barracks, which had no heat in it and had one window without a sash. As the weather was cold he was decidedly uncomfortable. He, however, was ordered to remain there, and was not given any dinner. Interested Friends immediately made an investigation and found from the captain in charge that this order was a mistake. He was released and allowed to go to mess with the other men.

A small group of conscientious objectors, one of whom is a Friend, have been put in the same barracks, and are allowed entire freedom of the camp.

The four other Friends in camp have not as yet refused to perform all service under the military. One is in the post-office department at the camp, another is with a machine-gun company, and two are doing Hospital Service.

CAMP DODGE, IOWA.—There have not been many Friends sent to Camp Dodge, and a number of those who have gone have now been transferred to other camps. Through the efforts of a representative of this Committee the officers have agreed that Friends in camp be segregated and not required to perform duties within the military organization, but be allowed to make themselves useful at the Y. M. C. A. buildings.

CAMP FUNSTON, KANSAS.—There is a large group of conscientious objectors at Camp Funston, of which about twenty are Friends. The camp is one of the large cantonments, there now being about 60,000 there. As in a number of the camps, the chief-of-staff, Colonel E. C. Kilbourne, has charge of all matters in connection with conscientious objectors. They are now segregated in the Sanitation Department. Until recently the officers have subjected these Friends to some harsh treatment for their refusal to perform service under the military authorities. The situation, however, is now much improved, a better understanding between the conscientious objectors and the officers having been reached through the efforts of this Committee. Some Friends are now voluntarily doing work in the Y. M. C. A., but are not accepting any pay. A larger number are accepting pay and are doing work in the Sanitary Department of the army. They have not so far taken a stand against performing any service under the military control, and therefore are still part of the military machine.

At the request of Colonel Kilbourne, a representative of the Committee is to organize the conscientious objectors into a group, with duly elected officers. As at a number of the camps the officers have shown a desire that Friends in camp be released to go to France to take up reconstruction work under the Committee.

(To be concluded.)

NOTICES.

On and after Twelfth Month 2, 1917, Meetings for Worship at Coatesville will assemble at 10.45 o'clock instead of 10 o'clock. This does not apply to Monthly or Quarterly Meetings.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:—

- Balfour—Theism and Humanism.
- Davis—Streetland.
- Gage—Optic Projection.
- Harris—Aaron's Breastplate.
- Johnson—Century of Expansion.
- Kent—Social Teachings of the Prophets and Jesus.
- Livingstone—Mary Slessor of Calabar.
- Platner and Others—Religious History of New England.
- Rauschenbusch—Dare We Be Christians.
- Seton-Watson and Others—War and Democracy.

LINDA A. MOORE,
Librarian.

DIED.—Eleventh Month 23, 1917, at his home in West Philadelphia, BENJAMIN ALBERTSON, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

—, Eleventh Month 18, 1917, at West Grove, Pa., ELIHAZ MERCER, aged seventy-two years; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, Eleventh Month 15, 1917, near Moorestown, N. J., MARY E. B. LEEDS, wife of Walton B. Leeds, aged fifty-seven years; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, New Jersey.

WINTER SPORTS

AT
Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education. Board of Managers from both branches of Friends. Courses in Old and New Testament, Church History, History and Doctrines of Friends, Missions, First-day School Organization, Social Betterment, International Organization, History of Religion, Comparative Religion, and allied subjects.

Instruction by scholarly experts from the the faculties of Haverford and Swarthmore Colleges, and from other educational, social, and religious institutions of Philadelphia and vicinity.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

SWARTHMORE, PA.
ELBERT RUSSELL, Director.

W. B. WEAVER

UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL PHONE ESTABLISHED 1880

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET
PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES
Plumbing and Heating Contractor
ALSO LEAD BURNING
260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA
BELL PHONE: Filbert 2666.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL PHONE.

Hajoca

porcelain - enameled Bath

This newly designed Hajoca tiled-in Bath is a model whose simple, graceful lines and sanitary equipment foretell its wide popularity.

Come to our Show-rooms and see our model bathrooms, they are within easy reach of City Hall. A visit will amply repay you. Write for the Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES
& GADBURY CO.
1130-1144 Ridge Ave.
(at 12th and Spring Garden Sts.)

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager
Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year. NATHAN L. JONES.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building
Established 1886. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. PHILA.

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundrah Wilton
"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.
1220 Market Street

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE OSCEOLA

SHETLAND PONY

Your child needs a
to ride, drive, and grow up with.

HARTZELL BROTHERS, SEBRING, OHIO.
ESTABLISHED 1883.

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:
2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50
1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40
By freight or express, 1 c. a. lb. extra.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

WANTED—BY A LARGE MACHINERY AND supply house controlled by Friends, a strong, active man, say between thirty and forty years, who has had mechanical or technical education, and who has had some experience in selling and managing men. A member of Friends preferred, but would consider a man of strong Christian character of another denomination. Apply to "THE FRIEND," stating age, experience, present salary and occupation, whether married or single, education, etc.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolleys.
Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED IN A HOME WITH A SMALL FAMILY in Media, Pa. by suitable woman companion.
Address "P"—Care of "THE FRIEND."

Flexible Flyer

The famous Steering Sled with non-skid runners.

Outlasts 3 ordinary sleds

Nine sizes, 3 to 8½ feet long. Sold by hardware and department stores.

FREE OFFER:
Send for cardboard model showing how Flexible Flyers steer.

Unless it bears this trademark it isn't a Flexible Flyer.

S. L. Allen & Co. Box A 711 Philadelphia

THE following timely books, mostly of those recommended by the Social Order Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, are for sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

"The Church and the Hour," Vida D. Scudder,	$1.00
"The Social Problem," C. A. Ellwood,	1.25
"The Abolition of Poverty," J. H. Hollander,	75
"Christianizing the Social Order," Walter Rauschenbusch,	1.50
"The Day of Our Visitation," William Littleboy,	50
"A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich," John Woolman,	65

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped, prompt and efficient

321 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-51 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

GIRARD TRUST CO.
BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian, Administrator, Assignee and Receiver. Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults. Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

WILLIAM S. YARNALL
MANUFACTURING OPTICIAN
128 SOUTH SIXTEENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESTNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER
S. W. COR. 16TH and RACE STREETS
Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals
BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

M. GATCHEL
126 N. 21st St., PHILA.
MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY
'Phone, Spruce 3632

English Friends' Periodicals:
Friends' Quarterly Examiner $1.66
The Friend (London) (weekly) 3.25
Journal of Friends' Historical Society (quarterly) 1.25
Friends' Fellowship Paper (6 issues) 1.00
The Venturer (Monthly) 1.00
Subscriptions for 1918 should be sent now to GRACE W. BLAIR,
109 W. State St., Media, Pa.

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense
Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth from 30c to 50c
REDUCES
FIRE RISK.
Guaranteed for one year. $16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels
Paper

Paper Bags and Twine
259 South Third Street

ALBERT C. RIDLEY 1718 Sansom Street ENGRAVING, PRINTING
Fine Business Stationery
Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting Cards, Die Stamped Writing Paper
TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

HARVEY T. WEBER

TAILOR

207-208 HALE BLDG., 1326 CHESTNUT ST.

The custom of Friends specially solicited.

Friends Arch St. Centre
304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.
PHONE—MARKET 1571.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 13, 1917.

No. 24.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVID H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVID H. FORSYTHE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

HAVE WE BEEN AN INACTIVE PEOPLE?

There is a little book containing a list of organizations with which Friends in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are connected, either as managers or as influential helpers. It was compiled by William S. Vaux, Jr., and printed in 1897 by direction of the "Committee on Attention to Members and Attenders" of Western District Meeting. These organizations and institutions are listed under eighty-six names,—a number "much larger than was at first anticipated," says the introductory paragraph; and it adds that "many institutions have come to light, the existence of which was hardly known before." Setting aside libraries, First-day schools for our own members, Select School, etc., one may still count about forty institutions and associations of a charitable or benevolent order, the benefits of which were designed chiefly for people outside our membership. The date of founding or organization is usually given, together with information as to the means of support and the aims of the enterprise. For instance:—"Western District Colored School" and "Mothers' Meeting"; founded about 1848, "now under care of Trustees and a Committee of the meeting"; supported by legacy, etc.—"Aim: To afford a good common-school and industrial education to the poorest class of colored people in the lower section of the city, and to lead them to a Christian life by instruction and example." Or this:—"The Western Soup Society", founded in 1837, and supported by endowment and subscriptions. Its aim is to supply food to the "deserving poor", but it also provides "a temporary home for women with infants, and a kindergarten for small children."

We have been accustomed to hearing much about the Tunesassa Indian School; about the Institute for Colored Youth, and the Shelter for Colored Orphans; about the Aimwell School, a very worthy and successful enterprise founded in 1796; and if we are attenders of the Monthly Meeting that is held at Fourth and Arch Streets we have probably listened to reports of an institution now known as the Anthony Benezet School. Its history has extended from 1770 to the present time. Less familiar would be the work of the Joseph Sturge Mission School, founded in 1865; the Howard Institution, founded in 1855, and managed by an association of women Friends; and the "Widows' Asylum," founded in 1817, one-third of the managers being Friends. The Pennsylvania Prison Society, founded in 1787, includes some Friends in its board of managers and its "acting committee."

In the past twenty years new enterprises and obligations have claimed the attention of Friends the world over; and some of those listed in the little book referred to have probably been relinquished, while some have been "merged" with other concerns. It would no doubt be a matter of surprise to a good many people to find so large a number of activities carried on by the members of only one Yearly Meeting, and to learn how long many of them have been in operation,—a fact which will probably give rise to critical questionings. Yet an opinion has been expressed that we are now an inactive body, "doing nothing" for the world's progress, and perhaps some of our own members are inclined to believe the charge. Some of us may well admit, with humiliation, that if we had been more faithful to our high calling in other respects, we had perhaps been less deserving of any charge of indifference in this. In other words, if we had been duly concerned to be what we ought to be, and to make a full surrender of ourselves to the Divine Will, we might have been more largely serviceable in many ways. Maintaining faithfulness and zeal, the Society at large might have been a larger one—certainly a more united one—and a more effectual force in turning many to righteousness.

Even this condition, however, would not require that we should adopt all the methods of other Christian societies, or enter upon just the same work in all cases. To advertise ourselves in the manner of many organizations, to sound a trumpet before us, has not seemed to us in keeping with the Christian way of doing good. The injunction to let our lights shine comes from the same authority as that which signifies that our aims should be in secret; so it must be possible to keep one precept without violating the other. At all events, in making plans for doing good, room must be left for each one of us to engage in "that particular good" to which we may be called individually. It is likely that faithfulness in this very thing may sometimes expose us to a wrong judgment on the part of some others.

It would be going quite away from the Quaker basis for one to prescribe for another in the matter of individual duty, and to judge of another's service by the number of organized activities he may be connected with. Still, organization is often essential to effective work; and one thought that was in mind in the beginning of these remarks was that as a matter of helpful information, perhaps a revised and enlarged catalogue of the kind published twenty years ago might have a place now. Many inquiries might thus be answered.

M. W.

The series of articles under the caption, "A Pacifist Amongst Savages," will be completed in this number of THE FRIEND. The compilation, made by our friend Benjamin F. Whitson, has been much appreciated. There has been a demand in several directions that these articles shall be included in a tract, as most suitable matter to answer the charge that the Peace position of Friends is merely an impracticable theory. If it will work with "savages" what more could be asked?

We are proposing now to meet a definite demand for articles dealing with the experience of Friends with previous military drafts. Ann Sharpless has prepared some account of the experiences of Edward C. and William P. Smedley; Dilwyn Stratton has recited at our request the circumstances of his father's testing, and Anna T. Griffith has kindly made selections from the somewhat classic account of Abel Thomas. This matter will be continued through several numbers under the conviction that it has, as some of our correspondents believe, very important present-day service.—[EDS.]

"ESTABLISH THY BRETHREN."

From an editorial by Edward Grubb in The Friend [London]:—

Once more Satan is sifting us as wheat; and once more we may believe that the availing prayer is being offered for each one of us, "I prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and do thou, when once thou hast recovered thyself, establish thy brethren." If once more it is "the hue [of evil] and the power of darkness," there is yet the same Light and Love behind the darkness and the slaughter that there was on the night before the Cross—which was still there, though the Lord Himself for a season lost consciousness of it. Even He had to pass through the desolating experience revealed in the cry from the Cross, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Even He had to know what it was to stretch His hands out into the darkness and to find no answering touch. Yet, if we in our measure are called to share His desolation—to enter into the feelings of Mary of Magdala, when weeping by His tomb she said, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."—we shall find, if we sincerely seek for Him, that One stands by us, perhaps unrecognized, who can bring back to us, as He brought back to Mary, all, and more than all, we have ever dared to hope and believe. To us, too, He will say, as He said to her, "Go to My brethren, and say to them" that I have won the victory, that with Me they may win it also.

The struggle for faith, and the lessons that come to us even through temporary failure, are not for ourselves alone. All are to be turned to account for the blessing and the help of others who are being "sifted like wheat." It is to those who have passed through the darkness, and understand it, that men naturally turn for sympathy; it is those who have "recovered themselves" that can help to "establish" the faith of others. All who have known the experience of "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise, for the spirit of heaviness,"—in the prison cell, in the desolated home, or even in the presence of war itself,—have laid upon them the joyous responsibility of sharing with others what God has revealed to them. Everyone who has caught a vision of the "ocean of light that flows over the ocean of darkness and death" is meant to have a share in the work of re-establishing in the souls of men the faith by which we live. The world is out of joint, and men are "separated from the Divine harmony," but it is those who have shared the suffering, and even been borne down by it, but who have recovered themselves, like Peter, who are to help in resolving the discord. As Peter himself wrote (if he is really responsible for the first Epistle attributed to him) in the triumphant assurance that remained with him through life: "The God of all grace, who hath called us to His eternal glory in Jesus Christ, after that you have suffered a little while, shall Himself adjust you perfectly, stablish and strengthen you." (1 Peter v: 10).

EDWARD GRUBB.

A PACIFIST AMONG SAVAGES.

(Concluded from page 211.)

This morning, while the men from the Agency were in my tent, several chiefs and war-chiefs came in. White Horse seated himself by me, and pointing to Josiah Butler, the teacher at the Agency school, exclaimed—"Tehanna!" (Texan). I answered—"Tehanna? No." He gave him a very scrutinizing look. Josiah had not thought it needful to dress up to go to an Indian camp, so his long hair, beard, wide-brimmed slouch hat bore no slight resemblance to a Texan. White Horse again exclaimed—"No Tehanna; no good—steal ponies—no go home—me kill—Tehanna no good." I replied—"Tehanna? No, he my brother (that is brother teacher)." "School father—stone school-house. Your brother—school father—stone school-house?—me no see him there—you lie—Tehanna!" "No, he my brother. When we go to the Agency you go with me. We go to school-house—you see—I no lie—he school father, you see him." White Horse reluctantly consented to let him go back to the Agency, and to go with me to the stone school-house, where I must show him my "brother teacher." "I no see him, your life for his." Some weeks after he went with me to the Agency; to the stone school-house and satisfactorily verified my word in recognizing my "Tehanna brother," and partaking of a hearty dinner at his table.

Some desperadoes from Texas had stolen ponies from the Indians, hence their great antipathy towards all "Tehannas."

White Horse had been a wild and raiding chief among the Kiowas, a bad and treacherous Indian, as many incidents connected with him will show. While he never became very good, he finally attached himself to the most friendly element in his tribe, giving the agents little trouble.

Some time after the incident connected with Josiah Butler and perhaps before the time he went to the Agency, as related, having been away from his tribe a short time, the following circumstances are related.

While sitting on my inverted camp kettle, my usual seat when writing, my back turned towards the entrance to my tent, I heard a rustling sound and turned to see who might be there. I was surprised to see the burly form of White Horse, entering with his bow strung and three iron pointed arrows in hand. He appeared to be much excited, and his whole bearing portended mischievous designs, confirmed by his declaration, with an oath, "You—me—one die," by signs I understood. I replied without the oath, by the same signs, "You—me—one die, no," showing to him that I understood him. I then addressed him—"Why, White Horse, how do you do? Long time I no see you," advancing toward him and offering him my hand, which he surlily refused to accept. I then took hold of his arm, giving it an energetic shake with both my hands, pointing to my camp kettle, bade him "Beioh" (sit down), fixing my eye upon him with some sternness and keeping it there.

He obeyed. In seating himself his eye wandered from mine and fell upon a colored picture of a jaguar, and rested upon it. I instantly caught up a pointer and quickly pointing to the picture, in a quick, sharp voice asked him if he ever saw that animal. He answered "Yes," the first word he had spoken. "Where you see him?" "In Mexico." "You kill him?" "Yes." "You got skin?" "Yes." "I want to go to your house and see it." "All right, you come."

Having thus drawn him into conversation the danger had passed, and I continued by asking him, "Why you no go to the Agency." "Agent tell me he have me arrested if I come again." I replied, "You go with me, agent no have you arrested." "But," he said, "I tell agent I kill him when I see him again." "No, White Horse, you no kill agent; agent no have you arrested, if you go with me. You go." After some farther pressing he finally agreed to go when I went to the Agency.

Notwithstanding the positive manner in which I had spoken to White Horse, I felt some misgivings when we were actually on our way, with others of the tribe, knowing he had made arrangements with his warriors to avenge him if he was arrested. However, we went into the office together. The agent shook hands with me, and seeing White Horse by my side, offered him his hand, which he accepted.

After rations had been issued and we were nearly ready to return to camp, I was in the office with the agent. White Horse came in, and asked the agent, "Do you know what kind of man you have sent to our camp?" "I think I do," said the agent, "I think I have sent you a very good man." "You may think so, but I think he is a mighty dangerous man. Everybody knows I am a mighty dangerous man, but I cannot stand before Thomissy. I come home a few days ago—my warriors tell me Thomissy put some of them out of his tent. I do not know what for, I heap mad. I went to Thomissy's tent to kill him. I tell him by signs I kill him. He tell me no, you no kill me. You see I no kill him. He ask me to come with him to Agency. I tell him, no, agent say he have me arrested. Thomissy say—'You go with me, agent no have you arrested. You know I tell you I kill you when I see you again. Thomissy say, 'You no kill agent. Agent no arrest you.' Now you see I come. I have been here three days. You no arrest me. I no kill you. I tell you Thomissy mighty dangerous man, I cannot stand before his medicine."

The agent informed White Horse that he did not want to arrest any good man, as he had now come in and drawn his rations as a friendly Indian, he had nothing to fear while he behaved well.

HISTORY OF THE TREATY OF WILLIAM PENN WITH THE INDIANS.

[Deborah C. Battey, of Columbianna, Ohio, sends the following account from the papers of her husband, the late Thomas C. Battey. For its bearing upon the somewhat unsettled question as to a written representation of the great treaty of friendship, this narrative will at least not be without interest.—Eus.]

In conversation with Captain Black Beaver I enquired particularly what became of the Treaty William Penn made with the Indians. His answer was [to this import]:—

When William Penn gave this Treaty to the Indians, he told them to keep it for their children who should live after them. It was accordingly placed in the hands of their principal chief. At his death it was placed in the hands of reliable chiefs, chosen in a council of the tribes, whom it concerned, who kept it apart from all other treaties. It was the "Great Treaty."

It finally fell into the hands of the Delawares, to which tribe Captain Black Beaver belonged. This tribe was removed westward, and as time passed on [the Treaty] fell into his hands. He was then living on the Wichita River, Indian Territory.

While from home on a visit to his sister, he learned that an officer with whom he was acquainted was in command of a neighboring fort, and he decided to visit him.

Here he was told of the breaking out of the Civil War, that this fort, being surrounded by Southern sympathizers, was in danger, and the commander saw no way of escape, unless the chief would assist them to a place of safety; knowing the country well, he could easily do this.

Captain Black Beaver objected on account of the danger to his own property, but being assured that the Government would replace any loss he might sustain in his efforts to save Government possessions, finally consented to convey them to a place of safety.

While returning homeward he met his neighbors fleeing in consternation from their homes that with his own, had been devastated. He turned back with them. Coming to where Wichita, Kansas, now stands, they remained there until the war was over. He then returned and made another home three miles from the first, where I visited him and he told me this story of the loss of the Penn Treaty by the destruction of his own property.

The Government voted him $20,000, but never a dollar did he receive.

THOMAS C. BATTEY.

LEAVE IT WITH HIM.

Yes, leave it with Him,

The lilies do;

And they grow;

They grow in the rain.

And they grow in the dew—

Yes, they grow,

They grow in the darkness, all hid in the night;

They grow in the sunshine, revealed by the light;

Still they grow.

They ask not your planting,

They need not your care

As they grow;

Dropping down in the valley,

The field anywhere—

There they grow;

They grow in their beauty, arrayed in pure white;

They grow clothed in glory by heaven's own light;

Sweetly grow.

The grasses are clothed

And the ravens are fed

From His store,

But you who are loved

And guarded and led,

How much more

Will He clothe you and feed you and give you His care?

Then leave it with Him, He has everywhere

A ample room.

Yes, leave it with Him,

'Tis more dear to His heart

You will know,

Than the lilies that bloom,

Or the flowers that start

'Neath the snow.

Whatever you need, if you ask it in prayer,

You can leave it with Him, for you are His care;

You, you know.

—From The Transcript.

VISITING TUNESASSA AND THE ELKLANDS BY AUTOMOBILE.

Two of us set out from a Jersey town early on Eleventh Month 12, 1917. Crossing the Delaware at Frenchtown, and again at Port Jervis, we reached Liberty, N. Y., that night. The weather, which had been beautiful for nearly a week, continuing so, we greatly enjoyed the changing views along the river, the quiet tone of the brown fields and mountains, as well as the good roads where we met but few other travelers. Above Port Jervis, a deer's head protruding from a passing automobile and the body of another, hanging in front of a building, were reminders of the game season.

Temperature the following morning was about fourteen degrees, and on the winding road down the East Branch to Hancock, the hemlocks on the mountain sides were hoary with frost.

Our second night was passed at Bath. At Dansville, a call was made on Isaac C. Rogers. His home is near the top of a high hill, from which there is an extensive view. On the evening of Third-day, about nine o'clock, we arrived at Tunesassa.

The impression made by the School upon the visitors was pleasant. The attendance of scholars was about forty-one, twenty-six girls and fifteen boys. At Fifth-day meeting the children were orderly and a good spirit seemed to prevail. The meeting-room is much freshened in appearance. An officer of the institution, who attended meeting for the first time since the small-pox quarantine has been lifted, was earnest in prayer.

We examined the various improvements in the main building and elsewhere. They appear to be substantial. In the evening we were kindly entertained at the home of Henry B. and Eliza Leeds, at Steamburg.

It was somewhat affecting to learn that three Indian boys who started from the School summer before last—four of us, to go swimming in the Allegheny—two have since died. One was a bright boy who, drawn into bad company, became intoxicated and met death on the railway.

On Sixth-day the accounts were finished and some parts of the farm and woodland were visited. The sun did not show itself during our stay, and on Seventh-day the tops of the high hills were white with snow. Leaving the kind Friends at the School, we retraced (in part) our course to Waverly, N. Y., where turning south, we spent the night at Towanda.

Elklands Meeting was our objective, but with the delays of travel, and some miscalculation, we were an hour late. However, most of the Friends were seen in or near the meeting-house before they had scattered. We visited Abel McCarty, whom we found cheerful in his advancing years, and spent two nights at the hospitable home of John S. Brown. Some calls were made on Second-day. Eldaah Wilcox showed us where, on the mountain side, a bear had torn or gnawed open a log in search of ants or grubs, and also where the blackberry bushes had, during the summer, been broken down and their tips sheared by them. The hound which ran with us was a good example in obedience. Strong and lithe in body, he runs rabbits, sometimes to the detriment of growing crops, and consequently is often chained. If, after having been thus confined for several days, he is then released and started on a course, he will nevertheless return when called and submit to be again fastened.

On Third-day, by way of Lopez, Wilkes-barre and Mauch Chunk, we reached home.

W. B. E.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

The gatherings of the 27th ult. proved of especial interest. They were favored with the company and labors of a number of visiting Friends, among whom were Alfred Kemp Brown, of London, England, and William Blair Neatby, of Birmingham, England, with liberating minutes from their Yearly Meetings; Joseph Elkinton, with a minute liberating him as their companion; and Rufus King, with a minute from his Monthly Meeting in North Carolina.

It was very refreshing to Friends to have this hand of Christian solicitude and spiritual care stretched out to them from across the sea and from places nearer home.

The concern of the Quarterly Meeting for the prosperity of the many more or less stripped meetings within its precincts, took shape in the Fifth Month in the appointment of a large and representative Visitation Committee. This Committee brought in its first report which proved a great satisfaction to Friends. It gave evidence of an increase of circulation of life among the meetings and a drawing together in spiritual fellowship of the members of the Quarterly Meeting. The Committee was continued for an indefinite period and encouraged to proceed with its labors as way opened.

A solemn concern overspread this Committee that in the appointing of meetings in various centres the guiding hand of the Master be watched as it might open the way to service required of Him in the midst of Mennonite and Dunkard communities found within the limits of Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting. It was felt that as these are true brethren in Christ, though we may not be ecclesiastically of the same

Society, and are sharing similar exercises with our own members at this time, a mutual spiritual blessing would be found in the cultivation of occasional points of contact with them as the Master directs.

M. I. R.

ELEVENTH MONTH 30, 1917.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"SEEK 'EM, KEEPER!"—(A Tale of the Seventeenth Century)—L. V. Hodgkin, in The Examiner.—The mist was hanging low over a desolate moor in the Lowlands of Scotland bordering on the Solway, one dismal autumn evening in the year 1690. Darkness was drawing on apace. A man and woman on horseback were struggling against the wind and rain. All day long, the damp, clinging mist had chilled them to the bone. Now the wind had risen tempestuously, and the mist had turned to fierce, driving scuds of rain. Round the man's broad-brimmed hat the drops had collected, till they formed a small river of water, which from time to time overflowed and ran down in a dreary trickle. His lower limbs were encased in the long riding gaiters that were known as "spatterdashes;" while a long, flowing cloak streamed from his shoulders, half covering the horse, as well as the rider, with its welcome protection. The woman at his side wore a somewhat similar cloak, but her closely-fitting bonnet was encased in an oilskin cover that terminated in a long, pointed cape over her shoulders. But neither cloaks, capes, nor "spatterdashes" were proof against the long day of hard riding in the mist and rain. The woman's inner garments, by this time, were beginning to cling clammy round her. Yet she strove to urge her tired horse to keep up with her companion, though she felt that her strength was failing.

Seen thus alone, on this desolate moor far away from all human habitation, the couple might naturally have been supposed to be man and wife. But they were not. They were two Ministering Friends, James Dickinson and Jane Fearon, traveling on behalf of the Society, "in the Service of Truth." Jane's husband, Peter Fearon, who was to have been the third member of the party, had been kept at home, by an attack of illness, at the last moment. How Jane had longed to stay behind and nurse him! But their errand was a difficult and dangerous one. They were to visit Friends in what was then the northern part of the county of Cumberland, that is to say, in the undulating country of low hills and valleys sloping down to the Solway, that is now on the northern side of the Scottish border. A wild, desolate land it is, still, with something eerie and forsaken about it even on a bright summer's day. Two hundred years ago it needed real courage on the part of a timid woman, to set forth with one companion across this desolate land. Yet Jane Fearon had not hesitated. A nervous woman by nature, she was a courageous woman by grace. Moreover her husband had warmly urged her to proceed.

At first all had gone well with them. Their errand on the far side of the Solway had prospered beyond their hopes. But the last twelve hours had been disastrous, since they had turned their horses' heads once more towards the grey distant mountains that spoke of Cumberland and home. One of the horses had cast a shoe earlier in the day, which had delayed them. To save time, their guide had encouraged them to try a desolate track across the moor. But now evening was NOTE.—No account written by either James Dickinson or Jane Fearon of this adventure seems to have been preserved. Several manuscript versions by listeners who heard it either at first or second-hand are to be seen in the Library at Devonshire House. These all, in spite of slight discrepancies, show a surprising unanimity as to the main facts. Much of the old language and many local details have been preserved. The story has also been printed more than once, notably in "Annals of the Early Friends," from which I have taken some additional information. It has also been preserved by aural tradition, through many generations of Friends.

at hand and the stage seemed growing ever longer, with no prospect of reaching the hoped-for town before nightfall. The Scottish boy, who had persuaded them to try this lonely road, seemed for some time to have lost his bearings. He had run on ahead to see if he could find shelter. But, apparently, the mist had swallowed him up, for, though half an hour had passed, he seemed to have entirely disappeared. At last, long before her companion heard anything, Jane Fearon's quick ears caught the welcome sound of returning footsteps. Shortly afterwards the lad reappeared, breathless. He only knew two words of English; but from the rapid flood of Gaelic he poured forth, as well as from his excited gestures, it was easy to perceive that something had disturbed him.

"We shall never reach our destination this night I fear," said James Dickinson at last. "We must needs stop at the first house we come to, and ask for shelter. No one could turn a dog out of doors on such a night as this. And I promised thy husband to care for thee and for thy physical welfare. But I fear from the boy's gestures that no house can be near at hand." The rain poured down in heavier torrents than ever, as he finished speaking. It was therefore with intense relief that, a few moments later, the two Friends saw the corner of a solid stone wall appearing through the mist, and then the outbuildings of a farm. Next came the gable-end of a house, and finally they discerned a sign-post swinging over a high-arched door. Jane Fearon gave a sigh of relief at the sight of such a substantial dwelling. "The Lord is good to us indeed," she said. "It is not only a house, it is an Inn, where travelers have a right to be entertained; not only for ourselves but for our poor beasts the shelter and warmth will be indeed welcome."

(To be continued.)

THE FELLOWSHIP CONFERENCE.

BENJAMIN F. WHITSON.

The degree of interest which Friends generally have shown in the Fellowship of Reconciliation would seem to justify the publication in THE FRIEND of some account of the recent Conference held at Haverford College. The week-end vacation on account of the Thanksgiving holiday, afforded an opportune time for such a gathering. The total varied from 150 to 250, but a considerable number who live in or near Philadelphia came and went at their own convenience. The attendance was characteristic of the Fellowship, embracing men and women from many parts of the United States, and representing a wide diversity of occupations and religious association. There were, however, very few of the "working class," and members of the Society of Friends seemed less prominent in numbers and in expression than heretofore. The group was decidedly one of talent and education, emphatically democratic, but not lacking in steadiness nor steadfastness.

The sessions began on Sixth-day afternoon, the 30th ult., and ended on First-day afternoon, the 2nd inst.—seven in all, averaging in duration about two hours each. There were also committee meetings and "table parties" for the fuller discussion of matters under consideration.

The topic presented first was, "The Principles of Reconciliation in Industrial Life." The subject was elaborated by Professor Harry F. Ward of Boston University. Much interest was manifest, and in the evening session opportunity was given for the presentation of somewhat "radical" views by men and women of distinction in labor unions and other organizations aiming to benefit the working classes. No effort was made to secure the endorsement of any radical policy. The aim seemed to be to find points of common agreement; and, where in matters of opinion agreement is impossible, to share the inspiration of a united endeavor to cast aside prejudice and preconceptions and to seek to know and accept the truth. The set addresses were temperate, and, in the main, constructive. They were analytical, but not denunciatory, and the open questioning and comment were similarly unobjectionable.

On Seventh-day the topic was, "Expressing the Fellowship Message and Spirit in War Time." As might have been expected, the response was ready and instructive. Re-construction Work (both material and spiritual), Relief Work in Armenia and Syria, and Fellowship Propaganda under present conditions were considered well, and, we may say in truth, prayerfully. In the afternoon, "The Failures of Force and Successes of Love" were illustrated by chapters of personal experience. There were three formal addresses. The first was a written statement of an Episcopal clergyman in defence of his stand for the principles of the Fellowship after having been asked to resign his commission. No address during the entire Conference was more fully satisfying both in spirit and manner of presentation.

The second was a vivid portrayal by a high-school teacher (who also may lose a good position on account of her convictions of truth) of the methods of force so commonly used by teachers and parents in dealing with children. If instead of "killing the child" (the spirit of the child) by harshness and injustice, the teacher or parent is careful always to respect personality and inspire by love, the result will be delightfully better.

The third address was a description of methods still in use in the "Treatment of Delinquency." Having served recently on a commission appointed by President Wilson to study penal practice, especially in the South, the speaker was able to present some surprising and distressing accounts of conditions that it is hoped will give way in the near future, as the "better way" of kindness and justice advances.

The evening session on Seventh-day was given over largely to an address by Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of the New York Evening Post, on "The Spirit and Basis of the Peace Settlement for Which America Should be Preparing." Many Friends would not endorse his declaration that a protective tariff is immoral and one of the chief causes of war, but we doubt if there are many Friends capable of presenting as sound and sensible an appeal.

The spiritual climax of the Conference came, perhaps, in the meeting for worship on First-day. It was held in most respects after the manner of Friends, but was preceded by a very illuminating address on the two ideas of God presented in the Scriptures—one is the "apocalyptic idea" of omnipotence acting through cataclysmic overthrow. The other is the idea that shines out in such passages as: "He could not do many miracles because of their unbelief," or "if it be possible," or in Jeremiah's lesson from the potter's wheel,—"A God of infinite patience and perseverance dealing with refractory material." The language of the hymn, "O Love that will not let me go," was sung at the close of the address, and seemed appropriate and impressive, spreading a solemnity over the meeting as it settled into the quiet. But the silence was broken a number of times by Gospel messages (all brief) and by prayer.

The final meeting of the Conference occupied two hours of the afternoon. The announcement read thus: "The Fellowship as a Way of Life." The Chairman asked that members should tell, if they felt like it, what this Fellowship has meant to them. He then read a few extracts from a letter from J. Rendell Harris, who has survived two shipwrecks in the Mediterranean from torpedo fire. The sudden readjustment of values in the face of such disasters was presented with great vividness and power in the inimitable imagery and humor of Dr. Harris.

A young man from a training school for boys in California told in a lively manner of his experiences in trying to govern children by the old, coercive method as compared with his success since applying the Fellowship ideals of respect for personality and reliance on the power of love.

An Episcopal bishop told how much better it is to exalt the good we may find in others, than to speak of their faults. He cited some interesting experiences of his own among the Mormons in Utah.

A lady related the final chapter of a series of difficulties we had heard about at previous conferences, in connection with a disagreeable neighbor, and a lilac hedge very dear to the owner and very obnoxious to the neighbor. Good humor, great courtesy and "the second mile" had won at last. Relations now are quite satisfactory.

A girl who visited Berlin a few years ago told of a peace-loving German whose home was on Peace Street, whom she imagined might be glad to welcome any members of the Fellowship who might invade that city. A young man told us how once he had hoped that possibly, by a miracle of grace, he might, when death comes, be transported to a place of lasting bliss; but after subscribing solemnly to the principles of the Fellowship he has realized a measure of heavenly joy in this present life.

A woman told of an unpleasant occurrence on a street car in which a very angry colored woman became at once mild and apologetic when a few words of praise were expressed to her regarding her ability to cook good muffins.

A traveling man, recently from Seattle, told of a clergyman in that city who has been grossly misrepresented and injured by certain newspapers in the East. The speaker had gone to the trouble to inquire among the members of this clergyman's church regarding the charges, and had found him very highly esteemed. The judgment of the speaker was confirmed by officers of the Fellowship, who knew of the circumstance. A letter of sympathy was sent to the clergyman.

A good deal was said about the "conscientious objectors" in this country, and the diversity of treatment accorded them. A few have been court-martialed and sentenced to long imprisonment. The bureau for the defense of civil liberties is doing what they can with limited means on behalf of such unfortunate citizens.

The Conference closed with a devotional period. A hymn written by John Oxenham, under the stress of present-day persecution, was sung, an impromptu benediction was pronounced, a few moments of profound silence followed, and the company dispersed. The words of that hymn express well the ideal of the Fellowship,—

Only through Me! The clear, high call comes pealing
Above the thunders of the battle plain;
Only through Me can life's red wounds find healing;
Only through Me shall earth have peace again.

THE CANADIAN DOUKHOBORS.

Nearly twenty years have passed since Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting became particularly interested in the Russian Doukhobors. Very little of late has been written concerning these interesting people.

It will be remembered that nearly a score of years ago, on account of the hardships heaped upon them for their refusal to perform military duty, they sought, and obtained permission to leave their native land—English Friends were alert, and rendered valuable assistance.

Philadelphia Friends gave liberally of money and its equivalent, food.

Many of the Doukhobors, particularly those who had gone to Cyprus, suffered from illness. Once arrived in Western Canada, they suffered from hardships incident to pioneer life; among them the loss of crops on account of frost.

Our Friends went to visit them from time to time, to relieve distress, extend a brotherly greeting, encourage their spiritual and moral upbuilding, as well as to look after the establishment of schools.

Peter Verigin had promised that he would establish a school in each of the many villages of the new settlers, which promise was never fulfilled on his part.

Our school at Petrofka served in part at least the purpose for which it was established; and we have reason to believe that it acted as leaven, to instill in the minds of the Doukhobors a hunger for an education, which had been almost wholly denied in their native land.

This school had to be given up as the settlers mostly left its immediate neighborhood, and other District Schools were established. The Representative of our Doukhobor Committee in the Northwest, Wm. C. McCheane, of Borden, Saskatchewan, has lately made an interesting report to the Committee of a visit he made in company with Herman Fast, a former teacher at our Petrofka School: one hundred and sixty miles were covered in visiting thirteen schools; these schools had enrolled a total of two hundred and ninety Doukhobors and two hundred and seven of other nationalities.

Satisfactory progress in general seemed to be made in the schoolwork. Our Friend relates that one evening his party missed their "trail" (roads not yet being constructed) and they were lost; hearing a dog bark they finally came to a Doukhobor home where they were very well cared for. Neighbors of the same nationality were called in, and a precious religious opportunity followed. It so turned out that they were but a short distance from the school to be visited. It was felt that they were Divinely led.

Wm. C. McCheane writes as follows:—"I think it might be a blessing to the Doukhobors, etc., if Divine Infinite Love should open the hearts of one or more of His dedicated servants to visit these Doukhobors and Mennonites, who seem so anxious at this perilous time to embrace the most precious Truth, etc."

In a temporal way the Doukhobors have prospered; industrious and frugal, they have in many instances amassed considerable wealth; as evidence of this fact, comfortable, well-painted buildings, automobiles, and other material resources are to be seen in many places.

In the visit referred to, no Doukhobor seemed to need financial assistance. It should, however, be remembered that this covered but a small area; we should be glad to hear from the larger body of independent Doukhobors in British Columbia and elsewhere.

WM. B. HARVEY.

LETTER FROM ANNA J. HAINES.

Here we are almost beginning to hope that a day or two will see our arrival at Buzuluk, impossible as it seems after the many delays we have been treated to, in the last two months. I sent a postal from Vladivostok the day we landed, but I did not tell you that we had a great scare about Amelia's passport. Some little official objected to something in it, and all the bigger people were out at lunch or on a vacation or something, and although we had almost a day there we were on pins and needles all the time for fear we would be held up for a couple of weeks or more until the matter could be straightened out.

The town (Vladivostok) is very prettily situated, the hills rising steeply from the wharf, and long white churches with green domes, standing out prominently. All sorts of people congregated there; ships from all countries being in the harbor.

Mongols, with freshly-shot deer over their shoulders, wandered down the streets. We saw our first Russian wagons—basket-shaped affairs, without any springs, made entirely of wood, drawn by two horses, one of them inside the shafts with a high inverted "U," like this \cap , above its head, and the other running along more or less loose, outside. Mixed up with these were one or two automobiles (the last we have seen), people of every color, and shape of face, and soldiers everywhere. In no place have we seen them swarm as they do around these Russian stations. They seem entirely disorganized as far as military discipline is concerned; they never march in regular ranks; they will salute an officer and then go up and kiss him (it is quite all right for men to kiss each other openly in these parts). We cannot find out just where they are going, whether to the front or home, as every train in every direction is crowded with them. We have heard that Kerensky gave a two months' leave of absence to each soldier, and because of that clement policy many are now voluntarily returning to the ranks.

No one even in the larger cities knows anything really definite about conditions along the front, and we are often asked what we can give as news.

Well, finally the proper people were seen and we could proceed on our way. We had two compartments on the Trans-Siberian; one a second-class room holding four people, and one a first-class, holding two. Nancy and I have the latter, but except for the slightly greater privacy of numbers, there was little difference between them. The second-class was larger and had yellow instead of mahogany wood-work. The larger compartment was about 7 by 9 with a big window between the berths, and a washstand with running water (sometimes hot) below the window. The top to the stand made a fairly sizable table. Over the passageway, which ran along the outside of the compartments, there were huge closets which held all of our luggage except the trunks.

We pulled out from Vladivostok about ten o'clock at night, and proceeded to bed which we found comfortable and clean (with slight exception).

The next morning we visited the dining-car, which we found rather messy; lots of flies and not any good food. We soon got into the habit of getting our own luncheons and even dinners, as the train (although an express) stopped at a great many stations, and each one had long covered sheds like a market, where all sorts of food could be bought as well as free boiling water. We would skip off the train with our covered kettles, yelling "kiputok, kiputok" as loud as we could, and some obliging bystander would show us where the spigot was. (Kiputok means hot water for tea.) Then you could get roast chickens, still hot, for about sixty cents a piece. Bread, butter and fruit, with occasional tomatoes and cucumbers completed our diet. The bread was of many different colors and degrees of sourness; sometimes white and very good, sometimes black and very good, but often heavy. The butter is always unsalted, but I like it very much; we found good apples, some grapes, pears and plums. Nancy, who was our commissary department, had purchased cheese and crackers and jam, as well as tea, coffee, chocolate and condensed milk in Japan, so we fared sumptuously, and our housekeeping gave us something to do.

Siberia was most interesting, great stretches of rich prairie land, just waiting for somebody to come farm it. All the generations of my ancestors rose up within me, and I fairly itched to get off the train and buy a farm. Wherever these fields had been planted there was a fine crop of every thing (weeds included). There was a great deal more machinery visible than in Russia proper, and every one tells us that Siberia by herself could work out a republican government very easily, if she was not held back by the ignorant masses in the old country.

The farmers are comparatively rich and well educated; in fact, at most of the stops one could well imagine one's self at Maple Shade (as we used to see it) or Masonville, N. J.

The women wear a loose shirtwaist hanging outside the skirt, and buttoned in the back, usually, with kerchiefs on their heads. The men dress just about like our up-country farmers at home—always with considerable beard.

The towns were rather a disappointment, as most of them grew so far back from the station of the same name that we could not stop long enough to see them. Irkutsk was the largest, and I am sending some postals of the kinds of houses and churches we saw there.

The Lake Baikal region is beautiful, with mountains coming right down to the water's edge, and the railroad's bed blasted out of solid rock for long distances. It was built by exiles for the most part and represents unknown amounts of human suffering. All along the line are groves of white birch trees, planted by the railroad officials to supply fuel for the engines, which burn wood. The sparks fly past the windows of the train like pinwheels, and often fall lighted into our compartments.

We have arrived by now at Buzuluk, but I won't take time to describe what it is like until the next mail, as it is already after twelve and the mail goes out at six a. m. tomorrow. I hope you received our cablegram safely. We are all well and happy—at least I guess the rest are, as we are already separated. Nancy is attempting to do nursing work, although she says, "her best friends never want to see her when they are sick." Amelia F. is to do nursing also and the rest of us more or less relief work. It is a work-room with spinning and weaving, and embroidery for me, about one hundred and seventy women.

A. J. H.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

I have been here now for a week, the latter half of which has been very rainy. The rain has found out all the shell holes in the roof, and I have spent to-day in trying to patch up the roof, with very poor results so far, as every room except the stable and the woodshed leak. We have got most of the windows glazed with oiled linen and a few panes of glass, and stoves are set up in every room. Day before yesterday, we had a very impressive ceremony laying a cornerstone in the first building we had set out to repair—the school-house. The people are very anxious to have it fixed up, for the children have had no schooling for three years. The Maire was present and read an impressive account of the occasion, stating that after the war the council had decided to put up a tablet stating that the building had been repaired by "La Société des Amis." We put a copy of his decree or "Proces verbal" signed by every one present—we six, the Maire, three or four old men, half a dozen women and the only boy who was not too bashful to sign his name—an American cent, an English penny and a French sou contributed by the Maire, in a tin box and the Maire impressively laid it in a hole in the wall which was then bricked over.

We can not get anyone to cook for us and we take the job in turn for three days at a time. I have just finished my turn for lunch and dinner and am working on breakfast now. It really went very easily. I managed to make a brown betty, which was greeted with great enthusiasm, as the English had never seen one and were very tired of milk pudding of various sorts, rice, macaroni, spaghetti, noodle, etc., etc., which have very much of a sameness.

There is a plan to start a new station for repairing farm machinery which was thoroughly and systematically smashed by the Germans. They even broke the spokes of all the carts.

I don't know whether I told thee how this country is dotted with German graves. We have two buried in our front yard and in the midst of fields everywhere are one or two graves with crosses over them which the French respect in cultivating. On our way here we passed a small grave-yard entirely built, laid out by, and filled with Germans with an elaborate fence and monuments. In front of the Maire's house here there lies a French soldier with a German inscription over him.

We now have eighteen men working around the village here—five English and thirteen Americans. The English hardly knew what to make of our boisterousness when the larger part of our outfit arrived, but they are getting used to us and I think we shall settle down together very amicably. We shall eat together in the house I described in one of my earlier letters, but seven Americans are living in a little two-room cottage at one end of the village and three of the English have very comfortable quarters about half underground, where some of the German officers lived or slept when they were here. It is roofed with arches of corrugated iron in large semi-circles which rest on the ground and the rest of the room is dug out of the ground. It is all nicely boarded up inside and the roof is covered with earth, perhaps as a disguise or a protection against shrapnel. This is in our garden about a half dozen steps from the back door.

We have breakfast at seven; start work at eight; stop at twelve for lunch; begin at one; work to five and have dinner at six. We generally go to bed about 9.30. There are four of us in my bed-room.

For the last two days I have been patching a tile roof which is so old and rotten that it will hardly bear the weight of a ladder, and I have learned how to tile if I can't do it very fast yet. I only put on two patches of old tile from the barn, two-thirds of which we pulled down, it being unsafe. I have often watched the cleaning and piling of old brick around Philadelphia and never thought I should be doing it myself, but this afternoon I have put in sorting brick and stacking the good ones. I am afraid I didn't work very hard though, for about 4:30 P. M., George Downing, who is here with some agricultural works, asked us in to afternoon tea and we, of course, fell into the temptation. We are still working at the school-house, but it has been repaired enough for them to hold school in one of its three rooms. Our jobs elsewhere are scattered around and some of them are demolishing or wrecking destroyed houses and saving slate, tiles and timber for use in repairing the other houses that are not so badly wrecked.

We still have to do our cooking, which is a pretty serious job for eighteen people, especially as our stove is not big enough or hot enough to do our work. We manage, however, to have pretty good meals, although I haven't tried my 'prentice hand on cooking for eighteen yet. We are, I am afraid, going to be pretty cold here this winter.

We haven't made much impression yet on the work to be done, but I think that our presence here has cheered up the people considerably. They are already speaking to us more pleasantly, and must be beginning to appreciate that we shall be able to make them more comfortable. I wish there were some way to supply their needs. The Germans have certainly made a thorough job of smashing things up. They hacked off the wheels of the carts; filled wells with manure and filth; destroyed stoves and house furniture and left the houses hardly habitable. I am beginning to appreciate what it means to have a roof over me after sleeping through several rains with the water trickling down the walls and from two or three spots in the ceiling so the beds had to be placed scientifically to avoid the deluge. Last night we had a long rain and slept dry and comfortable under the patchwork roof Jenkins and I put on. We shall be lucky if we get through the winter with some of the paper still on.

We have just finished a most filling and sumptuous repast of boiled beans, pumpkin soup, onions and rice pudding, with tea and coffee. I ate the same soup plate full of soup, once of beans, and onions twice, and a little rice pudding. It was a good night for our vegetarian members, for two of the Englishmen were of that persuasion. In fact, we have meatless days rather frequently, for we can't buy meat here, but have to go three miles to find it. Of course, we have "bully" beef or corned beef in tins from Chicago and also oleomargarine.

J. H. H.

SEEN AND HEARD AT CAMP MEADE.

"Captain, Quakers don't throw bombs."

This declaration, coupled with the refusal to don an army uniform, was all that was needed to cause the speaker's transfer to the group of conscientious objectors at Camp Meade, Maryland. No one asked to see his "Form 104," and it was not shown.

History is being made at Camp Meade. Partly with a desire to understand it better, largely with a desire to express our sympathy for some of those who are taking part in it,—four of us, upon Alfred Steer's invitation, left Lansdowne at five o'clock on First-day morning, Twelfth Month 1st. The 100 miles to Baltimore were traveled by ten o'clock. Thence by way of the Washington Boulevard, we passed through Elkridge and Waterloo, where we turned upon a less perfect road, crossing the railroad at Jessup. A welcome stop for lunch by the roadside, overlooking a pine-studded valley, bounded by a low range of purple hills, delayed us only a little more than the extremely rough road that formed the last three miles of our journey.

The appearance of military police stationed at a cross-road indicated that we had reached Camp Meade. The site is a shallow valley about seven miles long and four miles wide, formed by gently rolling hills, some of them still covered with native pines and oaks. These remaining "monarchs" are being pulled out bodily by means of tractors and almost as quickly converted into fire-wood. No doubt the former owners were glad to exchange their half-wooded farms of light sandy gravel for other and more fertile acres.

About one-half mile inside the Camp we parked our car among the hundreds that had preceded us, and inquired the way to "BB-13." Our road lay between long rows of one and two-story buildings, their clean, unpainted clapboards and felt paper roofs glistening in the sun.

On the gentle slope of a hill we found the two two-story barracks and the mess-hall assigned to the exclusive use of the 137 conscientious objectors. Those in whom we were especially interested were about to go to dinner and at their invitation we followed them. The long hall had been tastefully decorated with scarlet oak leaves, holly and mistletoe, which, with the abundance of good food, suggested a continuance of Thanksgiving Day.

The life of the men much resembles that at a boarding-school, except that there are no lessons and no "socials." The five sergeants, captain and two lieutenants in charge of the men have learned that great vigilance is unnecessary to assure good order; even roll calls have been omitted for days at a time. The men have a good degree of freedom in the immediate neighborhood of their "home," but are expected to ask permission (freely given) for more distant walks, and are always accompanied by two officers on their regular exercise "hikes." A favorite sport is rabbit hunting by the primitive method of surrounding the quarry and catching it by hand. One day's hunt netted four rabbits.

The dormitory life is far from unhappy. The barracks are light and airy and about as clean and orderly as young men want them to be. Iron cots are the principal furniture, but one of the men has built a writing table and several chairs with "table-arms." Shelves line the walls, their contents a possible indication of the proprietors' several tastes. The Friends' library included such titles as "For a Free Conscience," "Basic Ideas in Religion," "The Church and the New World Order," "Political Ideals," "The Practice of Christianity" and the "Discipline."

Permission to hold a religious meeting was readily granted by the officer of the day, and a general invitation was verbally extended. The calm serenity of a Friends' meeting seemed an anomaly in the centre of a conscript army camp and we could but feel grateful for the degree of official tolerance that made it possible. As we sat in silence about forty non-Friends joined the group and were attentive to the convincing words expressed by Samuel Jones on the omnipotence of Divine love.

Who are those 137 wholesome-looking young fellows who have declined to perform any kind of military service? They represent no less than twenty-eight religious and social cults. Only ten of the men are Friends; many who might otherwise be there were already in France with the Reconstruction Unit. Dunkards lead in numbers with forty-two sturdy young men, mostly farmers, but the Mennonite Churches follow closely with a total of thirty-eight. Of this number, twenty-two are of the largest body; seven are styled New Mennonites, said to be more modern in views and practices than the others; four are Brethren in Christ, Methodist in organization; four are of the Amish Church, and one of the Church of God in Christ. The one Old German Baptist is allied to the Dunkards and the two River Brethren to the Mennonites. There are four Seventh-day Adventists, one of them a Baltimore colored man who still busily plies his trade as boot-black and is well liked by the officers. Other religious organizations represented are: Assembly of God, Russelites, Reform Church, Christians, Brotherhood of Mystics, Pentacostal Brethren and United Evangelical. There are also two members of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. The fourteen Socialists include Jews, Roman Catholics and Lutherans. Two men base their objections on vegetarian principles; one is a member of the I. W. W. and one is a Sinn Feiner.

Perhaps never before have men representing so many radically different points of view united on conscientious grounds in a definite, personal protest against taking any part in war. Really to know all these men would be a broad education.

Though despised by the militarists, generally because not understood, they may have among them the light that shall enlighten the world. Let it shine!

FRANCIS R. BACON.

LANSDOWNE, PA.

NEWS ITEMS.

GILBERT and Minnie Bowles will speak at Atlantic City on the afternoon and evening of the 12th, at Lansdowne the evening of the 13th, at a Tea Meeting at Haverford on the 14th. They expect to be at Medford the week-end of the 15th and will attend Cropwell meeting on First-day.

THE FRIENDS' CARD CALENDAR for 1918 is now for sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street—price 6 cents each, by mail 16 cents.

The Friends' Religious and Moral Almanac for 1918 is also ready—price 6 cents each, with paper cover 8 cents. Add 1 cent for postage.

WESTTOWN NOTES have mentioned a movement to give the domestic education at the School more suitable sleeping and sanitary accommodations. Many decided improvements have been made for the women and are now within reach for the men by the liberal gift of $5000 for that purpose.

DR. J. RENDEL HARRIS has accepted an important appointment in connection with the John Rylands Library, Manchester, which is to take effect next summer. It is understood that this will involve his removal from Selly Oak, Birmingham, to Manchester or its immediate neighborhood. The loss to Birmingham Friends will be the gain of Friends in Lancashire.

The Yearly Meeting's Educational Committee has received a second gift of $5000 for the furtherance of its work. We trust this $10,000 nucleus is the promise of better things to be in our elementary school work. The liberal endowment of our colleges has been fraught with great good, but even this good has at times been definitely limited by the very inadequate resources of preparatory work.

THROUGH the kind offices of Dr. Frederic Lynch we have in hand the Women's Number of The American Scandinavian Review. This review is one line of the work of the American-Scandinavian Foundation, of which we heard in these pages so interestingly from the Secretary, Henry Goddard Leach. For constructive Peace work the idea of the Foundation is certainly far-reaching. The intrinsic merits of this bi-monthly magazine are unusual. We should think Friends would be most glad to become subscribers. The yearly subscription of $1.50 seems little more than nominal.—Eds.

It is understood that the T. Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College will offer a course of lectures this winter in Philadelphia, to which those interested will be freely welcomed. We hope for details later, but can now announce that the first lecture is arranged for S. F. M., on Twelfth Month 21st, at Friends' Select School. John Bates Clark, of the Department of Political Economy of Columbia University, will open the course.

THERE has come to hand a little recent information relative to the company of Friends at Fairhope, Alabama. It appears to be a growing community, there being forty-five or more resident members who attend the meeting, besides a considerable number of winter visitors. A Preparative Meeting was established there not long ago as a part of Stillwater Monthly Meeting, Ohio. We are informed that a Friends' school is also being conducted at Fairhope.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE FOR THE WEEK ENDING TWELFTH MONTH 8, 1917.

Amount reported last week	$232,201.59
Received from 22 meetings	7,001.30
Received from 7 individuals	481.00
Received for Armenian and Syrian Relief	156.63

$239,839.92

CHARLES F. JENKINS,
Treasurer.

ABOUT nine months ago Mansaka Nakamura, a Friend and Christian worker in Tsuburira, Japan, came to this country for study to become acquainted with American Friends. He attended Whittier College, California, for one term, Friends' University, Kansas, for a short time and Earlham College for three months. He expects to be at the Woolman School for a while. He is very desirous of attending Friends' meetings in the East and of knowing members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Anyone wishing to communicate with him should address him at the Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa., or address Walter W. Haviland, Friends' Select School, who will keep in touch with him.

A WEEK-END Pilgrimage will be held in West Chester, on the 15th and 16th, under the auspices of a joint Committee of young Friends.

In High Street Meeting-house, Seventh-day evening, at eight o'clock, will be given an illustrated lecture by J. Henry Scattergood and William B. Harvey, subject, "Formation and Work of the Reconstruction Unit in France."

On First-day, at three o'clock, will be held a meeting in Chestnut Street Meeting-house, subject, "Present Day Demands Upon Friends;" speakers, Anne G. Walton, Barnard Walton, Luella Jones and James G. Vail.

Friends from a distance having notified Elizabeth H. Hicks, or Emma H. Taylor (West Chester) of their coming will be entertained at supper, at 6.30 Seventh-day evening, at High Street Meeting-house, and cared for over night. Come and enjoy this occasion.

EXTRACT FROM ESTHER RHOADS' LETTER TO THE Y. W. AUXILIARY.—My week-ends are left free so that I can visit country meetings. Last week I went up to Mito to see Edith Sharpless. The train ride, about ninety miles, takes four hours, and I had plenty of time to look at the scenery. The rice was just being harvested and the men working in it were very picturesque. At Mito station I said, "Sharpless,"—the Japanese make all "i's" into "r's," and a smiling bow-legged jirikishian trotted me off to Edith's home. She lives in a Japanese house with two lovely girl graduates of the school. One has a kindergarten in the morning and the other helps in Bible teaching. I visited two First-day schools and went to meeting on First-day. The First-day schools are well attended, the one in the meeting-house having over one hundred children who attend quite regularly. The other school was held in the home of a non-Christian and thirty-five boys and girls sang hymns under the "god shell". The parents like their children go to the First-day school. They find it makes them better.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

(Concluded from page 298.)

CAMP JACKSON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—Except in one case Friends at Camp Jackson have not taken the stand that they could not perform any service under the military and have kept on the army uniform. They have been performing various duties and have not been segregated. One man who from the first very absolutely refused on conscientious grounds to perform any service or put on the uniform was not punished, and finally, on his asking for permission to go home and help with the crops, was given a leave of absence for a month. Many Friends from Camp Jackson have been transferred to Camp Sevier, where they are receiving much the same treatment as before their removal.

CAMP LEE, VIRGINIA.—There are but three Friends at Camp Lee so far as we know. Only one of these has taken a firm stand on conscientious grounds against performing service under the military.

CAMP LEWIS, TACOMA, WASHINGTON.—Friends at Camp Lewis have in almost all cases accepted some service under the military authorities. They have not been segregated, though this would probably have been done if they on conscientious grounds had not been able to perform such service. One Friend who has been performing service and wearing most of the uniform has been brought east with his company, and he is expecting to be sent to France. Another Friend who has taken a much firmer stand and has refused to put on the uniform was on that account left at Camp Lewis when his company came east.

CAMP MEADE, MARYLAND.—There are now at Camp Meade over 135 conscientious objectors who have been segregated and, though held under guard, are not persecuted for refusing to put on the uniform. Of this number eight are Friends. The first Friends who went to camp refused on conscientious grounds as soon as they reached camp to put on the uniform or to perform any duties. They were promptly segregated and have since then had little or no difficulty with the officers. There are four Friends who have not taken the stand and are performing various duties.

CAMP SHERMAN, OHIO.—At Camp Sherman there is a group of conscientious objectors who have refused to perform all service or wear the uniform. They are segregated and have not received due consideration by the officers. On several occasions their beds have been taken for the use of the soldiers. Only three of these are Friends. The few other Friends so far have been performing duties in various lines of service under the military, mostly in the hospitals.

CAMP TAYLOR, KENTUCKY.—There are over 104 conscientious objectors at Camp Taylor, who are segregated and well organized. . . . Of this group about twenty are Friends, who have taken the stand against all military service. Some of these men before taking the stand had put on the uniform. Recently the officers have realized the inconsistency of a man who refuses to perform any service under the military wearing the army uniform, and have now taken away the uniform from all the conscientious objectors.

CAMP TRAVIS, TEXAS.—There are very few Friends at Camp Travis. These Friends are part of a company consisting of 61 conscientious objectors who have been performing certain service under the military authority. Recently they decided they could not continue to so serve and presented a statement to the officers of their company of their opposition to war in any form. Volunteers for a new branch of the army for non-combatants to be known as the "Public Utility Branch" were then called for by the officers. Only six men volunteered, whereupon the conscientious objectors were taken to headquarters and severely talked to by the general. Forty-seven out of the sixty-one reported that they could not conscientiously perform any service under military control. Their names were taken and their action reported to Washington. Their captain stated later that the officers wanted to know what the conscientious objectors' position was, and was glad that a clear stand had been taken by them. These forty-seven men have since prepared and signed a statement which reads in part as follows:

"We, the undersigned, being conscientious objectors to participation in war in any form, and belonging to religious societies whose principles forbid its members taking any part whatsoever in military service, do hereby protest against being held under military control, and do hereby request that we be discharged."

To this was added a statement of the principles of Friends, Dunkards and Mennonites in reference to war. They feel that this course of action has been helpful and suggest that conscientious objectors in other camps take similar action.

It appears that Friends who are in camp are coming more and more clearly to the conclusion that to perform any service no matter how seemingly harmless, which is under military control, makes them a part of the great military machine. Many who at first yielded to the tremendous pressure of the army and were almost before they realized it drawn into the service, have since had to refuse on conscientious grounds to continue to perform such service, though they are ready and eager to make sacrifices commensurate with those of their fellow-men who have from a sense of duty as they see it entered the army. If the government will only allow them to perform for their country and mankind services which they can conscientiously render, they will rejoice.

F. ALGERNON EVANS,
Assistant Secretary.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

Letters from our workers in France—some of the writers have asked that their names be not published, and we are thus making them anonymous.

RELIEF WORK UNDER FIRE FROM SIX RAIDS.

TENTH MONTH 21, 1917.

A week ago—the morning after I last wrote—I crawled out of bed at 3 A. M. and blundered down to the station in the dark. All French cities are in darkness at night now because of the dangers of air raids. Then ensued a long ride in a second class compartment filled with snoring poils. A little after noon I reached the town to which I had been sent and learned the reason of my coming. The town—it is best not to name it—had recently become the objective of German air raids and was already partly demolished. My job was to help the English Friends already stationed there to make some provision for refugees who had no friends or relatives to whom they could go.

With this end in view I was sent out by motor, in the afternoon, with an old French (migrité) and a little English social worker, to the Château from which I am now writing. Our task was to make it habitable, and when I tell you that it had not been occupied for forty years prior to the war, but had then been used successively by German and French troops and by a French field hospital, you can see we had our work cut out for us. Floors were littered with straw and filth, fire-places pried open in the hope of finding hidden money, furniture demolished for fire-wood, cartridges driven into the walls for pegs, closets piled with discarded gas masks, uniforms and unspeakable bandages, and about the whole building was such an air of ruined dignity and utter desolation as it is hard to conceive of. The car that had brought us out had returned at once, cutting us off from communication with the outside world. The afternoon's work was a rather gruesome one, and by evening the nerves of both the women were pretty well on edge. After supper the English girl became afraid of the rats, the old French woman broke down in tears and sobbed out the long tale of her woe, exclaiming between every other sentence, "C'est la guerre, oh, c'est la guerre!" and I had to sleep on the floor where the rats came up and winked their whiskers in my face.

Since that night, though, everything has been going splendidly. I requisitioned ten cats from neighboring farm-houses to rid the place of rats, and, by now, it has become quite habitable.

RELIEF WORK AT TROYES, FRANCE.

ELEVENTH MONTH 12, 1917.

It is no easy task to interview a weeping woman with a crying baby in her arms and to find out from the mother's Belgian French just how she is lodged, what sources of income she has, what sort of work she is able to do, and to decide, sometimes on the instant, what you can do for her.

It is interesting work and most of the people who come to us are of a pretty fine sort. On market days, the greater part of them are country folk—plain, honest, rosy-faced old men and women who want us to supply them with a little furniture or bedding on easy terms so that they can make a start at getting a new home together. Their courage, and that of the women especially, is a thing to wonder at.

This afternoon I saw an officer being decorated with the Médaille Militaire and the Croix de guerre for bravery in battle; but while the band played and the regiment presented arms, I wondered if the officer, so proud of his new medals and their bright ribbons, was any more deserving of the "gratitude of France" than the scores of women who come into our office every week—women whose homes have been destroyed, whose husbands or sons are prisoners, wounded, killed or, almost worse, reported "missing," and who struggle on to make a home for themselves and the remnant of a family that they still have.

CLOTHING DEPARTMENT.

LETTERS FROM ABROAD ABOUT CLOTHING SHOULD BE SENT TO 20 S. TWELFTH STREET.

Will all Friends who have letters from Ethel Ashby, or from other workers abroad, which contain information in regard to clothing, directions for making garments, etc., kindly forward them immediately to Rebecca Carter, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

Letters will be carefully handled and returned to the senders promptly if desired.

TRAINED NURSES NEEDED.

Russia.—A cable has just been received from English Friends in Russia, asking for three nurses, members of the Society of Friends. Experts agree that it will be entirely safe for women to travel at this time. Lack of knowledge of the language is not an obstacle. Those who wish to be of the greatest service in this time will wish to go where the need is greatest.

France.—Two nurses needed for new hospital under Dr. J. A. Babbitt, at Smaize.

DIED.—At her home in Chester Hill, Ohio, Eleventh Month 7, 1917, SARAH P. TODD, widow of Elihu Todd, in the eighty-second year of her age, a member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

—On the fourth of Twelfth Month, 1917, at Haddonfield, N. J., ESTHER G. EVANS, aged seventy-eight years; a member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends.

FOUNDED 1865.

THE PROVIDENT
LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY

OF PHILADELPHIA

Insurance is Protection—Insurance is Saving—Insurance Establishes an Estate.

How can a man begin better than by taking a practical Provident policy?

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER

S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.
COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: } LOCUST 243
 } RACB 661

WISSAHICKON INN
REDLANDS,
CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds.
Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address
A. B. JOHNSON.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER and GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2066.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education. Board of Managers from both branches of Friends. Courses in Old and New Testament, Church History, History and Doctrines of Friends, Missions, First-day School Organization, Social Betterment, International Organization, History of Religion, Comparative Religion, and allied subjects. :: :: ::

Instruction by scholarly experts from the faculties of Haverford and Swarthmore Colleges, and from other educational, social, and religious institutions of Philadelphia and vicinity.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

SWARTHMORE, PA.

ELBERT RUSSELL, Director.

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family Home of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A.M. Any other time by arrangement only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila., & Reading R.R.

ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

W. J. MacWaters

Let Me

Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic - - - Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundrah Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD made from the entire whole grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Your child needs a

SHETLAND PONY

to ride, drive, and grow up with.

HARTZELL BROTHERS, SEBASTIAN, OHIO.

ESTABLISHED 1883.

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50

1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

By freight or express, F. O. Orders.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,

COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

WANTED—BY A LARGE MACHINERY AND supply house controlled by Friends, a strong, active man, say between thirty and forty years, who has had a mechanical or technical education, and who has had some experience in selling and managing men. A member of Friends preferred, but would consider a man of strong Christian character of another denomination. Apply to "THE FRIEND", stating age, experience, present salary and employment, whether married or single, education, etc.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO enl-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolley.
Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—BY AN EFFICIENT AND WELL-REcommended married man of 31 years, exempt, a position in mechanical line, with a firm of Friends or other Christian denomination.
Address, care of "THE FRIEND",
207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—IN THE J. LEWIS CROGER HOSPITAL, Chestnut, Pa. (on 10th young woman of good character, between the ages of 19 and 25, in the training school, giving a general training. Special work given in diseases of children. Location of hospital good, grounds covering forty acres; comfortable home life for nurses.
Apply to HOSPITAL, S. K. Uebl, Superintendent.

Flexible Flyer

The famous Steering Sled with non-skid runners.

Outlasts 3 ordinary sleds
Nine sizes, 3 to 8½ feet long. Sold by hardware and department stores.

FREE OFFER:
Send for cardboard model showing how Flexible Flyers steer.

Unless it bears this trademark it isn't a Flexible Flyer.

S. L. Allen & Co. Box A 711 Philadelphia

WILLIAM S. YARNALL MANUFACTURING OPTICIAN

128 SOUTH SIXTEENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY MANUFACTURERS PHILADELPHIA

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped, prompt and efficient

321 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO. CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

THIS trusty man is applying Rhoads Preserver to a Rhoads Belt working in the Rhoads factory, thereby keeping down the cost of Rhoads products. It pays to use Rhoads Leather Belt Preserver.

J. E. RHOADS & SONS

PHILADELPHIA: 12 N. THIRD ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.

NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
BALTIMORE AGENCY: 37 S. CHARLES ST.
FACTORY and TANNERY: WILMINGTON, DEL.

GIRARD TRUST CO. BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian, Administrator, Assignee and Receiver. Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults. Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
1714 SANSOM STREET

Engraving and Printing

FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY

Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting Cards, Die Stamped Writing Paper

TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

JOSEPH G. FOGG FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH and RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE LOCUST 1648

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1571.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 20, 1917.

No. 25.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSTHEE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 DAVIS H. FORSTHEE,
 MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

FOR THE CHURCH.

O God, we pray for Thy Church, which is set to-day amid the perplexities of a changing order, and face to face with a great new task. We remember with love the nurture she gave to our spiritual life in its infancy, the tasks she set for our growing strength, the influence of the devoted hearts she gathers, the steadfast power for good she has exerted. When we compare her with all other human institutions, we rejoice, for there is none like her. But when we judge her by the mind of her Master, we bow in pity and contrition. Oh, baptize her afresh in the life-giving spirit of Jesus! Grant her a new birth, though it be with the travail of repentance and humiliation. Bestow upon her a more imperious responsiveness to duty, a swifter compassion with suffering, and an utter loyalty to the will of God. Put upon her lips the ancient gospel of her Lord. Help her to proclaim boldly the coming of the Kingdom of God and the doom of all that resist it. Fill her with the prophet's scorn of tyranny, and with a Christ-like tenderness for the heavy-laden and down-trodden. Give her faith to espouse the cause of the people, and in their hands that grope after freedom and light to recognize the bleeding hands of the Christ. Bid her cease from seeking her own life, lest she lose it. Make her valiant to give up her life to humanity, that like her crucified Lord she may mount by the path of the cross to a higher glory.—Prayers of the Social Awakening, by WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH; selected by ANNA RHOADS LADD.

KINDLY DEEDS.

My thoughts go back to the days of childhood when at the knee of a gentle-voiced and since sainted mother I learned this childish verse:—

When 'ere I take my walks abroad,
How many poor I see,
What shall I render to my God
For all His gifts to me?

To many who walk or motor through the fashionable shopping districts of our cities, such simple rhyme may almost seem absurd. The men and women are expensively clad. Not a few of them live in a little world of their own. The shop windows are resplendent with beautiful things. The façades of the handsome buildings tell of material wealth and comfort. Who thinks of the poor? Where are they? Do they exist?

They are everywhere. Possibly only one block distant—up rickety steps—in dreary holes in the wall, or down in dirty cellars can be found people who are literally without hope and without God in the world. Hungry mothers, starving babies, consumptive men, ill-clad children struggle for existence. They do not really live—they exist and cringe. Cruel economic and social conditions, possibly the mistakes or sins of others, may be their own errors or vices have condemned them to penury and tears. They have suffering bodies and stolid brains. Have we no duty toward them? Are they not God's children? Will He not measure the genuineness of our love for Him by our pity and willingness to help them?

Most of us recline on comfortable beds every night and awake refreshed each morning because our bodies have been relaxed and warm. Do we remember the millions of our fellow-creatures in all the continents who every night lie down in chill and misery? Do we know that they are very often forced to be content with only enough cash in hand to purchase the coming meal? Do we fully appreciate that judicious and sympathetic application of money can bring great solace to despairing souls? Do we understand the rich blessing to ourselves when we make the widow's heart sing for joy? If giving to the poor means lending to the Lord it unquestionably signifies that God is a superb debtor. Have we faith to believe this? How does He prove it?

Let us test the possibilities of human happiness by more generously depleting our bank accounts for the service of others. The heart that beats in harmony with the calls of God's needy children is the happy heart. It responds to the swing of the beautiful song of Love that Jesus teaches. It is the heart that proves its affection for God by loving its brother also.

SAN JOSÉ, California.

WM. C. ALLEN.

WORDS AS WEAPONS.

The newspapers make note of the fact that the President's message to Congress on the 4th has had a range of approval little short of phenomenal. Such antipodal points of view as are represented by Theodore Roosevelt and Scott Nearing, by Lords Lansdowne and Northcliffe seem to be mediated in this very remarkable document. Perhaps it is true that the moral and spiritual ideals of democracy were never more forcefully expressed. All certainly must admire the generous spirit of magnanimity which the address breathes. Those who are convinced that this spirit can only be maintained in the world by religious processes, can nevertheless rejoice in the outspokenness of the President for the ideals themselves.

There are other considerations of hopefulness in the character of the address that appeal to the religious point of view that Friends have been called upon to maintain with more or less faithfulness for two hundred and fifty years. Chief amongst these considerations is the fact that the President, and apparently a great world of public opinion that responds sympathetically to the President, have not lost faith entirely in the "word rightly spoken." If an address like this can reconcile such diverse views, as those held by the men named above, who can measure its possible reconciling effect? As suggested in some of the newspaper comment, it may open the eyes of the Central Powers to insist upon a cessation of the present ruinous conflict. If such a happy result is not attained can we resist the inference that the power of words (i. e., of conference) has not even yet been exhausted? There must be a saving remnant of reason and of mercy in Germany and Austria. This remnant can not wholly resist such appeals as the President has made and may yet make. As the noble sentiments of the address become known in these quarters, many will be heartened and such a remnant will surely grow and in the end, we trust, become "a saving remnant."

So while the nation and the President are fully committed to means of bringing the desired ends to pass which on religious grounds we cannot accept, it is some grain of comfort that methods we do approve are still recognized and so ably used. There is another view of this fact, however, that it may be wholesome for us to entertain, even though it may be humiliating to us.

The Gospel method in the dispensation of grace became a method of the "Word made flesh." No tongue ever can portray all that this involved in the work of redemption so wrought out for us. What He did for us without us, is beyond the furthest reach of our human understanding. It all has an infinite side as He is infinite in knowledge and in power. He Himself exhorted us to accept His pattern in seeking conformity to the Divine will. "Be ye perfect even as I am perfect." His spirit in us would point the way to this high attainment. We must incarnate the measure of "Christ formed in us" as an expression of His continuing life in the world. Had all nominal Christians done this more perfectly the present world situation had been impossible. Our failure is the failure to respond completely to this in-shining word. Too many of us are open to the condemnation recorded in John v: 42. This is how Weymouth translates it, "I know you well, and I know that in your hearts you do not really love God."

So our failure to respond completely to the living Word should at least teach us two things. First, so long as we thus fail we fall far short of being the instruments of peace in the world that we are called to be. The failure of the church is just the sorry sum of the individual failures to which we thus contribute daily. Second, our difficulty in responding fully to the living Word should make us patient and slow to condemn a lagging world in its reception of the plainest words of political and international freedom. Such words become weapons but often by a slow process. It seems to us at times quite inexplicable that powerful leaders should resist such plain principles as the "winged" words of the President express. But the Son of Man, even in our own little personal world of will and of life, still stands pleading with us most pathetically, "I would and ye would not." The world difficulty may be disclosed to us in our own failures to respond to what we even name "the all powerful Word."

J. H. B.

INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIANITY.

MAX I. REICH.

At the recent gathering at Fourth and Arch Streets to hear Dr. Frederick Lynch, Secretary of the Church Peace Union, on "The World After the War," and Norman Angell, the English author and journalist of world-wide reputation, on "Plans For An Inter-Allied Conference," we were told that a partnership of nations must supplant the present rivalry; that we must learn to think internationally, and that we ought to encourage rather than suppress public discussion of these questions, so that we may be ready with a definite policy when the peace conference assembles. We were reminded of our own fundamental principle that the peace question is an ethical and not a mere political proposition, and that there must come an end to the double standard of ethics in the world, one for the individual and one for the nation; that the doctrine of rights is a modern cure, and that if we looked after our duties, our rights would look after themselves; that it is easier to organize a successful war than a true peace, and that when victory has crowned the present prodigious efforts of the Allies, that victory will be misused unless we can help public opinion, even as the Vienna Congress largely nullified the costly sacrifices made during the long campaign against Napoleon: that not only has the dynastic principle broken down, but that of nationalism also, and that the principle of internationality is the only sound basis for an enduring peace.

Now it is the great witness of history that no nation can rise any higher politically than it has attained religiously. The foreign policy of Ahaz and his counsellors was bad because they lacked the knowledge of God; and that what the soul is to the body the Church is to the State, the sickness of the Church inevitably breaking out into open sores in the country, whether the Church meddles with politics or not. So that in an hour of national crisis we need the heaven-taught prophet no less than the sagacious statesman to lead us in the way.

The principle of internationalism, which is the undoubted way out of the present confusion which the precarious maintenance of the balance of power has only covered up, must first be realized by the Church as a fundamental Christian principle. International Christianity alone can lead the way into the brotherhood of nations on the grand basis of international co-operation. And for this we need no new revelation, for it is the ancient doctrine of the primitive Church. It is the program of the Master, as expressed in John xvii: "That they all may be one . . . that the world may know." The apostle Paul rings the changes on this glorious doctrine of the oneness of all believers in Christ, whether they be Jews or Greeks, and we may add, British or German, American or Japanese. The Cross breaks down every dividing wall, and in the Spirit all are builded together into one holy temple, the living body of Christ on earth to-day.

I am aware that wherever you go in Christendom—Roman, Greek, Anglican, Lutheran or Calvinist—all repeat the so-called Apostles' Creed: "I believe in the holy catholic church." But when the test came at the outbreak of the war their faith was found a mere dead formula, for it was not justified by works. Where was that one catholic (i. e., universal) church then? Men were Germans, Russians, British first, and Christians after, even though not all went so far as to put the cloak of militarism on the silent Jesus, as the Roman soldiers did long ago. Christ means His church to be catholic in the true sense, an international community, bound together and vitalized by the one Spirit, the organism of His operations, His Body by which He expresses Himself on the earth, the spiritual extension of His Incarnation to the end of the world. The history of our times would have been very different if this international Christianity had asserted itself. The unseen yet very present Christ would have spoken to the passion and panic of the nations out of this, His temple: Peace, be still! as He did when He rebuked the angry winds and waves.

And yet Christianity has not broken down—Christendom has. Her boasted civilization is largely Babylon, and this war is the same voice speaking to a fallen and divided Church which once spoke to apostate Jerusalem: "Take away her battlements, for they are not the Lord's."

And when we come closer home and search our own hearts, we who by birthright or conviction form part of that movement which William Penn called "Primitive Christianity revived"; are we to-day the people to gather the multitudes into that life in which alone the world can find healing and harmony? How much house-cleaning awaits us also? We, too, may have to descend into "the valley of Achor," the place of self-judgment, to find "the door of hope." A humbled and penitent people, waiting upon the Lord only, can alone be the vessels of testimony in the world after the war.

Nevertheless, the still, small voice will have the last word, even though those who make it their only Teacher and Guide in this day of storm, earthquake and fire are a despised minority. We hold with the seers of ancient Israel that "He shall judge between the nations, and decide concerning many peoples"; that at the last peace-conference He will be the acknowledged Head and secure universal disarmament; that when men are ready to listen "He will speak peace to the nations," and they will say: "This Man shall be our peace." "He maketh wars to cease to the ends of the earth. . . . Be still and know that I am God: I will be exalted in the earth, I will be exalted among the nations."

But if we can hasten the coming of that day, we can retard it also.

LETTERS FROM PARVIN M. RUSSELL.

[We are indebted to the family of Parvin Russell for these somewhat intimate letters. Like some others we are permitted to print, not their least charm is the fact that they are written in a personal style without thought of publication. In our paper it is only the family circle that is enlarged, as the writers are so well known to practically all of our readers.—Eds.]

Tenth Month 22, 1917.

TO A FRIEND:—

To-night is as cold and damp as can be—that is, outside—but all day I've been planning on starting a letter back to old New York to greet my one-time laborers and fellow-sleepers under the open sky. In fact, in making myself comfortable after a good but typically French supper, I just naturally had to slip into a pair of odd-colored brownish outing stockings and a pair of moccasins (Greenhut's in sooth!), thereby making New York some few thousand miles nearer; these, with the grate fire glowing and roasting the water out of a cluster of wet apple-wood limbs, and an old Saturday Evening Post on a plain wooden table as writing mat, I challenge every "gloom" in France to assail me, until they find their faces blue with disappointment (if "glooms" have faces), because I know you are interested in the various events of interest in these days so memorable to your kid brother! In the first place, don't imagine for a minute that we are sleeping in miniature ice-houses and eating "bully beef and hard tack," because you would be wasting sympathy; on the contrary, there are seven of us fellows who are rather comfortably settled in a little two-room brick house by the side of the road, in a little, quaint village that at one time was probably a gem of picturesqueness, but now is bowed and broken, and is trying with feeble efforts to emerge from the disruption and ruin in which it was left last Spring by the Germans as they were pushed on out from all this region by the brave French. For some reason, however, the towns around here were not totally razed to the ground as in some cases, but the sight of charming, artistic village houses all blown to pieces is disheartening even to us who have not actually felt the effects ourselves. Since there are quite a number of places here that were only partially destroyed, most of the work of our group of twenty is repairing roofs or re-slatting, or patching brick walls; none of the demountable houses are required here at all, and in most cases some of the French are living in some parts of the houses while we repair. The particular little place we seven fellows have, is off at one end of the village and was probably considered too small to warrant dynamiting, and we are really pretty fortunate to have a slated roof that leaks only a little. The ordinary red brick floor is not very conducive to running around barefoot, but it is fairly clean; we had to put in the windows ourselves, that is, renew the glass, and it was quite interesting the first two days, whitewashing the walls, searching in the destroyed houses for a square of glass large enough to make a window; in exploring one old place nearby we found an old, dirty wardrobe that we extricated, washed and joyfully adopted as clothes-press, bureau, and library combined. It was thoroughly appreciated, since the house had no closets, cupboards, or shelves. But in spite of the primitive comforts of benches to sit on, and the restriction caused by four portable cots in the one room, and having to wash in enamel hand basins with water from a well a hundred and fifty feet away, and in spite of a number of other things that would ordinarily be considered requisite for comfort, we are nevertheless happy in having a first-class fireplace that is warm and cheerful and it never fails to give our dreams a sort of rosy hue when we can slip off to sleep with the flickering fire-light playing leap-frog over the ceiling beams and over the various articles of clothing draped from nails along the wall. The fire is like a friend from home, and I am counting on many a snug hour beside it when the winter comes in this year. We just don't think too much that the wood that gives us warmth was not long ago a flourishing apple tree in the garden back of the house; we have to forget once in a while, or it would be too saddening. Of course, nearly every fruit tree has been cut down, and on our way to this village in auto truck from a railroad station some fifteen miles away, we went along a road where for miles the beautiful big trees bordering the road on each side at a consistent spacing, had been cut down to block the progress along the road as the Germans retreated. It was rather a dismal sight to see now nothing but the stumps remaining, all the rest having been removed when the road was opened again.

Another group of our men, together with four or five English fellows, has been located in the centre of the village in a long low farmhouse which had been used by some German officers presumably, since there was a bomb-proof hut in the backyard, as well as a large dugout immediately under the house and about twenty feet wider than the surface. In the front yard they very kindly left two of their comrades who evidently fell when the village was first taken in 1914; and a plain wooden cross with the two names marks their resting place. The Frenchman who owns this interesting place is said to be in Paris, but does not want to return to it without his wife and daughter, who were taken off to work in Germany. From what we learn here, there were quite a number of the inhabitants who were transported off to Germany to work until they ceased to be a paying proposition, then they are sent home. As it is, there are only a few men here, and it is really moving to see the plucky women work and slave to keep the little families intact. It was hard for me to stick to my job the other day when a woman went past the house repeatedly where I was working, with a wheelbarrow full of sugar beets, taking them off to the barn where they were to be stored; but they were heavy loads and if ever anyone had right to be weary by the time night came, she was one. It is pleasant to feel that very soon another group of our agricultural men will be on the job with two good teams to help relieve the burdens of some of these women a little bit at least, and give them a little more promise for the crops next spring. I don't know when the tractors and other implements from America will get here, but I hope soon. It has been a real delight for us to see amidst all the hardship, a group of bright little youngsters that gather around the yard of the school-house every morning before going to class in the one good room that is left them. They are in fact a happy lot, and I hope to get acquainted with some of them this winter.

So far we have just been getting into things, but another lad and I have had the interesting job of building half of a roof (that is, all one side) on a small house that had one whole end destroyed. It has been ideal weather and we have thoroughly enjoyed getting the materials from places which cannot be repaired again, fitting and sawing them and finally covering the whole side as we did this morning with attractive new tiles. It gives the place a decidedly encouraging aspect and guarantees that at least part of the house will be dry. It is also a joy to be working out of doors these days in the glorious air and sunshine; coming back to the central camp for dinners and suppers that are surprising in their variety and quality, and then to sleep in our good army blankets completes the cycle of the day. The other day before our group had obtained a French lady to cook, one of our boys took a chance and made some real pumpkin pies! Well, he almost found himself added to our list of saints, and when an English fellow got busy and made a marmalade pudding, it was hard to realize where we were.

But some days we hear the distant booming of guns, faintly 'tis true, but they rumble with an insistence and sharpness that recall quickly enough the great struggle not so many miles away. Of the war we hear nothing, except through Paris papers and since we never get papers from the States, I hope you will tell me what has happened of particular interest during the last month or two.

(To be continued.)

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

Things progress very quietly here and we don't dare mention anything exciting, although you must none of you imagine we are in the danger zone. Sometimes we can hear the distant rumble of guns or an aeroplane goes past, but we are without evidence of war in our village except a few soldiers who are home en permission for the fall sowing.

Three of us took a walk to-day west of here to the old first-line trenches, which were abandoned last Spring; our village is located near the German third-line and it is about six miles over to the first line. We passed through barbed wire and trenches almost all the way, the barbed wire is perhaps the most impressive part of the landscape in the old fighting zone, for although some of it had been gathered up, there are tons and tons of it stretching in all directions across country.

The firing line trenches are perhaps easier to comprehend than those back of the line, which wander endlessly and without any definite aim across country in every direction, and it was rather impressive to see how the German trenches were torn up with shell and high explosives and how much easier it was to get through their barbed wire where it had been destroyed than back here where it is intact and impassable.

We crossed over "No Man's Land" to the old French trenches fortunately without any greswome discoveries—it is indeed wonderful how the country has been cleared up in the seven or eight months since the Germans left—and wandered along the French line for half a mile to an almost perfect macadam road which ran back through the fighting district as if it had never been torn up and dangerous.

The sight of the destruction wrought by the Germans before their retreat is more maddening than the shot-shattered villages nearer the lines.

We stopped at R,— for lunch and a hair-cut, the lunch cost five francs and a hair cut half a franc.

We traveled out of R,— by a road almost a kilometre long, in which every house had been gutted, all the windows broken, every bit of furniture stolen or burnt, doors torn down to be used in the trenches or burnt, mantels broken—in fact absolutely nothing left but the walls and roof. In a few cases the houses had suffered from shell-fire, but the whole street seemed to me rather to have been gone over by hand and crow-bar and the things wantonly destroyed. In an old barber's house, for example, all his mirrors and windows had been removed to the trenches or to Germany and he had to board up most of his windows; his barber's chairs were stolen and now he had nothing left but a broken-down shanty with a few ordinary chairs, and a kitchen and stove where his hair-dressing salon was and he uses the store he used to have in front for shaving and hair-cutting.

It is wonderful how cordial the people are to us; they expect America to save France and I have not met with the slightest wish from anyone to have us give up our work and get into the trenches.

I have been the last few days repairing an old lady's goat shed and have now begun to repair her roof. If there is anything more discouraging than to repair an old shrapnel-ruined slate roof I don't know it; your ladder in the first place, although the roofs have a very steep pitch, seems to break as many slate as it touches, and as soon as you begin on a hole it opens up in a tremendously impressive way, then it is very slow work to slip slates under others and make them tight, for the sheathing is stuck full of old rusty nail nails that have held up slate before, and one's fingers suffer sorely besides. But there is a great satisfaction in making somebody comfortable for the winter and I hope I can do a decent job for the poor old lady. She had two sons and a grandson fighting and lives all by herself, is a most bustling and stirring person, always ready to lend me a hand or to abuse the Germans. I generally have to seek shelter by her fire two or three times a day from the rain and then she talks and I try to listen, but the patois here is somewhat difficult and I don't get very much of her troubles—the first German shell that fell here lit in her garden and toute de suite the Germans followed it. She lived with them for two years and a-half and has a number of German words in her vocabulary—some of the time she had 250 soldiers quartered on her.

Like every one else she has a bomb-proof shelter constructed in her front yard and very little else but her goat, her cat and the ruins of a fine barn.

Things generally seem to agree with me and the days and weeks pass very quickly. We have a very harmonious crowd here and the work goes forward slowly as it must with such amateur workmen as we are. We shall learn though, and I hope will be able to make a good showing in our village here before Spring.

I think I had better warn you against writing me any military news or political news or any views on peace—especially the last. The most innocently meant expressions and questions have recently served to get one of the English Friends into most serious difficulties and, of course, every time anything is criticized the whole expedition feels the weight of it. I am in the war zone and you and I can't be too careful not to give offence.

This is a holiday and holy day for the French and after taking counsel with the Maire we have decided not work too.

I have been here about one month now and am beginning to know my way about. We are located in probably the finest house in the village which, however, has only one story and an attic and runs under one steeply-pitched roof from stable to workshop. The whole village is a very picturesque place built of brick one story high with slate or tile roofs—like all French villages. However, it does not put its best showing on view to the passerby; before it was torn down by the Germans in passing through you would only have an impression of brick walls surmounted by steep tile or slate roofs, with closed gateways opening through the walls. It was beautiful, as the slate and tile were colored with moss and lichens and presented in sombre tones, together with the weathered bricks, almost every color. These walls and roofs were generally barns and on driving through the gateway you would be in a courtyard with the house at the back and the court surrounded by stables and store-houses. Our house is finer than the rest in that it stands between a lawn and the garden and the barns, etc., were on one side surrounding another court—I say “were” because nothing is left of them now but tumbled masses of brick and their insides have been completely gutted. Our house and even the brick garden wall has been drilled full of holes for explosives but the Germans seem to have left before they could complete their work of destruction. Everything is desolate, all the garden is overgrown with grass and weeds, every fruit tree cut down and grown over with grass and the brick wall around the garden at least half overthrown. Outside in the orchard the same effect is continued, not only fruit trees but even shade trees ruthlessly felled and left to rot. Among them and in the barn-yard the immense carts of the French peasants with the spokes in the wheels all chopped away and agricultural machinery of all kinds ruined to the best ability of the German thoroughness. All the household furniture broken or burned, silver stolen and even the marble mantel-pieces hacked to bits. Stoves smashed and great and little pots with holes knocked in their bottoms—but no sign of any of the copper utensils which were so common in French kitchens and all of which have been confiscated to be sent to Germany for munitions. Our work is to make the people that are left here as comfortable as possible and so, of course, our first care has had to be roofs on houses where they can be repaired. It is a cold, nasty job trying to patch an old slate or tile roof. I am afraid that my respect for and admiration of these beautiful old world roofs is going to be a minus quantity for I have learned what shabby rafters and lath underlie them and how easily a knee or an elbow goes through them when one is not careful. I have repaired one tile roof and one slate and I hope made the latter fairly water-tight. J. H. H.

(To be continued.)

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

THE ANNUAL INQUIRY regarding the use of intoxicants by our members has begun again. This year the Women's Meetings in many places are questioning their members in much the same manner as the men. Why not? Surely no one who is a total abstainer and who refuses also to allow the serving of intoxicants at occasions over which she presides will be in the least annoyed by the inquiry. To most persons, both men and women, it may seem wholly unnecessary. But our testimony as a Society is not yet as clear as ninety per cent. or more of our membership would like it to be. The Yearly Meeting stands for total abstinence from the use of drinks and foods containing alcohol to make them pleasant to the taste. The gratification of such a taste is regarded by the Yearly Meeting as unnecessary, and fraught with physical and moral danger. From the social ills that flow from this source we desire to be absolutely clear. Of course there are other practices that might be inquired about, but this is one regarding which the group conscience has grown slowly but solidly for a long time, and we all are more or less desirous of finishing our task.

It may be that the time is near when a change of method regarding the inquiry will be desirable, but there can be no doubt that at the present time the effect is, on the whole, beneficial. There may be a few mischievous members who rather enjoy reporting “not clear,” but nearly all, and especially the young men, take it seriously, as they should, and admit frankly that “the inquiry is a good thing.”

Care should be exercised on the part of committees making the inquiry, and individuals in replying, to keep to the spirit and purpose of the questioning. Alcohol in flavoring extracts, for instance, is not put there to give the flavor. It is merely a chemical preservative of the fruit that is the flavor. The inquiry is intended to cover those cases only where the effect of the narcotic on a healthy person is the reason for its use.

THE PROHIBITION ADDRESS given on the afternoon of Eleventh Month 25th by William Jennings Bryan at the Metropolitan Opera House, Philadelphia, was well received. An audience of 4,000 or more filled the great auditorium. A good many men in uniform stood in the rear of the house listening attentively throughout the address. The speaker handled his subject psychologically, beginning with the logic of the situation, which to most people is the least interesting; then the history of the movement, and finally the illustrations and anecdotes that make it difficult to forget the lesson. The most untutored of men could understand, and the wisest of men could not disprove, what was said.

Three declarations were laid down as a basis for his argument:

1. No healthy organism requires alcohol.
2. No healthy brain needs alcohol.
3. No one who takes alcohol can be sure that he will not become a victim to the drug.

To such as claim to be Christians he said, “You say you have given your life to God. What right have you, then, to impair the efficiency of that life? What right have you to risk both the disposition and the capacity to serve God? How can you ignore the downward pull of a dangerous example to young men? What right have you to use money for that which is no benefit, but is likely to be an injury? How can you pray, ‘Thy Kingdom come,’ and at the same time put obstacles in the way of its coming?”

The Philadelphia papers gave prominence next morning to the magnificent address of the “Commoner.” Some of the quotations published were as follows:

“We haven't a county so wet that you can license a man to spread hog cholera among the hogs. Why not raise manhood to hog level?”

“You can trace the saloons through a city by the death rate of little children, because the money that is rightfully theirs is spent at a neighboring bar.”

“Go see where the rich brewer lives. Does he live near his own saloons? No, he puts them in the neighborhood of the poor.”

“People do not begin to drink with whisky. They first go to a beer kindergarten and then graduate to a whisky university. The brewery and the distillery have been such boon companions that they should die together and be buried in the same grave.”

“The license system is wrong, and they know it. Every one knows you can't make a saloon decent or prevent its evils by a license. It's the only business in the world which does not advertise its finished product. It's the only business in the world which does not display its finished product, because its finished product is blighted manhood. After it has finished its work it calls upon the law to cart away its victim until he is sober, and then he is invited back again.”

“Opponents of Prohibition say you cannot enforce the law. They say blind tigers will be maintained. In Ohio two years ago the liquor interests had to send a petition to the Governor asking for protection from blind tigers. There are more blind tigers in districts where there are licensed saloons than in any other district.”

“If a tiger were after my boy, the blinder he was the better I'd like it.”

“There is no politics among the liquor dealers. Democrats and Republicans should get together to pass the national Prohibition amendment.”

“I am not willing to admit that even brewery-ridden Pennsylvania will vote against the national Prohibition amendment when it is submitted to her.”

THE VOTE FOR PROHIBITION IN OHIO.—The process of leaving off a bad habit is seldom easy. A commonwealth may experience as much difficulty as an individual in “sobering up.” The State of Ohio has a population of 5,000,000. It is one of the “rich, conservative States of the East.” It has been a stronghold of liquorism for many years. Its 116 breweries and its 38 distilleries have represented powerful capitalistic influences and have turned out vast quantities of liquor with its subtle influence among the laboring class. Some of its cities have been numbered among the wettest of the "wet." Yet, at the recent election, this great commonwealth, casting a registered vote of more than 1,000,000, lacked less than 2000 votes of adopting constitutional prohibition. Such cities as Akron, Youngstown and Canton—great industrial centres—voted "dry." Even Columbus, proverbially "wet," gave a majority of 400 against the saloon. But this is no sudden "wave" of sentiment. In 1914 the vote for prohibition in Ohio showed a majority of 84,000 against it.

The next year the majority was down to 55,440; and this year the results hung in the balance while the Cincinnati "wets" hunted for "mistakes" in the count they already had turned in, and found 10,000 votes, in their favor of course. Later, when even this lead had been overcome by the "dry" vote in the country districts, the wets found other "mistakes" that gave them, finally, a lead of 1800 votes on the official count. Small comfort have the "wets" in the history of the past three years in Ohio, for well do they know that if the "drys" keep up their organization and call for a popular vote again next year, as they can do under the referendum, the result will pretty certainly read like a sentence of eviction to the 2000 saloon-keepers in the State. In the end, a large majority next year may be better for the cause of prohibition than had it succeeded this year by a narrow margin.

IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK the Prohibitionists gained 122 towns and one county. The State has now five dry counties and 670 dry towns out of a possible 932 towns. If a state-wide vote is submitted to the people next year, as the Governor probably will urge of the Legislature, the result will include the women's vote and every one expects them to strike hard at the liquor business. The possibilities are interesting to contemplate.

PACIFISM DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

Face to face with stern duty stands the young pacifist of to-day. So also stood the pacifist of '63, and it may be of interest to some to view a picture of those days whereby to draw a mental comparison.

In the first place, he said that comparatively few of our young men joined the army during the Civil War as volunteers or otherwise. After two years of contest the military necessity for soldiers became great. Early in '63 Congress passed the bill "to enrol and draft the militia." Drafting wheels were put to work in the various districts, and turned out a fair proportion of Friends. If claiming exemption they had to report to the enrolment boards to be examined regarding physique, dependents and conscience.

In the cases of Wm. P. Smedley and his cousin, Edward G. Smedley, of Delaware County, Pa., these men reported without compulsion Seventh Month 30, 1863. A paper had been drawn up, and was handed to the Board by one of them, probably both, affirming the holder to be a member with Friends, opposed on conscientious grounds to bearing arms, procuring a substitute or paying any money to secure release; and closing, "He feels that he is truly and entirely loyal to the government of the United States, and is willing to obey the laws, to bear his full share of the civil burdens and to perform all the other duties of a peaceable and good citizen so far as these are not inconsistent with his religious obligations. . . . He respectfully asks that this paper may be filed among your records as evidence that he is not a deserter in fact, although the law may designate him by this appellation."

Dismissed at this hearing the two Friends were recalled a fortnight later and were claimed as fit subjects for the army. They were then clothed in soldier suits by one who declared it to be the most unpleasant duty of his life; and under guard of another, who as a boy had been a schoolmate, were sent to the barracks at Twenty-second and Wood Streets, Philadelphia. Here they remained from Eighth Month 11th until Eighth Month 20th, when they were given passes allowing them to be at liberty, reporting daily at the barracks. On Ninth Month 10th, there came a special order from the Secretary of War, saying that Edward G. Smedley and Wm. P. Smedley "are hereby honorably discharged from the service of the United States."

Such are the outlines of their life in the army, but these outlines fail to let us see the discomforts of their life in the close and dirty third-story room, in company with rough or drunken substitutes or perhaps "bounty jumpers," fiddling or fighting as the case might be, who appropriated their possessions and little understood the fine points of morals for which the Quakers stood. These outlines fail to tell us of their refusals to form in line when they and their companions were summoned so to do twice a day. They fail also to tell us of the angry officers who were about to tie them up by their thumbs, their toes just touching the floor, when a new lot of substitutes unexpectedly arriving it was thought best to get the refractory Quakers out of sight. They fail to tell us of the persistent efforts of their friends to ease their situation, and to help them from being sent to camp near the Potomac, or further south. Once more, they fail to reveal the alleviations in the form of home letters and delicacies, the notices for them to repair to the colonel's office to meet a welcome caller, or the occasional release for visits in the city or outside.

Being promised no such release from military duty as the "conscientious objector" of to-day is granted, anxiety as to the future pressed heavily upon them, but after the early days of their barrack life they won the kind consideration of the officers and the respect of the men.

Perhaps some gained a new insight into what it meant to stand for an unpopular principle, to love it better than life, or friends, or reputation, or comfort.

ANN SHARPLESS.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"SEEK 'EM, KEEPER."

(Continued from page 304.)

So saying, she turned her horse's head in the direction of the door; but to her astonishment the Gaelic boy flung himself across her path, took hold of the bridle and tried forcibly to turn the horse's head away in another direction. James Dickinson tried to enquire the reason of this strange behavior, but the boy was unable to communicate with them. He only shook his head more vigorously than ever, and did his best to prevent their dismounting, by pointing further down the road and saying in the only two words of English that he knew, "No, no. On, on," and counting on his fingers to show them the few remaining miles that lay between them and the town at their journey's end. James Dickinson, wet to the skin and tired of the impossibility of arguing with their guide, and full of anxiety besides about his friend's wife, lost patience after a time. Turning his horse's head with firmness he rode straight up to the door, and having dismounted, knocked thrice, loudly, with his riding whip. At this, the boy looked more terrified than ever. He only waited to see the door begin slowly to open, before he rushed away as fast as his legs could carry him, disappeared into the mist, and was seen no more.

This was not very encouraging behavior for the two Friends; but they were by this time so wet and weary, that, in their thankfulness at having reached any sort of shelter at last, they did not pay much attention to the strange conduct of their guide. After all, he had seemed but a feckless boy all day, and it was he who had brought them along the wild road to this deserted spot, although probably it would have been better to have kept to the high road. But at this point the door opened, and, to the travelers' surprise, several people at once came forward and made them welcome, almost as if they were expected guests. Besides the landlord and his wife, there was another woman and two other men who all hung about the travelers, and helped them to remove their wet outer garments. While one woman took these away to the fire to dry, James Dickinson followed the landlord to the stables, and insisted upon seeing the saddles taken off and the weary horses comfortably cared for, before he consented to join his companion inside the inn. He found Jane seated at table in a small room that opened out of the large inn parlor. A fire was by this time burning in the grate, and a meal was set out on the table. Presently the landlady, a harsh ill-favored woman, bustled in carrying a hot posset of milk curdled with spirits of some sort. This our Friends thankfully drank; the virtue, or even the possibility of teetotalism not having been discovered in the seventeenth century! Next, their hostess proceeded to carve a large substantial-looking cold pie that occupied the central place on the table. As Jane Fearon watched her doing this, for some unknown reason a shiver ran through her, and she was filled with vague alarm. "Involuntarily," she herself said later when telling the story, "these words struck my mind, 'She means to serve thee otherwise before morning.'"

Looking across at James Dickinson, she saw that he was accepting his portion, and therefore did so herself, likewise, upon her hostess' urging her to eat it. But when the woman was called into the next room for a minute or two, Jane leaned across and said to her friend, "I have a leading that we should not eat of this pie." James Dickinson looked up in surprise. "Why not?" he asked. "But hardly had he uttered the words, than an unaccountable feeling of horror seized upon him also. He, too, pushed his plate away, and the two made a frugal supper of bread and cheese. By this time the little room where they sat was full of people again. The three men and two women were all hanging about, without any real business.

James Dickinson thought to himself, "If I were alone, I would rather be out in any storm than in a place like this." Jane felt a shiver run down her spine. There was a sickening, clammy atmosphere in the room that even the glow of the fire could not dispel. She chided herself for nervous fears; but her hearing was remarkably acute, and presently to her dismay these whispered words came to her from the end of the outer room, where the two men's heads were close together: "They have good horses and bags," said one voice. "Aye, and good clothes, too," returned the other, in a still lower whisper. Jane Fearon looked across to James Dickinson, but his eyes were fixed on the woman clearing the table, and it was obvious that the whispered words had not reached him. She could do nothing but wait till they should be left alone.

Pleading weariness, they asked for a private room and were shown into a small chamber on the other side of the courtyard. This room happily, unlike the former apartment, had a door that they could close; but as soon as they were left alone Jane noticed that it had no lock. Laying her finger on her lips, and beckoning to her companion, she dragged a heavy wooden bench across the floor, and, setting one end of it against a piece of furniture, she managed to wedge the door so tightly that it could not be opened from outside. Then, bursting into tears, wringing her hands, and exclaiming, "I fear these people have a design to take our lives," she told James Dickinson the words she had overheard. She could see that they made her companion also very uneasy. He began to pace the room and did not answer for several minutes, only continued to walk up and down.

(To be continued.)

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

[Carolina Wood has very kindly permitted us to use these very interesting letters. Francis W. Pennell is on a scientific trip of exploration for the Museum of Natural History in New York City, and for other interests.—Eds.]

BOGOTA, Colombia, Ninth Month 19, 1917.

DEAR FRIENDS AT BRAEWOLD:—

I have long been intending to write, and at last has arrived the period of semi-quietness waiting here in Bogota to which I have been looking forward. I have many arrears to pay.

Up to about ten days ago I had been pretty continuously traveling, stopping in places and under conditions not conducive to letter-writing. Always I have been busy, the continuous care of many specimens drying for our garden herbarium proving more taxing and time-consuming than the more important service for which we have been sent here. This labor continues, and this past week a long letter home and two botanical reports of progress were sufficient.

First let me say that to-day I have received my first mail from home (or at all from U. S. A.) I had been certain of many letters sent, and had left what in the U. S. A. would be a sufficient letter trail. I had been weeks ago to the office here, left name and hotel address, had my boy inquire other times, and last week had the hotel-proprietor apply (distrusting my own ability). But to-day a Colombian friend succeeded where my efforts had failed, and there were letters aplenty, and some from over a month back.

F. H. Putt employed Dr. Rusby and myself to investigate and collect for him specimens for analysis of the commercial species of cinchona (quinine bark) of Colombia, which service we have been and are fulfilling to the best of our ability. We have been successful here. The day before I left New York F. H. Putt and I both signed the six months' contract (the safe form thus so kindly prepared for me), and this was witnessed by Dr. H. H. Rusby. One copy I have here, the other was taken by Putt.

As to results of our undertaking here, before Dr. Rusby left me (Eighth Month 21st) we had obtained specimens for analysis and recognition of four of the commercial species of cinchona. These were from Balsillas, a hacienda across the Cordillera Oriental from Neiva. Since he left I have seen and obtained specimens from Villavicencio, across the Cordillera from here, of Remigia Pedunculata, the Quinia Cuprea. Of this I expect some bark in a few days, to be sent to New York for analysis. Of the only other commercial species of this country, Remigia Purdieana, from near Bucaramanga, Dr. Rusby has arranged to obtain a shipment of bark to be sent to New York. So we feel well satisfied with our success in obtaining the various species desired. Now, supposing matters well at home, I am to be ready to obtain each sort in abundant quantities for profitable manufacture. It will doubtless be several weeks before analysis is made in U. S. A., and report reaches me, but I am anxious to act that this undertaking may fulfil its present promise. There is plenty of cinchona in the mountains where we have been and those who procure it are anxious to negotiate business.

Whenever possible during the prosecution of this work I have been collecting plants for our garden collection, and have now over 2,000 specimens. These are doubtless largely not represented at the Garden, and of those less rare many are interesting because from the classic ground of Bogota. For here Nutis, greatest of South American botanists and correspondent of Linnaeus, worked, and must be obtaining for us many of his species. The Indian Paint Brush (astilleja), so abundant in the western U. S. A., was first described from specimens from here, and the same for the so often-cultivated Calceolarias (of both genera I have the original sorts). I am anxious when returning down the river (return due in First Month) to make brief excursions to the nearby mountain ranges, and so add greatly to the value of our collections.

But I have said nothing as yet of our trip up the Magdalena River, and of our expeditions since. We reached Cartagena

"Those that are favored with extraordinary graces, if they did duly consider their state and danger, would find little ground to exalt themselves, or to despise others that are in a more low, but withal far more secure way."

Seventh Month 6th, but I date my actual entry into the country (and so earliest date of possible departure) from our arrival at Puerto Colombia, Seventh Month 7th. For this little village we left the ocean, and crossed on one of Colombia's few railroads to Barranquilla. There we passed the customs and felt ourselves in the land.

I expect Dr. Lund has told you of the ride up the river, of the flat-bottomed boats drawing an amazingly slight depth of water, of the forest shores and certainly of the crocodiles. I had no expectation of the abundance of these. On the sand-bars we could see great fellows, their open mouths showing a vicious array of teeth; on one bar we counted over twenty. The forests, which begin a little way up from Barranquilla, are tropical, of course, but surprised me by the smallness of the trees and the scarcity of palms. Star-leaved Cecropias were most common, and the shores would often be gaudy with scarlet and yellow Heliconias, elsewhere but little color. Parrots and macaws, gaudy enough, were common, and a companion reported a monkey—I did not see the last, but know they are plentiful.

The lower and longer portion of the river is through flat land, deemed very unhealthy, and so nearly deserted by whites. Along the banks are many Negro cabins, of bamboo and palm, the most primitive architecture I have ever seen. Beside these tiny structures, often enough open to the sides, would be little fields—clearings—of maize or plantains. The whole, with the half-clothed Negro, the children clothed but in their native duskiness, is a picture certainly African, an importation here.

(To be continued.)

REBUILDING WHERE THE GERMANS HAVE TORN DOWN.

The New York Evening Post has commenced a series of articles with the above title. They already have information of thirty-six American organizations engaged in Reconstruction work. The following is the way they deal with the contribution of Friends:—

AMERICAN FRIENDS' UNIT.

American Friends' Reconstruction Unit of the Red Cross, J. Henry Scattergood, representative, 648 Bourse Building, Philadelphia, Pa.; "Bureau of American Friends' Unit of American Red Cross in France, combined with the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee (English Friends), has 280 English and American workers doing building in nine villages and repairing in four villages, besides medical, relief and agricultural work. The villages in which this work is being done are in the Somme and Aisne.

"The work we have in prospect is as follows: Opening of Civil Hospitals in Marne and Meuse, enlargement of the Chalons Maternity Hospital, the establishment of a new baby home at Vitry le François; new relief centres at Vitry le François, and in the Department of Aube, new agricultural centres at Galanecourt, Oise and Gremy, Somme, and the erection of portable houses in many villages of Somme, Aisne and Oise.

"There are now no organizations doing similar work in the districts in which we are working. Our work is done under the auspices of the Red Cross. We will co-operate more or less closely with the American Fund for French Wounded (Civil Branch), Smith College Unit, French Wounded Emergency Fund (English), and the French Red Cross."

In regard to the future work of the American Friends' Reconstruction Unit, J. H. Scattergood writes:

"We expect to put up portable houses in a great many villages in all evacuated districts in connection with various societies whose work is confined to the distribution of clothing and some little in seeds. The Friends are the only ones in a position to do the manufacturing and erecting of houses, and a large field will open before them in this line of service.

"We expect to add very considerably to our numbers, and make the Friends' relief work a larger organization than it now is. It should remain the largest factor in reconstruction work undertaken by the American Red Cross, and it is quite possible that the Red Cross itself will depend a great deal upon Friends' labor and reconstruction work, as it has already found difficulty in getting other people to do the work satisfactorily."

PROFESSOR GILBERT MURRAY ON STEPHEN HOBHOUSE.

In the course of a lecture on "The Soul as it is, and How to Deal with it," at Hackney College, Hampstead, Professor Gilbert Murray, of Oxford, referred in some detail to the case of Stephen Hobhouse. He remarked that it was a dangerous thing when people were allowed to undermine the authority of the law. But a nation that placed men in a position where they were obliged to break the law, or act contrary to their conscience, was not wise. After illustrating this by the career of the Indian reformer Gandhi, in South Africa, which he suggested showed that persons in authority should be very careful how they dealt with those who sincerely believed that they were doing what was right, he turned to the case of Stephen Hobhouse. He said that it often happened that the saints were wrong, and the Government was right. But Governments were not often right when they ill-treated the saints.

After outlining Stephen Hobhouse's career at Oxford, and stating that he was a man of deep religious convictions with a touch of mysticism, he said that in his desire to identify himself with the race he stripped himself of his social position. He and his wife voluntarily took up their residence in Hoxton, doing their own work, even their washing, themselves, and giving up their time to social work. During the time of the Balkan War Stephen Hobhouse gave up his post at the Board of Education and went out to do relief work. The spirit in which he lived made such an impression upon his Moslem interpreter that they used to pray together. Later on, as we all know, conscription came into force in this country. But under the Act it was provided that there should be complete exemption for those who had a conscientious objection to military service. By what Professor Murray said he could only describe as an act of deliberate injustice on the part of the Tribunal, Stephen Hobhouse was sent into the army. He was sentenced to 112 days' hard labor. Upon coming out he was returned to the army, and sentenced to a further period of imprisonment. The effect of renewed sentences was to make the conditions more severe than in the case of a single continuous sentence. Two of the worst features of our prison system of to-day were the eternal silence, and the solitary confinement imposed upon prisoners. It was not to be wondered at that prisoners did manage to snatch a few words with each other, in spite of the prison rules. Stephen Hobhouse was so smitten with shame at the thought of concealment, that he confessed to the Governor that he had broken the rule as to silence, and that he did not feel that it would be right to promise to keep it. As a result it was understood that he was now kept continuously in solitary confinement. Professor Murray said that he believed that the Government had broken the law, and that the Tribunal had made a mistake. It was a deliberate conflict between the Government and the soul. The War Office might easily crush the body of a man, but no Government or nation was in a healthy condition if it could not live in peace with its saints. A wise ruler would be very tender before challenging the conscience of its humblest citizen.

Professor Murray closed his powerful address with an appeal to us that we should see to it that our own soul does not die. The weight of dead matter seemed constantly to increase. In our own great war there was a tendency for us to forget the higher causes for which so many of our friends had laid down their lives. There was the constant temptation to sink into line with lower motives. The power of death is over the world. Let those of us who are still spared make sure that the soul within us shall not die.—H. H. C., in The Friend (London).

"SHOULD time with me now close, I die in peace with my God, and in that love for mankind which believes every nation to be our nation, and every man our brother."—Diary of J. Yeardley.

HAMBURG, Germany, 1822.

J. Yeardley was an English Friend who made a religious visit to the continent in the year mentioned.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Friend [London] for some unexplained reason has again been held up—three numbers coming to us within forty-eight hours. The following items are from those three numbers:

In the current number of the Expository Times there appear an illuminating article on William Penn and his writings, special reference being made to "Some Fruits of Solitude" and John William Graham's recently published Life of Penn. The writer of the article recalls Tennyson's general summing up of Penn's character and work by narrating the following incident:

In 1882 a number of American citizens approached Tennyson through Lowell, asking him to write a few verses on the occasion of the two-hundredth anniversary of the founding of Pennsylvania. Tennyson was at the moment unable to comply, "but," he wrote, "I will be with you in spirit on the eighth of November, and rejoice with you rejoicing; for, since I have been ill, I have read the life of your noble countryman, and mine, William Penn, and find him no 'comet of a season,' but the fixed light of a dark and graceless age, shining on into the present, not only great but good, kalos kagathos, as the Athenians said of their best."

Dr. F. B. Meyer, in his pamphlet, The Majesty of Conscience, argues strongly for the recognition of the right of men to follow the course which they sincerely believe to be the only one open to them—even when it brings them into conflict with the State in a matter regarded as one of vital importance. Writing as a firm believer in the righteousness of Britain's action in entering the struggle, he recognizes the respect that should be paid to "the men who, out of reverence for the majesty of conscience, have endured tortures which in some cases could hardly have been exceeded by the Inquisition." Conscience, he says, "is the supreme authority of right and wrong. It is the vice-regent of the Eternal Throne."

Dr. Meyer asks the three following questions which can hardly be answered by any right-thinking person otherwise than in the negative, and as he says, the answer to them "goes to the heart of morality, liberty and religion:—(1) "Is it right (1) for a man to act against his conscience? (2) for other men to endeavor to force him to act against his conscience? (3) for a community to punish him for refusing to act against his conscience?" From a convinced supporter of the war these queries come with especial force, and the pamphlet (National Labor Press, Manchester, 2d) is deserving of wide circulation.

The Christian Libre, organ of the French ex-Priests, commenting on the special number of The Friend devoted to the work of the Friends' Ambulance Unit, remarks: "When we understand that all this organization is entirely voluntary and that the heavy cost is, for much the greater part, borne by the Society of Friends, who number but 20,000 members in Great Britain (a good number of whom are in prison), one can but feel stimulated by so fine an example of human solidarity and Christian love." In the same issue (Eleventh and Twelfth Months) John S. Stephens gives an account of the Young Friends' Movement, an article twice broken in upon by the French Censor! Henry van Etten reviews the recent book by Canon Streeter and Edith Piton Turberville on "Woman and the Church," and the history of the Quakers, by G. Minne, deals with some of their antecedents.

G. J., in his "Free Church" Notes in the Manchester Guardian, discusses some recent books on "Prayer." Referring to "The Fellowship of Silence," edited by Cyril Hephher, he remarks that "the contents are a fine blend of High Anglicanism and Quakerism," and adds: "For nearly three centuries the members of the Society of Friends have been trying to show to the rest of the world the place of silence in Christian worship; and now, at last, men who in things ecclesiastical are separated from them by a whole diameter are beginning to act themselves if the time has not come when the Quaker ideal of worship should be used to enrich the life of the whole Christian community."

"True, one swallow does not make a summer, but the Hephher book is no solitary sign; on every hand the feeling gains ground that our ordinary service, with their uninterrupted course of praying, reading, singing, and preaching, need to be modified to make room for that quiet waiting upon God which, as the Psalms remind us, is so real an element in all true worship. Only within the last few days I have come across the notice of a fourteen days' "Quiet Time Mission," conducted by the pastor of a Methodist church, who gave addresses on "The Power of Silence,"

For Methodists this is a new type of 'mission' indeed; and when even the most vocal of the sects finds itself constrained to walk in the ways of George Fox, the Quaker may well feel that his long plea for wordless worship is at last bearing fruit."

FRIENDS at Fourth and Arch Streets were invited on the 9th to hold the regular meeting for worship in the small central room. The scarcity of fuel seems to force such economy upon Friends. The small room proved adequate and very comfortable. There may be a hint in this for some other meetings.

We are informed that the Friends' Meeting-house at Parkerville, Pa., was burned to the ground on the afternoon of the 7th. Although the congregation there was greatly reduced in numbers the house was still regularly in use. The few members of the neighborhood will not find it difficult to attend the meeting at Kennett Square.

C. WALTER and SARAH CARTER BOITON, who have a bungalow on the Ranococs Creek, near Camp Dix, have been keeping open house to the Y. M. C. A. workers at the Camp. The tension upon these workers is so great that a quiet retreat to the sanctuaries of a private home is an untold boon to them. It is hoped that if our Friends feel obliged to return to Moorestown others will be found to continue this beneficent work.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING TWELFTH MONTH 15, 1917.

Amount reported last week	$239,683.89
Amount from fourteen meetings	4,368.88
Amount from six individuals	55.00
	<hr/>
	$244,107.77

FOR ARMENIAN AND SYRIAN RELIEF.

Reported last week	$156.03
Received from seven meetings	203.66
Received from one individual	3.00
	<hr/>
	$362.69

CHARLES F. JENKINS,
Treasurer.

ONLY about fifty were in attendance, out of a desired four hundred, at the meeting of Friends' Educational Association, on the 15th. The subject—"The Relation of Proper Study to Good Teaching," may have seemed like a somewhat technical subject. As treated by Dr. Lida B. Earhart, it was of great practical value to all who in any way are interested in the improvement of education. Parents and teachers alike have so long used the ordinary tools of teaching that it may not seem to them likely that there is much but technical development possible along these lines. Dr. Earhart spoke modestly of her chosen field, but it is safe to say that under her stimulation the ordinary processes are multiplied many times in usefulness. We hope to have the secretary's notes of the address for a later issue.

HADDONFIELD and SALEM QUARTER.—The Autumn Quarterly Meetings were concluded with a three-and-a-half hours' session of Haddonfield and Salem Quarter at Moorestown on the 13th. Alfred Kemp Brown and Wm. Blair Neatby were in attendance. The former in acknowledging the open door of service they had found amongst all Friends made a feeling appeal for unity amongst the scattered sheep of our fold. This was responded to in the second meeting by W. Blair Neatby, who pointed out that the unity Friends should seek is to be found in the fellowship of Gospel experience and power. It can not be a mere veneer of seeming acquiescence in a common purpose without regard to the bond of the spirit. Blair Neatby also expressed a feeling that the death of expression in vocal prayer mentioned in a report might mean a loss of sensitiveness to the inflowings of grace. He was far from advocating any unauthorized expression, but the sign would seem clear that under too many conditions there is an actual quenching of the spirit.

The religious service committee reported a year in which their leadings had been largely along social lines. Much evident good had resulted. The visiting committee of the Atlantic City meeting reported the attendance and the number of vocal offerings made in the meeting during the year. Three new members from that meeting indicated that a militant testimony is still maintained.

A committee suggested a change of the hour of the Quarterly Meeting to 2 p. m., beginning in Third Month next, and that the Quarter and its subordinate meetings should all be held in joint session. These changes were adopted for a year on trial.

FURTHER MEN FOR FRANCE.—An impression seems to be current that there are very few openings in France for more men. This is a very mistaken impression. The chief difficulties are at this end of the line. The matter of increasing our work in France and of opening up fields of service in this country is wholly dependent upon the action of the War Department with reference to drafted Friends. If this work is recognized as non-combatant service we expect to be able to send several hundred to France. We cannot open up new work in France on the present great uncertainties, however. Very complicated negotiations with English Friends, the American Red Cross and French officials are necessary and we cannot enter into such negotiations until we can definitely offer a certain number of men.

We are expecting to send early in the year a large number of men not in the first draft, although this course may prove unwise if they are in a second draft in the Spring.

If conscientious objectors who are Friends are turned over to our Committee, many may not be fitted for the work in France. We have promised both Friends and the War Department that we will provide other service for these men. Until it is decided what work will be recognized as non-combatant service, we cannot take further steps. We have brought every influence within our power to bear on the situation and the next move is up to the Government.

We recently sent another commission to Washington to investigate the matter. They learned that no ruling as to non-combatant service will be made for several weeks. Although we have been unable to obtain a definite ruling we still strongly hope that all Friends who continuously refuse from religious principles to be drawn into any army service, will be allowed to enter our work as non-combatant service. It is very clear that no other drafted men will be allowed to enter this work, since it is very natural that all men conscientiously able to serve in the army will be forced to do so.—AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

The following course of lectures is announced by the Thomas Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College to be given at Friends' Select School, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, six-day evenings beginning Twelfth Month 21st and continuing through First Month. The thought prompting this course of lectures is that back of the question of winning the war, taken at its best, lies the far greater question of making a better world—a world in which the rights of men shall be so regarded as to make future wars unlikely.

Some of the leading thinkers in connection with various problems of the social order—political, economic, educational, moral and religious—have been secured. It is hoped that they will be given a worthy hearing. The invitation is general and is extended to all interested.

The Thomas Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College announces a course of Lectures on Conditions after the War.

Friends' Select School, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, has offered its Lecture Room for the purpose.

The following are arranged:—

Twelfth Month 21, 1917.—Dr. John Bates Clark (Professor of Political Economy in Columbia University and head of the Department of Economics and History of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace) —"Democracy and Peace."

First Month 1, 1918.—Dr. Sidney L. Gulick (Secretary of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship) —"Christianizing America's Relations with China and Japan."

First Month 11, 1918. Gifford Pinchot (Subject to be announced).

First Month 18, 1918.—Dr. John Dewey (Professor of Philosophy in Columbia University) —"Education After the War."

First Month 25, 1918.—Dr. John Haynes Holmes (of the Church of the Messiah, New York) —"The Message of the Church After the War."

Other Lectures may follow. Admission is free and all are invited. Lectures begin at 8 o'clock."

EXEMPTION COMMITTEE ROOM 25, 301 Arch Street, Phila.

Camp Meade has been receiving almost weekly visits from Friends of Philadelphia and vicinity; meetings for worship have been held from time to time; other visits are planned for the near future by some of our ministers and others.

Camp Dix has had fewer visitations, but they are most acceptable to the C. O.'s. Just now portions of this camp have been placed under quarantine on account of the prevalence of measles.

The pamphlet containing information regarding the government questionnaire, soon to be sent to young men of draft age, has been much appreciated by those of our membership who are affected. Naturally there are many callers at this office for the purpose of consulting about special features of the system.

There seems an increasing effort on the part of those approaching manhood to engage in reconstruction work under the American Friends' Unit; this is natural, in view of the probability of an extension of the draft age.

Owing to the uncertainty as to time of announcement by the President and the character of what is to be termed Non-combatant service, definite work of a constructive character in France or elsewhere is certainly preferable to the life of a C. O. in a military camp, yet we feel a concern that our young men will bear in mind the service of testimony bearing as a C. O.—whether in a cantonment or not—for the great principle which is at stake.

Recent correspondence with our men in camp bears evidence to the fact that those who remain steadfast in their opposition to assuming any military duty are respected by the officers; we are not surprised that their pathway is made rough at first, for there are many who, desiring to escape the military régime for other than conscientious reasons, assume the position of the C. O. only to be dislodged by stern measures.

The following is from a letter received to-day and may interest readers of THE FRIEND. WM. B. HARVEY.

TWELFTH MONTH 12, 1917.

CAMP DIX, 153 Depot Brigade, Headquarters Battalion,

Twelfth Month 11, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND:—

Just what is happening to the Friends and other C. O.'s in the training camps is of great interest, for apparently a story of treatment in one camp does not necessarily apply to the one next to it.

Camp Dix objectors, for the most part, I believe, are being treated with great consideration. For my part, I have nothing but good words for my treatment from the start. What few disagreeable experiences came at first were to be expected, and did not approach what I had dreaded. To be sure I was threatened a bit, but inasmuch as the breaking down of a C. O. is a triumph you can't blame the officers for trying. Two or three have been subjected to the guard-house, apparently for this purpose.

There are eight C. O.'s here that have been segregated; four are Friends, the remainder are of various beliefs. Five of the number are in uniform, waiting to be assigned to hospital work, and they daily march about the camp, back and forth, covering many miles. Those who have been taking a positive stand had not, since last accounts, been given any definite program. They have all been segregated for the last week because of an outbreak of measles, so I haven't seen much of them.

Personally, I have been let quite severely alone since I arrived in the Headquarters Department a couple of days before Thanksgiving. I had to refuse to be measured for a uniform and to do kitchen police on Second-day a week ago. That took me before our captain. The interview was far from unpleasant. He professed sympathy and told me he'd not ask anything of me more if he could help it, h-ping that before long I'd be disposed of.

Except for a few "household" duties and a little landscape decorating of the exterior of our quarters, I've had almost unbroken opportunity for reading and writing. I am free to spend most of my time in the nearby Y. M. C. A.

Eventually, I expect we objectors will all be put together. But that goal cannot be reached except through intermediate stages, each presenting temptations to make us stumble if we will.

In sure I speak for all of us when I express sincere thanks for the interest and sympathy of Friends. May we be so guided as to come out of this trial worthy of this sympathy.

Very sincerely,

WENDELL F. OLIVER.

WM. H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS,
No. 422 WALNUT STREET, PHILA., PA.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

SWARTHMORE, PA.

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for the Winter Term, 1918:

"The Life of Christ," "The Hebrew Prophets," and "Church History," by Elbert Russell.

"The Adolescent Age in the First-day School," by William Byron Forbush.

"International Organization," by William I. Hull.

"The Development of Religious Thought," by Rufus M. Jones.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community." (To be announced.)

Term begins First Month 7th.

ELBERT RUSSELL,
Director.

WISSAHICKON INN

REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent rooms for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

W. B. WEAVER

UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET
PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

Hajoca

extra-deep Sink

Prevents overflow of water from dishpan to floor. Equipped with Hajoca Quick Faucets, which save time and prevent splashing.

Inspect it at our show-rooms, and see all the latest designs of Hajoca Bathroom Fixtures. Write for Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES & GADBURY CO.
1130-1144 Ridge Ave.
(at 12th and Spring Garden Sta.)

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
802 SPRING GARDEN ST. PHILADELPHIA
Opens upon until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. PHILA.

W. J. MacWaters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS and CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

Your child needs a

SHETLAND PONY

to ride, drive, and grow up with.

HARTZELL BROTHERS, SEBRING, OHIO.

ESTABLISHED 1883.

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50

1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

by freight or express, l. o. b., Colord.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Squashanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mimeographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Typewriting, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—Two well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolleys.
Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—BY AN EFFICIENT and WELL-RECOMMENDED married man of 31 years, except a position in mechanical line, with a firm of Friends or other Christian denomination
Address, care of "THE FRIEND," 207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—IN THE J. LEWIS CROZER HOSPITAL, Chester, Pa., ten (10) young women of good character, between the ages of 19 and 35, in the training school, giving a general training. Special work given in diseases of children. Location of hospital good, grounds covering forty acres; comfortable home life for nurses.
Apply to HOSKETT, S. E. Usher, Superintendent.

THE following timely books, mostly of those recommended by the Social Order Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, are for sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

"The Church and the Hour."	Vida D. Scudder,	$1.00
"The Social Problem."	C. A. Ellwood,	1.25
"The Abolition of Poverty."	J. H. Hollander,	75
"Christianizing the Social Order."	Walter Rautenbach,	1.50
"The Day of Our Visitation."	William Littleboy,	50
"A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich."	John Woolman,	05

WILLIAM S. YARNALL
MANUFACTURING OPTICIAN
128 SOUTH SIXTEENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton

TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-61 - - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X
WILLIAM OAKES
Plumbing and Heating Contractor
ALSO LEAD BURNING
260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA
BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

GIRARD TRUST CO.
BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian,
Administrator, Assignee and Receiver.
Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults.
Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. - - - PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER
S. W. COR. 16TH and RACE STREETS
Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals
BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS
FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense
Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth
from 50c to $30c.
REDUCES
FIRE RISK.
Guaranteed for one year.

$16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels
Paper

Paper Bags and Twine

259 South Third Street

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1571.

FRIENDS' BIBLE ASSOCIATION

HAS ITS HEADQUARTERS AT 207 WALNUT PLACE : PHILA.

It is able to furnish Bibles and Testaments to Schools and Bible-classes and would be glad to have Friends everywhere acquaint themselves with the needs of their neighborhoods and allow the Bible Association to help them procure the books they may want.

Genealogist Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 N. Stockton St., Trenton, N. J.

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

'Phone, Spruce 3032

TO ADVERTISERS.—THE FRIEND is now open for selected advertisements at the following rates: One inch, 56 cents, or 4 cents a line; no insertion for less than 25 cents. Long term rates given on application.

Friends having real estate to rent or sell, also those desiring board or rooms, should find THE FRIEND an excellent medium for reaching interested parties.

Standing business cards are also solicited.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 27, 1917.

No. 26.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

ANOTHER YEAR.

The experiences of each year may be compared to those associated with ascending the wonderful cañons of the mighty West. Those deep valleys—the Spanish word “cañon” means “tube in the mountain”—penetrate the rugged wilderness of rocks and woodland and often afford the only route whereby the summit of some splendid peak may finally be reached. The brave traveler sets out for his destination, just as we at the beginning of each twelve-months with renewed courage consider the coming year.

These cañons, like the succeeding weeks in the lives of many of us, afford an ever-shifting scene. Sometimes they are arid; no gushing waters are near to refresh the weary inland voyager. Again they may be the only outlets for the limpid springs of water that merge into living streams at his tired feet. Obstacles unexpectedly frustrate his intent. Huge boulders may intervene. Sometimes a lovely spot of green mosses and dainty wild flowers allure to an hour's repose. Many a halt is necessary wherein to accumulate fresh strength for the upward march. The climb is renewed. Gigantic precipices tower on every side. How helpless is the traveler in the circumstances surrounding him. Sometimes all view of the outer world is cut off. Only a blue ribbon of God's beautiful sky is above. There seems no way of escape. To retreat would be cowardly. Faith is once more invoked and he presses onward. Just when the adamantine rocks crowd most relentlessly he discovers an unexpected turn to right or left. How glad he is that he went right forward. Trust and courage have met with a sure reward. At last the summit is attained. The things that obstructed his progress seem in retrospect very small. Heaven is above him and the world lies at his feet. In the quiet of the rare upper atmosphere he is very close to God.

So to the Christian are the passing years. The incidents of life may crowd never so hard, the water springs may temporarily cease to flow, the flowerlets of joy may not be seen because we think of our feet bruised and torn. The cruel, hard walls of circumstances may at times seem helplessly to enclose us. Shall we give up? No! We continue the material and spiritual struggle. We consider the end of our eventful and wonderful life-journey—of the sun-bathed splendor of the upper world.

Every year takes the child of faith valorously upward toward his beautiful Heaven. Each succeeding twelve-months finds the child of God one year nearer to the celestial joy.

SAN JOSÉ, CALIFORNIA.

W. C. A.

MEETINGS AND MILITANCY.

Perhaps no one would challenge the statement that during the first fifty years of the phenomenal growth of the Society of Friends the meeting for worship was the great militant instrument by which Truth was spread and the Society increased in numbers, in power, and in influence. Organization with its official restraints, its system of committees and its appointed elders and overseers brought to pass a new era. The corporate conscience was developed and the Society began to function as an organism, if we may be permitted to reduce the situation to modern scientific terms. A very little contrast of the two situations makes it clear that in the second era there was a very definite loss of spontaneity and of the power of growth. It is not necessary to depreciate the service of organized Quakerism,—of the well-established preparative, monthly and quarterly meetings, in recognizing this change of function. The system of our Society has had a service, albeit it has not been the identical service of the first decades.

We wish to raise the question whether it is not possible to have the benefit of the two functions—the militancy of a personal enthusiasm, and the dignity and weight of a co-operative system, at one and the same time. Fortunately our answer does not need to be academic. It is recorded in some rather recent history which has been made without a conscious effort to express either a revival of ancient custom, or a new departure in the development of serviceableness. Unless we are mistaken it, however, does both of these things.

In the decade between 1862 and 1872 Atlantic City was opened to development as an ideal seashore resort. Friends were early on the scene. We might mention among these pioneers such names as Whitall, Roberts, Gurney, Willits and Wright, without intending to indicate that there were not others equally concerned. These Friends were of the type that carried the Friends' Meeting with them. Their parlors served for some time to accommodate a growing congregation of Friends and interested attenders for meetings on First-day mornings. Then they appealed to the Quarterly Meeting for assistance in regularly establishing a meeting. The response was “that way did not open for it.” Nothing daunted these Friends collected money, acquired lots in a central position and built a comely house large enough to accommodate about 250 persons. This was in 1872. The title of the property was not vested in any meeting, but in a self-perpetuating

Board of Friends of several meetings, with reversionary provision to Westtown School should the demand for a meeting lapse. Shortly after, the Quarterly Meeting appointed a visiting committee to share in the responsibility of the meetings. At the end of another decade a number of Friends had become all-year residents of the resort. These felt the need of the meeting during the winter months, and after using a hotel parlor and a rented room during portions of two winters again appealed to the Quarterly Meeting for assistance in preparing the meeting-house for the winter and in continuing the care of the visiting committee during the whole year. Once more word came back "that way did not open for this" but the Trustees took the matter up, put a cellar under the house, supplied a heater and so made the way clear for a regular meeting during the whole year. At the next appointment the visiting committee's service was extended to cover the whole year.

This interesting bit of local history is recited not to reflect upon the reluctance of a Quarterly Meeting to set up a new meeting, but to show how real was the revival of the spirit of seventeenth century militancy in that instance. That it was a real revival is made more clear by the fact that it became the pattern for somewhat similar meetings at other resorts. We have information of at least seven such, three on the New Jersey coast, one at Eagle's Mere, two in the Poconos and one in Florida. These all have had an important service for Friends, but possibly a still greater service for numbers not in membership with us, but definitely hospitable in feeling to the method of united silent waiting upon the Great Head of the Church. Just why Friends should feel greater freedom in inviting others to these meetings, than to the regularly organized and officiated meetings of the Society presents an inquiry that may be in part answered by what is included in these considerations, particularly when we have pursued them one step further.

The so-called Young Friends' movement with its beginnings in England under the able leadership of John Wilhelm Rowntree made very directly more than one discovery of moment in regard to the militancy of meetings. So it followed that several new types of meetings became prominent in the active work of the Society. The range from Summer Schools to tramps and fireside gatherings met a great variety of needs. In all of them a new measure if not a new kind of spontaneity became manifest. The final discovery of John Wilhelm Rowntree in his quest for a real revival of Quakerism—a discovery which he proclaimed both in England and in this country with all the heaven-born ardor of his consecrated being, was contained in his oft-repeated words to the effect that the meeting for worship is the very heart of our system. Unless it can be vitalized there is little hope of any worth-while revival. Now there can be no question that the religious meeting in these pronouncements meant the regularly organized meetings of our system. We believe we do no injustice to his thought in saying all these spontaneous and original expressions of religious effort and fellowship are good, but their quality in the final analysis is to be tested by their effect upon the regular meetings. Do they become better attended and more worshipful? Do they become so much more attractive to ourselves that we are found asking others to come and share their blessed privileges? This we wish to put as a challenge to the Young Friends' Movement in our own limits. Here by the word and example of the princely leader amongst them is their field—their harvest field white already unto harvest.

The militant type of seventeenth century meeting which has revived quite spontaneously amongst us is surely an index of no ordinary vitality. There should be a way found to carry this vitality over into the organized system. Our young Friends can assist in doing this, but it is in reality a call to all. Appointed officers in the meeting should be much on their guard against over-officialism. Those who have not accepted or received appointments should realize that this in no way relieves them from a vital membership "one of another." Visitors to our meetings should find an atmosphere in which they at once discover a ready partnership with every good word and work. The day is surely upon us when we shall have to meet a wider demand for serviceableness. The soldier as well as the religiously minded civilian should not turn from our assemblies as cold and irresponsive. We need a vitalized ministry, but we can only get it out of a vitalized membership.

J. H. B.

DEFENSE OF CONSCIENCE IN PARLIAMENT.

[The following noble defense of conscience made in Parliament by Lord Cecil did not stay the flood of war passion that overwhelmed the "guardians of liberty" but some day they will stand out in the lustre they deserve.—Eds.]

"Lord Hugh Cecil then went on to put to the House the two great arguments, that a man must be at liberty to follow his conscience and that there is a higher law than the law of the State. Our readers will desire to have the speaker's own words on these two points:—From The Friend (London).

I.

"Let me remind the House of some of the cases which will be included in this disfranchisement. They will include the Quakers, who are working with the ambulance unit abroad. How is it possible to justify setting them below all those bad people of whom I have been speaking. They have gone out and they are serving. They are even running great risks. I do not agree with the scruple which has led them to refuse military service, but who can say that they are not well and honorably employed? I want the House to fix its mind on those and other objectors of the Quaker sort. I do not mean only those who belong to the Society of Friends, but those who belong to other religious bodies, simple-minded people, perhaps, under the influence of a mistaken scruple who say, 'We are sorry that we cannot fight in the war, because of the guilt of shedding blood will lie at our door.' The first observation I will make about that is, that according to the common religion we believe, holding the view that they do, they are bound to act as they do. To those who in all sincerity think it is wicked to fight in war—for them it is wicked to fight in war—it ceases to be a mere delusion, and it becomes truly operative upon the conscience. As I pointed out during the Committee stage, this is a principle which we are bound to recognize, and we do recognize it in our government of other races. We do not impose on them what they foolishly and superstitiously believe to be wrong. We never require Mohammedans, or Hindus, or any other race which has a different moral standard from our own, to violate their own conscience. We do this not only on the ground of policy, but because we think it right to do it. Although some particular scruple may be superstitious, we think that to violate it is in truth wrong. On the first point, then, of going before a higher tribunal, we find that objectors are right, and they are bound to obey their conscience. What, then, can we say in this case? We can only say their conscience is mistaken. But are you going to disqualify people and punish them for being mistaken in their opinions? If you do you are surely back again to the old familiar ground of religious persecution. Certainly if I held that view, that you might disqualify for opinion, I should not begin with the conscientious objector. I should begin myself with Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, and many other classes, and I am not sure that my right hon. friend himself would escape before my disfranchisement was complete. It is to me quite as clear that the Presbyterians are mistaken on the points in which they differ with the Episcopalians as that conscientious objectors are wrong about military service. Both propositions seem to me to be perfectly plain.

"That is always so in these matters. Very good people have over and over again felt bound to impose their views because they were so certain that they were right—and I do not think that they were always wrong—but the point is that we have come surely to the conclusion that it is both impolitic from the point of view of the State and also inconsistent with the best interests of religious truth to punish people for erroneous opinions. I say, therefore, when we come to argue it on that ground, that we must either adopt the position of religious persecution or we must say, as I say, 'Yes, you are mistaken, but I am not justified in forcing your conscience, because it is against my own conscience to do so, and therefore I give you exemption.' I thought that was the position that Parliament took up, and I am persuaded that it is the right position for Parliament to take up. We must not refuse the vote to people who are doing what they sincerely believe to be right upon moral or religious grounds merely because we think that these moral or religious grounds are mistaken. If you do not adopt that position you must disfranchise a great many people besides conscientious objectors.

II.

"But, above all, I feel most strongly—and this, I confess, is why I care about the controversy apart from the strength, as it seems to me, of the case—the danger of the particular error into which my right hon. friend [Bonar Law] for a moment slipped last night. I am most anxious that this country should maintain the proposition that there is a higher law, that we view with admiration any appeal to that higher law, and that we will not listen to the doctrine that the State's interest is to be supreme, but on the contrary that we will make our authority conform to the higher standard and keep the State within its proper function, and within its proper scope. Belief in the State cannot help us to bear the sufferings or control the passions of the war. It is a barren faith, as well as a degrading faith. It does but enumber us and shut out from us that higher world in which we ought to live. It is like a mist that hangs round the surface of the earth, and beyond which the sunlight and sky of the higher life shine serene. I was taken up in an aeroplane on a misty day, and all was hazy and dark below. We passed through, and there was the sun shining in strength and the sky radiant and brilliant; the mists were no more than a white carpet beneath our feet. So we ought to rise, if we are to face the dangers and difficulties of this war, above the belief in the doctrine of the State. We ought, on the contrary, to maintain that the State must conform to this higher law, and so we say as against the Germans. But shall we even return to ourselves that self-respect which is essential in maintaining a great moral cause if we do not act up to our own principles for which we are fighting in the face of Europe, if we do not say to ourselves and in our own country when people are acting conscientiously that their conscience must not be forced, and when they obey their conscience that they must not be punished and disabled for so obeying, because that is the allegiance we owe to the higher law we obey, and because so we must act as citizens of the true city of the new Jerusalem which is the mother of us all?

It is in the belief in that higher region of allegiance, which imposes upon us something more than the State can ask from us, and which gives us something that the State can never give, that we should vindicate the great cause that we have in hand. We are fighting, we sometimes say, for civilization. I should rather say that we are fighting that civilization may remain a Christian civilization, and certainly, according to a Christian civilization, it is wrong to force the conscience of the sincere. It is wrong to impose upon them a duty which they believe to be contaminating and corrupting. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be rejected. I hope it, first of all, because it is a retrospective law, and so contrary to all sound principles of legislation. I hope it still more because it appears to enforce the law of the State as superior to the moral law, and I am certain that if we give countenance to that way of thinking, we run the danger of becoming, as I fear that the Germans have some of them become, idolaters of the State, so that it is, indeed, the abomination that maketh desolate, a blood-stained idol, the Moloch of our time."

"To them that are perfectly humbled there is nothing lacking, neither bodily or spiritually. For why? They have God, in whom is all plenty. And whoso hath Him needeth nothing else in this life."

AS THOU WILT.

(This poem was judged to be the best of five hundred entered in a competition held by the St. Louis Art League.)

If in the sheltering circle of my arms
No little child of mine shall ever rest,

Yet for the sake of that beloved child
Of whom my dream is ever, night and day,
Teach me the mother spirit, tender, mild,
That from no childish need can turn away.

And if the love that I had held so sure
Grow dim and distant till it vanish quite,
Grant me that changeless love that shall endure,
Strong and sufficient for earth's darkest night.
Take from my heart all bitterness and pain
Until these futile, selfish strivings cease;
Use Thou the life I should but spend in vain,
And in the joy of service grant me peace.

—EVELYN DITHRIDGE.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

(Continued from page 317.)

I haven't had much chance to talk to the inhabitants yet. They are almost entirely confined to old women and children, though there are a few old men and just now a number of soldiers on leave to plant their crops. The French are working in a very practical and wholesale way around here on crops. They have tractors as well as horses ploughing large tracts of land and are making every effort to restore and preserve the fruitfulness of the land. But, of course, labor is scarcer than if so many men were not in the army and they are in consequence employing German prisoners to help them. We have to do a great many menial tasks to keep this place going. Yesterday, for instance, Edwin Zavitz and I put in the whole day sawing and chopping wood to cook by. I was well tired by five o'clock, but after supper I went over all the letters and papers belonging to this équipe. Fortunately, a very good man named Davies, also an Englishman, who speaks French, is running the kitchen and we have a cook, except for breakfast, which we get in turns for three days at a time. That means, of course, getting up at five or five-thirty and making porridge, tea and coffee, which is served at seven o'clock. We straggle out to our various jobs all over the village at about eight o'clock, come back to a hearty lunch at twelve and work again from one to five and have a dinner at six. We have plenty of war bread, butter and margarine; sometimes we can get meat, but there is none for sale in the village here and we have to send to Roye for it. We generally have a good generous soup though, and vegetables—potatoes, macaroni, peas or tomatoes—and a filling pudding made of vermicelli or bread—for, of course, we cannot buy flour, "cest defendu," but we made out last night to have some pumpkin pies with oatmeal crust.

I broke off here just before lunch to take a little walk through the village and get warmed up and found a woman and little boy with a bunch of flowers off to decorate graves. In fact, I think that they celebrate very much as we do on Memorial day.

I have been slating this week and if I keep at it much longer I shall be an accomplished workman. Some day I hope to make a water-tight roof, but the cold, the rain and the early darkness all continue to make it a very mean job and one is tempted to skip and not do all that is needed in order to rush it through.

We have sent already one man to Paris with appendicitis. Another was sent back with indigestion and chronic disgust—one to a hospital at Nesle with a carbuncle in his lip (a really serious infection), and one back to Paris to-day with a tooth-ache—all of which means letters and reports besides the general correspondence and hurrying up of clothes and blankets shoes, etc. We had a grand arrival yesterday of three uniforms, three overcoats and half a dozen corduroy working suits besides a quantity of shoes, heavy workmen's boots, with no fit but with hobnails, so that we hope before winter and mud really set in to have a complete outfit. I have been fixing up shelves, wires and nails in my room for my clothes, etc., and am now quite comfortable. Yesterday Fred Murray (grandson of Lindley Murray) and I robbed an old German ammunition dug-out of slatted boardwalk—we have an authorization from the military to do this—and this morning I have been laying it out in the garden so we can get around a little in the rain and wet. It rains here several times a day and the wind generally comes up with the squalls and makes the side of a slate roof a very cold as well as a slimy place to work.

This afternoon I borrowed a bicycle of the agriculturalists and rode to Nesle to see C. M., who is in the hospital there. I found him up and so much better that he was sawing wood for lumber, but I do not suppose he will be discharged until his lip heals up and there is no danger of further infection.

Our work here progresses, but mine had been sadly interrupted this week by the absence of our cook, who has had four separate and distinct excuses for taking four days off. I have cooked on two and a-half of these days and the diet of the équipe has suffered accordingly. Normally we only have to cook breakfast for which we detail two men. The meals on week-days, of course, are heavier and the work of keeping up a fire on a little wood cook stove with only two cooking spaces for sixteen men is considerable care. I have learnt by sad experience that the principal incentive to good cooking is a hot and steady fire and somehow I can't secure it with any regularity.

My experience with the people here is rather slight. We all speak to each other cheerfully, but I don't often get into conversation with them and find it pretty hard when I do. I find I can read French pretty well and it is very easy generally to understand the newspapers, but this patois of old women with no teeth, all of whom have a serious grievance about something, is very difficult.

Meanwhile our work goes on and we rub along with each other mostly without friction and certainly without any hard feeling, which is mighty satisfactory. In fact, the boys are panning out very high, indeed, quite up to the estimate I made of them at Haverford.

The people here are clamoring to get back into their houses and others want their barns fixed up right away so that Cross is kept very busy figuring out what we must do next. Fortunately I don't have anything like that to do and can go about my business as he assigns it to me without fear or worry.

This is a beautiful country and I certainly wish I had an automobile to enjoy it. It is mostly level and flat, but enough avenues of trees have been left by the Germans and the farmers and government have been so busy since the enemy abandoned it that the fields are beginning to smile again and once get your mind away from the destroyed houses and the robberies you can enjoy the landscape and the sunrise and sunset as if there were no war in the land. Sometime it will be over and then the real recuperative power of these people will be seen and I hope appreciated by the world. The dogged persistence with which they hang on and keep going at what little they can do is wonderful. When the men come back from the trenches I expect a transformation like that of San Francisco after the fire will take place all through this desolation and I certainly want to come back and see it. I thought once I should never want to visit the war zone after the war, but if I can find time and opportunity to visit these places where I have been I want to do it.

J. H. H.

THOUGH I have been trained as a soldier, and participated in many battles, there never was a time when, in my opinion, some way could not be found to prevent the drawing of the sword.—GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT.

SUSAN H. SHARPLESS.

In parting with our late Friend, Susan H. Sharpless, we feel we have lost a shining example of true Christian patience and submission to the will of our Heavenly Father.

Having allotted to her at times more and deeper sorrows than are common to most Christian travelers, she complained not. For two years she was deprived almost entirely of her eyesight and unable to leave her bed.

It was a great satisfaction to those so privileged to sit by her and feel the influence of her quiet, trusting spirit, and her example was a living testimony to the work of Divine Grace.

B. P.

LETTERS FROM PARVIN M. RUSSELL.

(Continued from page 316.)

Twelfth Month 30, 1917.

To His FAMILY:—

It has been a most delightful week, our third week of labor and play—with the days getting shorter and greyer, the trees dropping rapidly their summer coats, and the surprise of finding ice in a small pan out by the rain-barrel the other day. The nights are pretty generally cold and more or less damp, and it is something of a pull to get out of bed, and sometimes a little chilly when we go to work at eight, but the sun usually makes up for it by noon and we have several hours that still have a late summer touch to them. I have never appreciated before how much the success of outdoor work like ours depends on the elements. So we enjoyed it by starting in on a new job, where the end had been blown off of a small barn and exposed the tile roof to its worst enemy—the wind.

These pretty red tile roofs are picturesque and attractive, but in most cases they are just "laid on," and trust to their special overlapping to keep the rain out; but if anything happens underneath them, they lift off into the air quite readily. So in this case we had to board up the gable of one end to save the whole roof, and it was both awkward and difficult, since we had to do it so that our work would be above a brick wall which is to be built corresponding to the sides. In other words, we had to stand on air and build in the crossed part, and by the time it was completed to-day, with the tiles properly set and secured, I felt as though an Alpine mountain climber and a long-tailed ape both had certain very desirable qualities from the standpoint of house-repair! Just after a generous lunch to-day, the young boss of outside work—likeable English fellow—appeared while I was perched on the ridge pole, and delivered to the other chap and me, two good letters each! So down I clambered and we two got in out of the damp, cold breeze where we had a little fire snuggled down in a fireplace in the building adjacent to the little barn. And there we sat warming our toes, the floor around us littered with the debris of a once charming place; and with the good news from home to warm up the inside, it was a jolly little recess. From our places on an old box before the fire, we could look out on the whole landscape to the west because the efficient genius of destruction had blown out the entire side of the room. Evidently this had been some officers' quarters, for a low building just at one side contained two rooms well-cemented all over, with drains at the bottom, and up on the roof was a large metal tank, all of which indicate that probably the "boches" had a general shower bath there. As soon as we do a little more work and the mason fills in the tremendous hole in the side of one of the rooms of the house, the family—or remains of it—can return and at least have some place to live until further repairs may be made. There are so many things that are really essential that very little time can be spent on little unimportant things. Most of the immediate work is the repairing of slate roofs, which is a rather monotonous and chilly business, but somehow, it has been my lot to get the much more interesting carpentry work, and I am wondering how much longer I shall be so fortunate. It is really stimulating to see how much our little group of eighteen has accomplished in three weeks, and if the bad weather doesn't interfere too much, the village of G— will be slightly improved by the time Spring comes! It is rather comical to walk along the roads here, and see about every other house-top adorned by the figure of a reconstructionist in shapeless brown overalls; and especially when it is the "big Murray," who stands six feet five inches big! We are soon to have an outfit of corduroy coats and trousers for our outdoor work, which will be much better adapted to our needs than those thin khaki outfits we had at Haverford. There are also some small mattresses coming, for our little cot beds, and additional blankets for cold weather, so that we shall probably be pretty comfortable; if it gets too cold we will just put on two of something. It may be that I may want some things later, but now the only suggestion I have is that you might make up a little bundle of about eight or ten pair of those cheap cotton working gloves (fifteen cents a pair), I think, because the one pair I brought worked very satisfactorily, not being as stiff and clumsy as the heavier leather gloves that were supplied to us, and they are good for rough work that would soon wear out our knitted mittens.

Those bed stockings have certainly been just the things, and when the special sleeping bags come from England, we will be very well fixed, so don't worry about us the least bit. We are continually remarking on the exceptional conveniences and comfort of our quarters, and it is certainly much better than I had expected.

(To be continued.)

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"SEEK 'EM, KEEPER."

(Continued from page 319.)

When at last he spoke, his companion was astonished at the calm peace and trust in his face. "Thou art right," he said, "they have mischief in their hearts. That woman has evil in her face, but I trust that the Lord will preserve our lives." Thus he tried to cheer her; but seeing that words were no good and only added to her distress of mind, he again became silent and lifted up his heart in earnest prayer to God. His calmness quieted his companion's agitation. For a considerable time they sat and waited in perfect silence. Then James Dickinson spoke, "Yes it is His pleasure to deliver us, I feel it and know it. But if so, we must run." "Run?" questioned the poor woman forlornly. "How can we run? or whither can we go?" For answer James Dickinson lifted a heavy brass candlestick from the table and carefully examined the walls of the room, up and down all the way round. In one corner he found, as he had hoped, a second door almost hidden behind a heavy piece of furniture. Happily it opened outward, and, on pushing it gently open, he found he could squeeze through. Beckoning to his companion, he set the candle on the table, and then drew her noiselessly after him.

They shut and fastened the door on the outside, and soon found themselves at the top of a flight of stone stairs leading down outside the house. For greater safety they took off their shoes before descending the wet, slippery steps. Having done this, they noticed that there was a chink between the topmost step and the wall of the house, through which they could look down into the room below, whence a curious ssssing sound came up to them. James Dickinson signed to Jane to go on down the steps, and then, very quietly, he approached the chink and looked through it. His worst fears were confirmed. Down below he saw the woman, who had waited upon them shortly before, sharpening a knife at a grindstone! Up till that moment James Dickinson had followed Jane Fearon's intuitions and forebodings, but had not realized them as fully for himself. But, from that moment, their positions were reversed. How to save his friend's wife from the awful fate that awaited her as well as himself, became his one overmastering impulse. He determined not to tell Jane what he had seen. Hastily stealing down the wet steps after her, and arriving safely at the bottom, he caught her hand in his and together the two Friends ran as swiftly and as silently as they could, till they reached an out-building at some distance from the inn. This was the out-house, the wall of which they had seen on their first approach, looming through the mist.

Arriving here and finding the door open, they entered, and again sought shelter for a few moments from the driving rain. Poor Jane Fearon sank down exhausted, on a heap of dry leaves in one corner. But no sooner was she seated than James Dickinson said, "We are not safe here. We must run again." Jane gave a low cry. "Friend, I cannot go on," she said, "my limbs are so weary they will not carry me any further." Her companion looked very pitiful. "'Tis to save thy life," he argued. "To save thy life and to restore thee to thy husband, and to thy little ones. For their sakes I am sure thou canst and wilt." The words seemed to give new strength to the exhausted woman. She started up from the bed of leaves and hastened out of the shed. It was she who found a gate in the wall of the outbuildings, that had been left unlocked. They crept through it and hastened on once more, till they found themselves on the bank of a broad river, crossed by a steep, one-arched bridge. "We have been led to the right spot," Jane Fearon remarked with a sigh of relief, "how otherwise could we have crossed this foaming stream? If we follow it we shall be safe, for it floweth doubtless towards the South Coast." Her companion nodded his head in assent; but, no sooner had they set foot on the stones of the bridge, than he halted suddenly, stopped quite still, and appeared to be listening to some inner voice that the woman by his side could not hear. Instead, she heard the unwelcome words, "We must not go over this bridge. We are not safe yet! I have a leading that we must not cross the river here but go further down the bank."

The rain had almost ceased by this time. But it was now quite dark. They hurried on down the river's bank for some distance, till they came to a sandy creek, where, on the roots of an old tree overhanging the water, they again sat down to rest. But again the voice spoke and warned James Dickinson not to linger. "We are not safe even here," he said. "We shall have to wade through the river." Involuntarily his voice trembled, for he was by now almost as weary as the woman by his side, and the river was foaming deep. "Alas!" she answered. "How can we cross it? We do not even know its depth. It were better to let them take our lives, than for us to drown ourselves." Her courage seemed absolutely exhausted. Not even the mention of her husband and children could induce her now to face the cold, swollen torrent in the darkness. "Nay, nay," she repeated, "let them take our lives an' they will, but let us not bring our blood upon our own heads by drowning ourselves in that dark flood." But louder even than her wailing tones James Dickinson heard the voice of his Unseen Guide, "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and through the floods they shall not overflow thee." He himself was ready to obey, but how should he persuade his weak and trembling companion?

(To be continued.)

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 320.)

Above La Dorada or especially above the rapids of Honda, the country changes. The wet forests are replaced by an open plain, at certain arid seasons. This plain is narrow, enclosed by the two parallel ranges of the Andes, the Cordillera Central, and the Cordillera Oriental. On the lower river, even from Barranquilla itself, we had seen far to the east great mountains bearing snow. These were the Sierra de Sante Marta, and the mounts near Ocaña. Above Honda the western chain is higher, the great peak, Nevada del Tolima, is one of Colombia's highest and about 2,000 feet beyond anything in the U. S. A., seeming very near. It is but two days' trail from the railroad-route, either to it or to the nearby Paramo del Ruiz, greatest in all Colombia. As it is easily reached, I certainly plan to climb it before returning. (Paramo means the open lands above timber-grazing and is a word we should import into the United States.)

At Girardot, whence the railroad runs to Bogota, we stayed long enough to arrange our baggage. Then with a necessary part we set out by mules for Neiva. It took us seven days. We had five mules, two to ride and three for the cargo. An Indian was our "arriero," muleteer, for the trip. We had employed in Girardot a boy, "muchacho," really a married man of about thirty-five; him I have still with me, and he has proven very satisfactory. With this outfit we followed the trail for Neiva.

The route lies across a plain and is the highway not only to Neiva, but from Bogota to Silvia, Popayan, Pasto and all the south of this country. It is almost unbelievable that where a wagon-road could be so easily made and seems so indispensable there is none. We passed through many cartless towns, and in Neiva itself, the capital of a Department, with over 20,000 inhabitants, never a wheel stirs. Loads are carried, either on beasts or man (as frequently woman).

The sights of that trip I cannot forget. It seemed a going back to the life of the Middle Ages. I should have explained before this that with the change of country above La Dorada and Honda comes a change of population, the Negro disappearing, whites, or among the peons, Indians, replacing him. Instead of primitive huts we have adobe houses, severely plain and unattractive, but often roomy. Also towns are more frequent and pretentious.

Crossing the plains were occasional huts for the cattle-herders. But the towns could be seen far away, each clustered about the one large conspicuous building in it, its church (or often cathedral). These large churches seem very old, and nearly all date from Spanish days. The distant view of the town is preferable. Near at hand you see how dirty are streets and houses, and people, too, what an amount of disease is evident, and how poor all are. Beggars, afflicted with disease, are everywhere and insistent; often it seemed to us a large proportion of the town was of this class.

There seemed to be no work in progress, and the mystery to us was on what the people lived. Dr. Rusby expressed it once, "For what do they live?" They would throng out to watch us and follow us. Once when to obtain water we had to stop within half a mile of a town for a meal, we looked up to count twenty, of all sexes and ages, watching each mouthful. Our discarded wooden plates were quickly gathered up, and anything else we could be persuaded to leave. Such a hungry, animal-look some had! Another time, when we were camping near the "camino real" (royal highway—the trail) two leper-women passed, their all upon their backs—the most pitiable. I will add, most ghostly sight I have seen, eloquent of the popular ignorance of disease prevention.

Perhaps an explanation of the condition of the towns in the Upper Magdalena valley presented itself one day, when we had just crossed a new bridge over a river. It was a fine structure, the best of its class we saw. Suddenly, from some place and to vanish as completely, came a group of fifteen or twenty gentlemen and ladies, mounted on fine horses; they saw the bridge, rode over it and returned. Whence they were I could not tell; there were no houses near the camino fit for such folk. The explanation of their appearance, as of the poverty of the towns, is probably this; great estates held in few hands, these estates often enough idle, the owners being in Bogota or elsewhere far away. In this case the new bridge had attracted those who were within a distance to visit it.

In Neiva we found some of these great landlords, and with one of them whose possessions lay in and over the Cordillera Oriental we negotiated our business. It was a three days' ride to Balsillas, up the mountains into the most luxuriant tropical forests I have yet seen; begonias, fuchias and especially orchids, were abundant and beautiful, and other plants as fine but not so easy to tell of without describing. At last over the divide and down to the broad valley of a stream, which for several miles had been cleared of woodland. This clearing of thousands of acres, the end of the trail, so secluded that in the last revolution it was almost the only place in Colombia undisturbed, was Balsillas. There we stayed long enough to obtain the quinine bars.

At Balsillas they had to import pasturage, and for this purpose the broad-leaved or bitter dock, which we count such a pest, is most valued. Larger cattle or horses than those there I have never seen, simply magnificent creatures. There were many peons about the place, and they seemed a willing, contented people. It was cold there, average for the year but twelve degrees C. (about fifty-four degrees F.). About that it stayed during our visit.

Near there the manager (and I should tell of his hospitality, our princely fare, etc.) took us to a place he thought would be interesting for plants. It was, being a deep bog of sphagnum (such as yours), something we had not thought to see in Colombia. There seemed to be an endless variety about its border.

Returned to Neiva, we descended to Girardot by raft in about two days the distance it took us seven days to come. I have an excellent photograph of our "balsa," which was about twenty feet long, with a raised bamboo platform, over which the roof, covered with banana leaves, arched. You can have little idea of the pleasures of simply floating down stream—the balsa turning so as to face any and every direction—simply gliding down past cliffs, or towns, or grand clumps of bamboo—it was the most restful change possible after our ride over the Cordillera.

To-night, as I have been writing this, there have twice been decided and prolonged earthquake-tremors. We had hoped these were over. Of this subject more later.

(To be continued.)

THE PUBLICITY BUREAU OF TOKIO.

[Stanley R. Yarnall puts the following in our hands. It appeals to us as a most hopeful line of constructive work. We understand it originated in the fertile brain of Gilbert Bowles. Stanley R. Yarnall will gladly receive contributions toward the $600 it is necessary to raise.—Eds.]

ORGANIZATION AND MANAGEMENT.—The Publicity Bureau was established early in 1917 by the Japan Peace Society and the American Peace Society of Japan. The members of the Joint Committee of Management are:

Baron Sakatani, ex-Minister of Finance and ex-Mayor of Tokio; Dr. J. Soveda, ex-President of the Government Railway Board, Editor-in-Chief of the Hoshi Shimbun (a Tokio daily); T. Miyaoka, Legal Adviser to the Tokio Chamber of Commerce, Correspondent in Japan of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Prof. E. W. Clement, of the Tokio Higher School, author of "A Handbook of Modern Japan"; Dr. Doremus Scudder, pastor of the Tokio Union Church, former pastor of the Union Church in Honolulu; J. M. Gardiner, Architect, President of the Harvard Club of Japan.

The General Secretary is Isamu Kawakami, graduate of Waseda University and of Princeton University—he also studied in German universities. In taking up work with the Bureau, he declined an offer of a position in Waseda University. He had had the work of such a Bureau much upon his mind and had outlined the scope of such a Bureau before he knew of the plans of the two peace societies. He is a faithful student of the peace movement, of the whole international situation, and especially of American-Japanese questions.

Herbert V. Nicholson, Assistant Secretary of the American Peace Society of Japan, in co-operation with Professor Clement, is adviser and assistant in connection with English correspondence and other work of the Bureau.

OFFICE AND HEADQUARTERS.—When the Bureau was established, a temporary room was taken in the Tokio Statistical Society's building. Early in the autumn, permanent rooms were obtained in the new national Y. M. C. A. building, No. 10 Omote Sarugaku Cho, Kanda, Tokio. This is in the student centre of the city and it is hoped that the work of the Bureau in promoting peace study groups will be fruitful in its new home.

SCOPE OF WORK.—The Bureau was founded to meet a long-felt need for an efficient worker with office equipment, to give full time to educational and corrective work in the promotion of Japanese-American friendship and co-operation. Although the Secretary has had but a short time to organize and develop the work, the following, among other tasks, have been undertaken:

(1.) Editing the Japanese section of the monthly organ of the Peace societies, and furnishing much of the material for the English section.

(2.) Arranging for a conference of the Joint Committee of the Japan Peace Society and the American Peace Society of Japan for the discussion of American-Japanese questions.

(3.) Acting as business agent for the printing and distribution of a bulletin prepared by the League to Enforce Peace, this action carrying with it no expressed opinion of the Bureau as to the principles of the League.

(4.) Co-operation with the International Peace Committee of the Conference of Federated Missions (representing most of the Protestant Missions of Japan) in introducing to the Church Federation of Japan the work of the World Alliance for the Promotion of International Friendship through the Churches. This co-operation consists in placing at the disposal of the Peace Committee of the Federated Missions the machinery of the Bureau for the translation and distribution of pamphlets and the production of other literature dealing with the World Alliance. For the accomplishment of this and other work, the Federated Missions' Peace Committee received from an American peace organization the sum of $300. There is a probability that this plan of co-operation may continue. From the standpoint of the Peace Committee, this means economy in accomplishing work which it is fitted to do; from the standpoint of the Publicity, it means an opportunity to do work among Christian churches, with funds furnished by outside agencies. As Secretary of the Peace Committee of the Federated Missions, Herbert V. Nicholson is able to unify the work of the two bodies.

(5.) The study of "Pan-Asiatism" has been undertaken by the General Secretary of the Bureau, his conclusions to be published in the "Japan Peace Movement."

(6.) In the beginning of a Peace Library the Bureau is co-operating with the Peace Committee of the Federated Mission, which received last year generous gifts of peace books from various publishers and peace organizations.

(7.) The sending out of letters explaining the nature and work of the Bureau, answering questions and carrying on general correspondence and making frequent surveys of the press, are regular lines of work.

FINANCES.—The annual budget of the Bureau for the three-year period for which the two peace societies made the initial agreement is yen 2400, approximately $1200. The $800 pledged by the Japan Peace Society was given by Tokio business men. As the American Peace Society of Japan is dependent upon membership fees to meet current expenses, it was not able to furnish its half of the desired sum. The Society had for some time been in correspondence with Dr. Sidney L. Gulick as to raising this sum in the United States. A cable from Dr. Gulick early in the spring of 1917 pledged to the American Peace Society of Japan the necessary sum of $600 annually for three years. This was sent after conference with Philadelphia Friends, though they did not actually pledge themselves for this amount. For the current year the sum of $300, was sent by each branch of Friends. Herbert V. Nicholson reports that the loss by exchange has already been made up by interest on the bank deposit, which is drawn upon for monthly payments. The general items in the monthly budget of $100 are:

Salary of the General Secretary, $50; Room rent, postage, and stationery, travel, subscriptions to periodicals, etc., $50.

It is believed by those who are acquainted with the American-Japanese situation that the Bureau is just entering upon a work which will be very helpful in the promotion of a still greater measure of friendship and co-operation between the two countries. The need for such a Bureau is made more urgent by the fact that there are individuals who are known to be constantly working to create friction between the two countries.

THIRTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF FRIENDS' INSTITUTE, 1916-1917.

The usual activities of the Institute have been carried on in connection with new features of importance.

Over 14,000 persons have used the Institute and over 400 committee meetings have been held, attended by approximately 3500 people. Some of these committees which meet regularly at the rooms continue to contribute to our treasury in a helpful way.

The Institute has acted as host to two new activities this year: A School of Internationalism held classes for instruction in the Principles of Peace, during one week in Fifth Month. The attendance totalled over 1000, with well-conducted classes.

When in the Spring of 1917 the newly organized American Friends' Service Committee sought quarters, it seemed right to the executive officers of the Institute to offer the use of the first floor rooms in the building. These were occupied by the Committee during the summer months in connection with their very important work of attempting to advise with and to find lines of service for all American Friends in this time of great crisis for the Society.

As work and numbers of helpers increased the down-stairs rooms proved inadequate for the needs of the Committee. The two front upstairs rooms have accordingly been made the home of the Service Committee.

This necessarily increases the difficulty of providing comfortably for the many committees making use of the rooms. It was felt that the importance of the service as well as the desirability of centering the interests of Friends at the Institute would cause cheerful and loyal co-operation by all those who are thus temporarily inconvenienced.

The work of the General Secretary has developed and increased during the year.

The Card Catalogue has been kept up to date and has proved of great value.

The Secretary has been able to be of assistance to some Monthly Meeting Committees and to the Boards representing various interests among Friends.

He has also been in close touch with the Young Friends' Committee, some of whose activities have been:

Conferences in various sections of the Yearly Meeting.

A large General Conference held at Westmont.

A series of inter-meeting visitations.

We wish to acknowledge our appreciation of the work Harold M. Lane has accomplished and our regret that on account of the results of the selective draft he has had to give up his work for the present.

We are glad to have secured the services of Edith Stratton, whose interest in the work of young Friends makes her ably qualified to carry on that already begun.

Our membership is now slightly under 900, and we would call the attention of Friends to the need of continued and increased support if the Institute is to be able to carry on its work at this critical time.

On behalf of the Board of Managers.

FRIENDS' INSTITUTE NOTES.

Western District Monthly Meeting and the Institute opened their doors to the National delegates and local members of the Woman's Peace Party for their Annual Meeting, held Twelfth Month 6th and 7th. Jane Addams, the National Chairman, expressed in the meeting at Arch Street, held Fifth-day night and addressed by Norman Angell and Dr. Frederick Lynch, the deep satisfaction it had been to her and her fellow-believers in peace to come out of the military atmosphere by which they were continually surrounded, to the quiet and shelter of these Friends' Meeting-houses to discuss their international plans. She hoped they might carry away with them some of the deep strength which they had discovered here.

The installation of Alice D. Forsythe as stenographer for the Institute and its friends, seems to be filling a real need. A large part of her time is engaged in work for the Fellowship of Reconciliation and in keeping up card catalogues and other routine work in the Institute office. The remainder is open to engagement by committees and individuals wishing any kind of stenographic work done. Time will be reserved when possible for hurry-up work if the office is notified beforehand. Prices for work are posted on the bulletin board and at Arch Street Centre.

EDITH STRATTON,
General Secretary.

BARCLAY STRATTON, THE CONSCRIPT IN 1864.

HILLWYN STRATTON.

The review of my father's letters, written when with the army in the time of the Civil War, suggests comparison with present-day conditions. Friends' intimate relation with the anti-slavery cause, their active interest in the political situation, and their conviction that secession was wrong, all combined to persuade the public that the Quaker would this time lay aside his scruples and fight for his convictions and his home.

Barclay Stratton's neighbors, aside from Friends, did not share in this view, but prepared a paper, setting forth their testimony to his conscientious objection to war. Viewed from our maybe inadequate viewpoint, present-day conditions, unparalleled in magnitude as they are, seem to our Friends little more than the shadow of the hideous monster that then stalked in our land. Our systematic exemption, our organized relief and charity, eliminate to a degree the individual responsibility for testimony or for service.

Our New England Friends in their excellent epistle to us this year, question whether it shall be said that "we accepted exemption as entitling us to safe observation, from which to view, without sharing, the sufferings of our fellow-men. God has not exempted us from His service."

Barclay Stratton was drafted on the twenty-third of Ninth Month, 1864, and ordered to appear at Alliance, Ohio, on the third of Tenth Month.

From there he writes: "The officials did not doubt the sincerity of my views, and were it in their power would gladly release me, but as it is they will be obliged to forward me to Todd's Barracks, Columbus. . . . There he writes: "For the first time I passed the night in a military camp. I slept on a board, with a blanket for my only bed and covering. Being tired, however, I soon dropped asleep, and by frequent changing position, and exposing different parts to the board, I rested quite comfortably, and feel well this morning. I made my way to the Major's office about eight o'clock, found him very busy, but willing to entertain me a moment. I showed him my affidavit, which he hastily read, and agreed himself to forward it to Secretary Stanton, but said I was now in the service and would have to put on my soldier clothes, and drill with them, perhaps be sent to the front, before Stanton could be heard from. Later, being ordered to show our baggage, the officer wanted to know why I did not have my soldier's clothes on. I told him I was opposed to war, or taking any steps towards becoming a soldier, therefore could not equip myself in any way. He now ordered me pretty sharply, pointing out an office, to go there and change my clothes, but I declined. After a time, he came around again, and ordered me to follow him in here, where I have since remained. He now unrolled my clothes and ordered me to put them on. I still declined and a clerk sitting near and hearing my reasons, remarked, 'Well, then, if I was you, I would not do it either.' The Major was then called in, from whom I had reason to expect some harshness, but calling me into an adjoining room with two or three others, conversed very feelingly and differently from what I was expecting. I then briefly stated to him the circumstances under which I was here, what my principles had long been on the subject of war, and why I declined putting on the clothing, after which, placing his hand on my shoulder, he said, 'My friend, I admire your candor. You must put on the pants and jacket, and remain here until we can hear from the Secretary of War, who will relieve you, and you shall be exempt from any service during the interval, but it will not do for you to remain long inside the barracks in citizen's clothing.' I replied that I felt under great obligations to him and other officers for their kindness to me, but that consistency with my views would require that I should decline putting them on myself, but if they considered it their duty to put them on me, they could easily do it. He then told the clerk to put them on me, which he did in a very good-humored style, saying he did not blame me in the least for not doing it myself. . . . The major certainly made fair and I thought candid promises that I would be relieved, and I must gratefully acknowledge that his assurances that I would not be called upon to drill, muster, or be forwarded to the front, as hundreds have been since I came here, have all been realized thus far. I do not wish you to think I am impatient or over-anxious to get away from here, for no act of mine brought me here, and nothing that I felt satisfied to accede to or can yet see would have been justifiable, would have kept me away. Therefore there is but one way, and though it be in the cross, to humbly await the result, and trust to the all-sufficiency of that Power which is able to calm the roughest sea, and in His own time, which we may safely rely upon as the best time, to make a way for our release. I have somewhere read that not so much exemption from suffering as divine support under it was a remarkable feature among primitive Christians and ancient Friends."

After remaining at Todd's Barracks in Columbus for about two weeks, the reply from Secretary Stanton informed that he must do one of three things: be forwarded to the front, select hospital service, or a position among freedmen of color. He decided that he could make no selection, and consequently was assigned to the Sixty-second Ohio Volunteers, and sent south at once in pursuit of that regiment. They went via New York to Hilton Head, South Carolina, the trip consuming about ten days, where they failed to find the regiment.

(To be continued.)

FRIENDS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION MINUTES.

A meeting of the Friends' Educational Association was held at Friends' Select School, Seventh-day, Twelfth Month 15, 1917, at 2:30 p. m. The attendance was small, but those present felt well repaid for coming.

The address was given by Lida B. Earhart, Ph.D., one time instructor in Teachers' College, Columbia, and now Principal of one of the large public schools in New York City. Her subject was the "Relation of Proper Study to Good Teaching."

She said the aims of a teacher should be, (1) Physical development. (2) Knowledge. (3) Attitude. (4) Habits and skill. She said that the pupil's attitude toward the world and society had been greatly neglected in the efforts to fill him with knowledge. But she asserted that vastly more important than the dates of battles and facts of our early history or of geography is the pupil's attitude toward war, toward wealth, toward citizenship, toward pleasure.

She further emphasized the fact that these aims would not be realized without careful assignment of the lesson. The pupil must know not only where to find his material but what to look for and how to master it—whether it is valuable for its knowledge, its beauty or its moral aspect.

Although she made teaching seem a very live and very responsible vocation and impressed the necessity of living up to the wonderful opportunities it offered.

CAROLINE L. NICHOLSON,
Secretary.

REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.

A stated session of the Representative Meeting was held on the 21st. Gilbert Bowles, of Japan, was present by invitation. He gave the meeting a very clear statement of the complicated situation between America and Japan and China. No means of immediate service in the case seemed open to the meeting, but all felt better prepared to understand how important opportunities may soon come.

Evan Roberts, of Burlington and Bucks Quarter, has been appointed a member of the Representative Meeting in place of Joseph Middleton, who resigned because of advancing years. A memorial of George J. and Caroline C. Scattergood was approved and directed to the Yearly Meeting.

Letters had been sent to all Monthly Meetings in regard to possible pecuniary needs of conscientious objectors, and also in regard to Armenian relief. The exemption committee made an interesting written report which we hope to print in the next number.

There was some discussion of the use of the new record room at 304 Arch Street, and the Book Committee was instructed to prepare plans for the care of records and to propose this to the next meeting.

QUAKERISM AND THE INWARD LIGHT.

(The Friend (London) has been printing a discussion by correspondence of the well-worn subject (never, however, quite exhausted) of the Inward Light. The following letter is both brief and clear.—Eds.)

DEAR FRIEND:—

Richard Cadbury's letter revives the old "Beacon" controversy of the thirties of last century. The issue, however, is not fairly put when stated to be between an infallible light and an infallible book. Friends allot to each just that value and position which the Scriptures themselves indicate. The subject becomes clear, if we grasp the fact, that the light is an attribute of Christ the Saviour, who as the "Light of the world," enlightens the understanding of those who admit Him, in response to His knocking at the door of the heart.

The Scriptures were like the Gospel—"to the Jews a stumbling block." "Ye search the Scriptures," said Jesus to them, "and will not come to Me." So were they also to the Pharisee, Saul, breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the children of the Light, until, giving ear to the Spirit, striving with man (Genesis vi: 3), he inquired, "Who art Thou, Lord?" and was saved. "I refer you, my dear children," says William Penn, "to the light and spirit of Jesus that is within you, and to the Scriptures of Truth without you." J. H. PAYNE.

NEWS ITEMS.

OFFER TO AID HALIFAX.—Within a few hours after the Halifax disaster the American Friends' Service Committee was in telephone conversation with the Red Cross at Washington, offering assistance. Later a representative was sent to Washington and two representatives bought tickets to go to Halifax. It was decided that they should not go, however, after we heard from Washington that there was a great congestion of supplies and relief workers. A large number of workers and quantities of supplies that were intended for France were shifted to Halifax. The Red Cross assured us of their great appreciation of our offer of service, and an arrangement was made whereby we should furnish them with at least twenty-five men upon short notice if they should call upon us.

WESTTOWN NOTES.—Winter sports have begun unusually early this year. In the first week of the month we had three days of very good skating, and the snow that spoiled the ice for skating was deep enough to make possible a good sledding track. Following the custom of a number of years the track was built on the slope north of the girls' end. This year the ditch at the foot of the hill has been filled in and this has added much to the safety of the track.

The lectures and First-day evening talks to boys and girls continue to be times of great inspiration and instruction within the past few weeks.

Ian Stoughton Holborn lectured on "Socrates," and later in the collections told of his experiences at the time of the sinking of the Lusitania. Michael Dorizas lectured on "Persia," Oswald Garrison Villard gave the impression of a brave man on fighting against great odds when he told us of "Some Difficulties of Modern Journalism," Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell was equally inspiring in his straightforward and unassuming account of work in Labrador; and the First-day evening talks by J. Henry Bartlett and George L. Jones were very helpful.

Our meetings have been felt to be times of favor. Visiting Friends occasionally have messages for us, but it happens quite as frequently that we are brought into closer fellowship by the faithfulness of some member of the faculty or some boy or girl. Usually the messages that come in this way are brief, but they are none the less effective.

The following is from a letter addressed to the Editors:

Our Friends have shown such a cordial interest in times past in making some of our foreign students at the University of Pennsylvania to feel more at home by kindly personal attentions to them, that I feel sure they will take additional interest in learning that a very advantageous property has been secured to serve as a headquarters for them in the immediate vicinity of the University. The Secretary of our Association, who has been in charge of this department for a number of years, with his wife, will live in the house to give a touch of home atmosphere. We hope to be able to have it occupied and in running order by the first of the year.

It has occurred to me that some of our readers might be interested in contributing furniture to meet the needs of the building along that specific line, so I lay this opportunity before you in the hope that some may feel in a position to help out in this way. In times like the present we cannot help but be impressed with the very great need for the wisest possible internationalism, for one of the chief reasons for the existence of war is the failure of our nations to fully understand one another's points of view and to base their actions on fundamental Christian principles. From experience in other Universities we know that a house for a headquarters such as we have secured will serve to break down race prejudice and to build up a sympathetic feeling through friendly intercourse amongst the men who come to us from some forty-four different countries.

If any of our Friends are able to help in meeting this need we shall be glad to hear from them. They may communicate with us by calling the Christian Association of the University of Pennsylvania on the telephone—Barling 100.

Very sincerely,

EDWARD C. WOOD.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

OUR OWN WORK AND THE MULTITUDE OF OTHER APPEALS.

As the war goes on we shall pass through the same grueling experience as that of England, France and other war-stricken countries. The appeals for money will increase in number, in frequency and in the sums required. No person of ordinary means can respond to all. No religious denomination can scatter its effort and accomplish any one thing effectively.

The problem is one of choosing, as individuals and as a church, the channels through which we shall serve.

Not long ago there was conducted in a Friends' western college a campaign for the Y. M. C. A. fund and several thousand dollars were raised. In this college there has been no campaign for our own war relief work, although more men from this college than from any other are members of our Reconstruction Unit.

In a Friends' Boarding School in the East a very active subscription for Armenian and Syrian relief has been carried on, but there has been no effort whatever to raise the urgently needed funds for our own work.

If the call to service came to Friends only as individuals some of us might very properly serve in one channel and some in another. The call, however, comes to us as a body. In the first place, our denominational life is itself a great resource which should be used to the full at such a time. In the second place, Friends, as a body, are increasingly before the public eye and are forced to answer the question as to what great service we are willing to render. A varied service of individuals or of local communities scattered among the host of relief enterprises could never be an adequate answer to this question. The only effective answer must be a work which is a definite distinct expression of all Friends, a work not only stamped with the Quaker name but infused with the Quaker spirit.

We would never be justified, of course, in doing something that did not greatly need to be done merely for the sake of organizing a district denominational work. We have been called, however, to do a work that does need greatly to be done, a work that almost no one else in the world is doing. The need of the millions of the civilian populations of the war-stricken lands is perhaps the greatest single need in the world.

The opportunity that has come to us to minister to this need is perhaps as great a call as ever came to a body of people.

Amid the few relief organizations that have been working in France, the Friends' work has been officially recognized by the French government and the American Red Cross as the largest and most effective. Although the Red Cross has brought to bear upon the situation a wonderful organization and a group of highly qualified experts, they have scarcely anyone to actually do the work these experts plan except members of the Society of Friends.

The above facts have been told over and over again, but it seems advisable to narrate them again in connection with this problem of whether we shall concentrate back of our own work, or shall scatter our efforts and money in work that is not distinctly our own.

The American Friends' Service Committee has never suggested that Friends withhold support from other activities toward which they felt a special responsibility to contribute. Much less has it been disposed to belittle the tremendous worth of the many other organizations that bespeak our support. Our sole purpose in this connection is to describe our own distinct work and to ask Friends to earnestly consider whether their responsibility does not lie in providing it support. The tasks calling for our service are so great and our numbers are so few that we cannot possibly succeed unless all Friends concentrate behind our own work. The question thus becomes, whether we shall or shall not maintain our distinctive work.

SEND PACKAGES TO FIFTEENTH AND CHERRY STREETS, NOT TO 20 S. TWELFTH STREET.

Friends are kindly requested not to send packages to the offices of the Committee at 20 S. Twelfth Street, but to our store-room at Fifteenth and Cherry Streets.

EXPRESS SHIPMENTS SHOULD BE WAY-BILLED AT THE TWO-THIRDS CHARITABLE RATE.

Persons sending packages by express, whether prepaid or collect, should claim the two-thirds charitable rate, and should see that the local express agent way-bills the goods at this rate and marked "Charitable Shipment."

MISSION DEB AMIS, GRUZY, SOMME, TENTH MONTH 28, 1917.

DEAR QUAKERISM CLASS—COLLECTIVELY AND INDIVIDUALLY:—

Somewhat over six months ago—and it seems very clear to me now—we were all stirred by the question of what we shall do. Now that the "doing" is actually in progress, I feel like sending you greetings, and making some account of myself, for it is clear that we are still united in our desire to do our parts, and that circumstances have largely determined the channels for this service. So it is with no sense of addressing "stay-at-homes" that I write—merely to tell a little of a story that already has many interesting (to us) chapters.

1. Of Havertord you have all heard. Our doings were well related in numerous places—but those days of easy living and calm, smooth sailing now seem far, far away in time as well as space. We had good times; we were conscious of ourselves as a unit; we were constantly aware of an organization, of rules, of penalties, of high calls, of regular work—but there was almost no time to get acquainted with fellows outside the eight men in your own squad.

2. Shipboard—Here again we were made conscious of the machinery of organization—typed sheets of the daily program would be circulated like menus—and like some menus they were so crowded that we seldom had time to enjoy the dinner—or the quiet rest of sailing, in this case. But on shipboard we did get acquainted—those fifty of us who came in the Rechenbau—and that made us realize how we'd not been really acquainted at Havertord. It was a splendid trip and many of us were wishing we'd be a few days late in order to have more time on the sea. But when we were not even allowed to sing, in the danger zone, we were glad enough to find ourselves between low grass-covered shores one early dawn and to see the ships and color—the many colors, so bright and gay, after our days of blue and grey—and our first French villages and long lines of poplars and the characteristic church steeples.

3. Bourdeaux we took by storm, departing within three hours after our arrival. One of the dramatic experiences that have added spice to our lives was this unexpected night trip to Paris. We had looked longingly toward a good rest in Bourdeaux and instead we sped to Paris variously draped about the floors, aisles, baggage racks and a few lucky ones on the benches of two third class coaches, comforted by a package under each man's arm—a package containing three hard tack, a can of deviled something and a bottle of some carbonated stuff. But it was so novel that even at the time it was fun, and the two soldiers who were in with us were interesting company. One of them on finding us to be Americans started around kissing every one!

4. It would be hard for you to fully realize the satisfaction and joy we felt upon reaching Paris and finding that group of English Friends to greet us and to tell us the answers to the many, many questions that were still in our minds. I learned right there that we were to go directly into the field with the English Friends—that we were to wear their gray uniforms with the red and black star on our arms and caps and the red cross on our lapels and A. R. C. on our shoulders—that there exist—for certain lucky souls—papers called Carnets (some seventy-six pages of red tape), that permit one to enter the war zone—you are lucky if you get one—the process in the past having required any amount of time up to six weeks. So much in one short hour made all thoughts of the thousands of rail ends we'd been bumping over all night completely vanish. Then, too, Paris was before us—she smiled her prettiest. And there we met J. Henry Scattergood to whose whole-souled friendliness we were immediately attracted as have been to all the officials through whom we had been working to smooth out the road for our service. The three weeks in Paris which passed before our Carnets arrived were well spent with French lessons and sight-seeing, and towards the end as the list of sights still to be dug dwindled, many found work in various store-houses moving goods—labor was scarce and strong arms much appreciated. Of course a good number were sent down to Ormans and Dole soon after the arrival; they did not need the Carnets required by those of us assigned to the war zone. Our departure was sudden. Without any warning the all-powerful papers arrived and next morning early we were traveling north-east towards Loynes (this time in the luxury of first class on free passes).

NOTICES.

THE hour for holding the First-day Meeting at Springfield, Pa., has been changed to 11 A. M. The Bible Class meets in the Meeting-house at 10.15 A. M. The attendance of interested Friends will be welcomed.

THE women members and attenders of Twelfth Street Meeting are cordially invited to the Monthly Meeting Room on Fourth-days, 2 to 4.30 P. M., to sew for Friends' Emergency Service.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.30, 8.21 A. M. and 2.44 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

THE CLOTHING DEPARTMENT of the American Friends' Service Committee is now prepared to supply patterns of foreign garments to any individuals or Monthly Meetings that wish to do relief sewing. Our patterns have been made according to directions received from English Friends by the Home Pattern Co., of New York. They represent the most accurate form of instructions for making foreign garments which we have been able to obtain. They may be had from Anne G. Walton, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

DIED.—Eleventh Month 24, 1917, PHIBBE ELLYSON, widow of Robert Elyson, Sr., in the ninety-fourth year of her age; a member and Elder of Middleton Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

_____, on Twelfth Month 8, 1917, MARY T. BALINGER, widow of John H. Ballinger, aged seventy-seven years; a member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting, N. J.

WM. H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS,
No. 422 WALNUT STREET, PHILA., PA.

FOUNDED 1865.

THE PROVIDENT LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY

OF PHILADELPHIA

Insurance is Protection—Insurance is Saving—Insurance Establishes an Estate.

How can a man begin better than by taking a practical Provident policy?

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER

S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co. COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: LOCUST 241
RACE 661

WISSAHICKON INN REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

W. B. WEAVER UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE

ESTABLISHED 1880

HARRY S. LEE 313 WALNUT STREET PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

WM. H. PILE'S SONS BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School SWARTHMORE, PA.

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for the Winter Term, 1918:
"The Life of Christ," "The Hebrew Prophets," and "Church History," by Elbert Russell.

"The Adolescent Age in the First-day School," by William Byron Forbush.

"International Organization," by William I. Hull.

"The Development of Religious Thought," by Rufus M. Jones.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," (To be announced.)
Term begins First Month 7th.

ELBERT RUSSELL,
Director.

THE OSCEOLA ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER
GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST.

PHILA.

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic ALL WEAVES Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

Your child needs a

SHETLAND PONY

to ride, drive, and grow up with.

HARTZELL BROTHERS, SEBRING, OHIO.

ESTABLISHED 1883.

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50

1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

by freight or express, f. o. b., Coloma.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family Home of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolleys.
Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—BY AN OFFICE OF "THE FRIEND," a position in mercantile line, with a firm of Friends or other Christian denomination.
Address, care of "THE FRIEND," 207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—IN THE J. LEWIS CROZER HOSPITAL, Chester, Pa., ten (10) young women of good character, between the ages of 19 and 35, in the training school, giving a general training. Special work given in diseases of children. Location of hospital good, grounds covering forty acres; comfortable home life for nurses.
Apply to HOSPITAL, S. K. Utz, Superintendent.

WANTED—ANY FRIENDS' BOOKS OR WRITINGS, or any reading matter pertaining to the Society of Friends, which any Friends can spare or send to help make a collection. All highly appreciated and cartage paid.
Send to JEREMIAH C. ALLEN, Boykins, Va.

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.

Prepared under the direction of and published by the Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs.

This book is printed and in process of binding. Orders received now will be filled very soon, perhaps at once upon receipt of order.

12mo, 270 pages, illustrated, bound in extra cloth, gilt top, postpaid, $1.50

FOR SALE BY

CENTRAL OFFICE, FIVE YEARS' MEETING,
Second National Bank Building, RICHMOND, IND.

WALTER H. JENKINS, Stationer
140 North Fifteenth Street, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE
304 Arch Street, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FRIENDS' BOOK AND TRACT COMMITTEE
144 East Twentieth Street, NEW YORK CITY

WILLIAM S. YARNALL MANUFACTURING OPTICIAN

128 SOUTH SIXTEENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY MANUFACTURERS

PHILADELPHIA

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN

JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

THIS trusty man is applying Rhoads Preserver to a Rhoads Belt working in the Rhoads factory, thereby keeping down the cost of Rhoads products. It pays to use Rhoads Leather Belt Preserver.

J. E. RHOADS & SONS

PHILADELPHIA: 12 N. THIRD ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.

NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
BALTIMORE AGENCY: 37 S. CHARLES ST.
FACTORY AND TANNERY: WILMINGTON, DEL.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES
Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2066.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
1714 SANSOM STREET

Engraving and Printing
FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY

Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting
Cards, Die Stamped Writing Paper

TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

GIRARD TRUST CO.
BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian,
Administrator, Assignee and Receiver.
Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults.
Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 3, 1915.

No. 27.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

SUCCESS IN DEFEAT.

Speak, History, who are Life's Victors? Unroll thy long annals and say,

Are they those whom the world called the Victors? Who won the success of a day?

The Martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans, who fell at Thermopylae's trust?

Or the Persians and Xeres? His Judges, or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?

—"Io Victis." —W. W. Story.

FEAR OF CANT.

The expression of one of our correspondents of draft age seems to us rather clearly to set forth the position of not a few of those who now find themselves in increasing numbers face to face with questionnaires and speedy calls to the cantonments. He says (in substance) that he can not become a soldier without violence to his ingrained conviction, but that to put religion to the fore in the matter would very properly lay him open to the taunt of assuming "the religious cloak" for the occasion. So far, in his life, save for the convention of meeting attendance and a happy association in the social and educational privileges of the Society, there has been no special mark of the religious character which now is supposed to make the legitimate defence for exemption. How is he to talk and act religion in this emergency without a measure of hypocrisy? Is this the only possible line of defence in a case like this?

Whether intended or not the Federal draft act does in measure meet this situation. The fact that it provides exemption should once and for all exclude the possibility of any taunt of lack of courage or of patriotism in those who accept it. How can a situation fully prescribed by an act of Congress be anything but honorable? The same act that makes a soldier, makes the C. O., and defines his relationship to the President. To revile him, or punish him for that, is plainly disrespectful to the "sovereign power" of our nation. Such a line of treatment certainly could not be carried far, without the intervention of Congress, unless it is willing to have its authority set aside. Nor is this matter, so far as Congress is concerned, left to individual caprice. As we have often said, we should have rejoiced if the act had recognized (as the authorities in places seem to do) the involubility of personal conviction. As if fearing the confusion of such a basis the easier one of loyalty to a religious sect was prescribed. So it comes about that exemption is a clearly-defined political right. Those who are loyal members of any of the prescribed organizations can claim it with the sanction of this denomination. As some, however, have not made the claim, the military organization comes in places to look upon the test of personal conviction as quite within their purview. We need not dispute this—indeed, the more the fundamental religious objection to war is disclosed the better. Is it not, however, true that a firm insistence by our young Friends upon loyalty to the Society defines one's position? Is it apart from the intent of the act to claim that the exemption follows as specifically for those who have a right to it, as that soldier training follows for others? There is, it seems to us, a distinct basis for such claim without the least bit of cant. Some of those actually most religious amongst young people (this is not confined to the Society of Friends) have the greatest reluctance to claim anything for their religious life. If the conditions at camp, or if the preliminaries of being called to camp bring such to the place of honest confession, so much the better for them. They, however, surely have honorable ground to stand on if they feel it impossible to express their convictions in religious terms.

This subject of fear of expression in the religious life apart from its connection with the draft is of no ordinary moment to all the denominations involved in exemption. The war has disclosed a great need. What is to be said of our system, or lack of system, of religious education, if our young people can come to maturity and feel that they can not mention religion without the taunt of cant? Certainly something is fundamentally wrong. We should not wait till the war is over to seek the remedy. The Young Friends' movement has the matter greatly at heart. It is an important agency in all denominations to assist in overcoming unnatural reticence. But we do not hesitate to say that there are very deep fundamental defects in our system along this line. Theoretically such a principle as that of the priesthood of believers, referred to in the following article, should release us from many trammels realized under a professional system. Have we used such principles with this end in view? Is there not undeveloped territory along these lines, in homes, in schools, in meetings? Is there any more fitting subject for conference amongst us than this of how to make the religious life a real part of the expression of our every-day activities? The war situation has elicited this expression in some unexpected quarters. If the national government assumes that our young men are grounded in religious principle must it in large part seem to be a false assumption because the power of expression has not been rightly developed?

J. H. B.

506 CYRUS COOPER
R. P. O. NO. 2

THE DEARTH OF MINISTRY.

That there is a great dearth of spiritual and formative ministry in our meetings is patent to every exercised soul. Not that the silence is not often broken, though there are not a few of our smaller and less accessible meetings where the word of ministry or the language of supplication is very seldom heard; but the abundance of utterance leading apparently nowhere in some places, and the complete absence of utterance year in year out in others (unless a visiting Friend with a concern is present) is a condition that ought to produce serious searching of heart.

We are not unacquainted with a form of ministry which might be called for want of a better term "rhapsodical." It is very solemnizing while it lasts, but the question arises how much of it is retained as a positive Divine gift from the Master through the servant to those to whom he has been sent? Paul said that in the church he had rather speak five words with his understanding than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue, even though he might admit the Divine origin of "the tongue." A good deal of the rhapsodical ministry partakes of the spirit of the latter and not of the former. It causes the Divine feeling springing up in the heart of the minister to overspread the meeting, but "the understanding" of the hearers "remaineth unfruitful." Nothing positive is lodged in their spiritual perceptions which survives the solemnity of the moment, even where soulful emotion has not been altogether confounded with "the demonstration of the Spirit."

We plead with the apostle Paul for the edifying ministry of the "five words with the understanding." We are persuaded that these few helpful words of counsel or warning, of comfort or doctrine, of the adoring confession of the Lord Jesus before men or the expression of a spiritual concern, have often been needlessly withheld, to the deprivation of the meeting and the hurt of the one who by withholding has quenched the Spirit. And why this frequent withholding? Is there a lurking fear at the back of the mind that to make a vocal offering in the public gathering is a putting oneself forward as a candidate for eventual acknowledgment as a "minister?" Out of such a fear springs the evil of incipient clerisy, that is the heresy of regarding ministering Friends as belonging to a special class, the denial of the fundamental doctrine of the new covenant, the priesthood of all believers, which is the avowed basis of our Society.

We cannot but believe that the Head of the Church still pours out the gifts of His Spirit upon us, and that if they are not in exercise, it is either that they are buried in the earth of worldly affairs, or that the fear alluded to puts a false check upon their free expression.

The Society of Friends was gathered by means of devoted ministry. Thousands flocked to hear the young men with their burning message of a Light within every man pointing out the way of healing and holiness in that blessed Redeemer whose saving Light it was.

Those who received their wonderful evangel were glad to wait in the silence upon further manifestations of that holy power which had convinced them. But if they thus waited in the silence, they did not wait upon the silence. They expected, and they were not disappointed in their expectations, that lips purged by altar fire would be opened to the exalting of the Lord and the consolation of the people. And no wonder the spiritually hungry came in their crowds to these pentecostal Quaker assemblies.

Simple-hearted obedience to every prompting of the Spirit in however small degree will be no inconsiderable factor in preparing the way for a revival of those early days.

It is recorded that when a false passivity, partaking more of the nature of "quietism" than of that living silence which had been so fruitful in the best days of the Quaker movement, began to stifle the young life, George Fox arose in a meeting with these words: "Preach, lads, preach! For if Christ does not preach, Antichrist will." Would he say that to us also?

MAX I. REICH.

REPORT OF THE EXEMPTION COMMITTEE.

TO THE REPRESENTATIVE MEETING:—

A large part of the activities of this Committee for the past six weeks has been in connection with the work of the office, at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

In addition to a circular letter giving some advice and data concerning the dates of the establishment of our Monthly Meetings, we have shared with the Peace Committee of the Yearly Meeting the responsibility for the issuance of a twelve-page booklet of information regarding the Government Selective Service rules, and more particularly, parts of the Questionnaire which is now being mailed to men of draft age all over our country.

The demand for this publication has been large; some 5000 copies in all having been printed.

The many responses in various ways from our young men has shown their appreciation for the work bestowed.

On request, a considerable number of copies of the pamphlet were sent for distribution among the young men of Ohio Yearly Meeting.

There have been many calls at the office at 304 Arch Street as well as conferences elsewhere from individuals for consultation on the draft situation in its varied bearings, and it has been interesting to note the almost universal sentiment of the callers in support of our well-known testimonies in opposition to all wars or preparation therefor.

An effort is maintained to keep in close touch with our members who are being detained in the military cantonments near us as well as in those at a distance.

These men are waiting with varying degrees of patience for the President's definition of non-combatant service; the withholding of this decision is a real trial to our Conscientious Objectors, who would very much prefer to be engaged in some constructive work, provided it is not connected with the military establishment.

Indeed, it requires a much higher degree of moral courage to remain unoccupied in camp, subjected in some cases to repeated threatenings, as well as slights and sneering remarks, than to perform any military act which might be required.

We are now formulating plans which, if they meet with the approval of our young men in the camps, should provide for them a definite course of study and constructive reading, occupying probably four hours per day; this should prove a great relief to the tedium of the day's uneventful program as it now exists.

Compared with the experiences of English Friends who are actually in prison, our members in camp are comparatively free, yet there have been, and there continue to be, cases of much discomfort which should not exist. Personal visits to the camps have, in large measure, corrected numerous troubles, though the C. O. seems in some camps to be the object of disrespect, if not hatred, particularly by subordinate officers.

So far as we can gather, our men have been able to exhibit a Christian spirit, though at times poorly fed, and otherwise sorely tried.

The Questionnaires under the new Selective Service regulations will have been distributed to all registrants in less than a month from this date, which means that, with other men of draft age, all of our members who have not been called for examination, as well as those previously exempted, will soon be put to a severe test as to their convictions regarding military service.

We are renewedly impressed with a sense of our duty in rendering to these our fellow-members, our united sympathy, craving for them sufficient strength to enable them to endure the trials of faith which they are likely to meet.

While we do not want our young men subjected to hardship for conscience' sake, yet we hope to see a larger percentage of them remaining steadfast to our testimonies against war than has as yet been shown; the number having accepted military duty being more than twice as large as the conscientious Objectors.

At present we have in the military camps twenty-seven members. At Camp Meade there are six men, all but one of whom are C. O.'s; Camp Dix three, of whom one has accepted military service; Camp Sherman one, who is a C. O. Scattered about in different camps and in Washington, far and near, aside from the above, there are, so far as we can gather, twenty men, all of whom have accepted military service in one form or another. Nineteen of our men are engaged in reconstruction work in France under the American Friends' Service Committee. There are also, it appears, three men abroad, members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who have accepted military service.

It affords our men in camp much encouragement to receive visits from interested, sympathetic friends; spiritual strength has often been renewed by Gospel messages delivered at the barracks. These visits and messages have been quite frequent at Camp Meade during the past two months.

We have fewer members at Camp Dix, and visits to that place have been less frequent; we would encourage Friends to consider whether they have a duty in this service.

On behalf of the Committee,

Signed JOHN L. BALDERSTON,
ISAAC POWELL LEEDS.

PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Month 21, 1917.

THE HIGHER IDEALS AT WESTTOWN.

As the Fall term of this school year draws to its close, we can look back upon it with pleasure and satisfaction. Our various societies—Brightonian, Parliamentary, Rustic and Union—are flourishing. We have had a very successful season in soccer, with a pleasing percentage of victories. The general spirit, attitude and appearance of the boys' school have been most gratifying. You have been for the most part diligent in your work and have gone about your tasks in an earnest, business-like, manly way. There have been few cases for discipline, none serious; the monthly conduct grades have been consistently higher than usual. The relations between faculty and student-body have been most pleasant, and you have shown commendable interest in the problem of the School. The formation of the School Council has tended to develop initiative and a sense of responsibility.

This thoughtful, earnest spirit has also been manifest in our meetings for worship. We have settled down promptly and quietly into the spirit of worship, and with few exceptions the meetings have been characterized by life and power—a life to which the pupils have distinctly contributed.

The causes for this satisfactory condition are many. The School has been chosen with considerable care; its morale is noticeably high. It possesses considerable initiative, and appears able to carry responsibility. The Senior Class has very marked ideas as to its duties and obligations. There is a rather wide variety of out-of-school activities, which keep your energies at work and your minds active. You have respect for the faculty and confidence in its judgment, and the faculty places confidence in you. And most of all, you appear to be guided even more than ever by conscience—by the desire to choose right for right's sake.

And back of these causes is the contributive factor of the intangible but positive influence of the hour. Sacrifice, duty, conscience, service—these words are on every tongue. Not before for generations has the Society of Friends held up so emphatically before its youth the priceless character of liberty of conscience. Many causes have led our country into its present position as a combatant in war; that a sense of duty, misguided it may be, but none the less real, is one of those motives, stands undisputed. And this spirit you have caught; the earnestness of your brothers across the seas has made you more earnest, their devotion has made you more sincere, their courage has led you to face with higher resolve your daily routine of tasks.

And I want you to share in their sacrifice as well. We all believe in sacrifice; let us make it a reality. We have made financial contributions to various needs; let us do much more; and let our gifts represent wherever possible our own efforts or self-denial. For the Red Cross a hundred million dollars has recently been given; following hard on this our country pours out another thirty-five million dollars for the work of the Y. M. C. A.; one million of this is given by a hundred thousand boys who bind themselves to earn ten dollars apiece. Governor McCall pledges on behalf of his State of Massachusetts a million dollars for the disaster-stricken families of Halifax. Thousands of men are sacrificing their places in business out of devotion to their country. Many of our own old scholars, your brothers and relatives and friends, are toiling without pay, and frequently at their own expense, to restore the devastated homes in France, to bind up the broken hearts in Russia, to save life on the battle-fields of Italy.

Shall we not enter into their labors, share their devotion, and make this year at Westtown stand out among the years as one of self-denial and sacrifice.—From Address of GEORGE L. JONES, to the boys and girls in the concluding First-day evening of the Fall term.

A QUAKER INVASION OF A METHODIST SANCTUARY

WALTER L. MOORE.

The inaptitude of the term invasion in the connection of which we are about to speak, may be removed with the explanation that it was by invitation and not with hostile intent, and that its result was one of enrichment rather than spoliation, as admitted by those subjected to the inroad.

The sleepy little South Jersey town of Port Elizabeth did not appear as though anything of unusual importance was happening as it lay basking in the heated summer air that bright First-day morning when a company of Friends to the number of nearly a score in three autos rolled into its quiet precincts. The tide on the Maurice River (or Wahatquenack, if you prefer its Indian name) rose no higher that day because of their coming. For many years the unpretentious building of the M. E. Church had stood without denominational rival, unless exception be made of a withering offshoot which sprang up some years since as the product of a revival movement, and which now holds forth in a nearby diminutive building dubbing itself with almost sublime pertinacity, "The Pentecostal Church of the Nazarine."

The rustic parish folk were out in full force, and, as if to clear the way for the invited intrusion, were entered full deep into the ceremonial of their worship upon the arrival of their Quaker guests; its stated period having been offered as the time for the holding of their meeting by the latter. This courteous act was emphasized by the contrast afforded in respect to the method of procedure. The voice of the pastor could be heard intoning some godly admonition to his flock, with frequent expressions of approval from the seats of the Elders. Then Brother A. or Sister B. would start a familiar hymn, in the singing of which the congregation would presently join. Meanwhile, not to obtrude upon these people in their devotions, the Friends remained quietly without. One of their number with a penchant for graveyard meandering willingly accepted the proffered guidance of Captain G., who with others had remained without to welcome the visitors.

These old seaport towns are rather rustily linked to their past history by retaining a few men who with advancing age still briskly carry the appellation of captain; and the possession of one or more such individuals helps to lend distinction to many a little port whose maritime importance is slowly ebbing away. Captain G. was courteous and kind as a guide. Together we slowly passed along the grassy mounds mutely spelling out the names as headstone neighbored headstone, until we reached the spot that claimed his close regard. Tenderly pushing aside the hedge growth of box, the names of near kindred were revealed, while a newly-wrought stone close by showed where in less than two years' time had been laid the partner of his life's joys and sorrows. No need of words where silence is so profoundly eloquent! "One touch of nature makes the world akin." Stranger as he was, we began to love this man through the medium of our sense of his regard for things vital and sacred to humanity at large.

As the notes of the last hymn died away, and a closing word from the pastor inspiring his little flock to consider the joys of the Christian life had been spoken, the Friends entered and took their seats where kindly gesture placed them. A little group upon whom the real weight of the concern and service fell—they who knew the stress of the "gallery" seats at home—were passed beyond the railed enclosure behind which rose the pulpit upon which lay, huge in size, the Book of Books. Thus the Quakers were within the sanctuary, and, let it be confessed, it was not without some hallowed sense of the significance of the situation that they took their seats; since to them this environment meant but the acknowledgment of that which is all inclusive in the act of worship.

"Howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands, as saith the prophet, Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool; what house will ye build me? saith the Lord; or what is the place of my rest? Hath not my hand made all these things?"

Nearly was the organ, while, above all, in letters of gold glittered those words of deepest consolation to saint and sinner, "God is love." And herein was the real tie that bound us. What was to follow could but heighten a contrast already established as between the way of Friends in worship and that of these sincere-hearted people whose guests we were. Well said the mystic Gewmisse, "I can have true spiritual converse and fellowship with one who differs widely from me in doctrine if he meets me in the life realm, where my spirit has found its place of abode."

A few words by way of explanation of Friends' manner of worship were listened to with close attention, after which the congregation of about seventy-five persons fell readily into the spirit of the occasion. The silence that followed was of that quality which leads the soul into the inner spiritual sanctuary whence proceed the assurance of Divine help according to the believer's faith. Out of this felt presence arose a message which centered in the lesson that comes to us, even of this day, in the call of little Samuel of old, with its obvious teaching, that as we in childlike simplicity attend to the round of duties to which we may have been assigned, none may know at what unexpected time the call may come for a higher and holier service. The first speaker was followed by another who dwelt upon the Saviour's test of the efficacy of man's activity, "By their fruits ye shall know them," that the life of the Christian is not one of uniform complacency or of fulness of joy. Even the most devout soul will have its times of emptiness or depression, in accord with the experience of the Psalmist, "Why art thou cast down, O, my soul; and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him for the help of His countenance."

The meeting closed with a further word of explanation as to Friends' manner of concluding their meetings for worship; in this way an avenue of expression opened for two leading members of the congregation, one of whom stated that in the silent communion of the early part of the meeting he had been favored to draw nearer his Heavenly Father than at any other time he could recall in his life!

The history of Friends' connection with Port Elizabeth is both interesting and pathetic. The extensive broad meadows of the Maurice River, as elsewhere before the introduction of upland grasses, proved inviting to the agricultural settler. In the year 1700 a firm of Philadelphia capitalists of the name of Coates & Britton had the region surveyed and opened to settlement. The village of Port Elizabeth was laid out about the year 1700 by Elizabeth Bodely, of Salem County, and was made a port of entry. A Friends' meeting was soon after set up, which came to be known as Maurice River; this in 1805 was established into a Monthly Meeting, as by that time a large number of Friends from Gloucester and Cape May counties had settled in the neighborhood. Among the family names were found those of Buzby, Bradley, Dallas, Elkinton, Jones and Townsend. In the Ninth Month of the year 1810 a terrible storm accompanied by a huge swell caused the waters of the river to rise to a great height, resulting in the carrying away of miles of tide bank, while a number of homesteads were devastated and cattle perished. The result was so disheartening to the settlers that many returned to their former homes. A few Friends, however, continued to reside in the neighborhood, and to maintain the meeting, which was officially discontinued in 1855, though for some years afterwards occasional meetings were held. Several in the congregation on the day of our visit eagerly recalled their attendance upon these occasions and otherwise indicated their connection with Friends.

Some years since the meeting-house was removed, though the adjoining graveyard is still pointed out along the main street of the town. Somewhere in that now desolate, though hallowed ground, we were told, there stands a humble headstone upon which is carved the solitary letter B. This marks the last resting-place of the hamlet's founder. These slight things are all that remain in the pleasant village of Port Elizabeth to tell the passerby that here once dwelt and worshipped a Quaker band; that here were their meadowlands upon which they pastured their flocks, whilst up and down the river move their modest vessels carrying to and fro the products whose exchange made this somewhat isolated community a part of the great outer world.

BUCKINGHAM AND CARVERSVILLE.

E. TOMLINSON.

The twenty-first of Tenth Month, 1917, was an ideal autumn day, the woodland foliage was at about its most beautiful display of varied hues, and there was an inspiration to thankful appreciation of the manifold favors dispensed by the Bounteous Giver of every good and perfect gift in the invigorating air of the day.

In the early morning of this day, Samuel W. Jones, accompanied by his wife Florence Jones, left their home in Lansdowne, and by trolley and train reached Doylestown in due time to be met by auto conveyance to Buckingham Friends' Meeting, where a considerably larger company than usually assemble there had met for the hour of worship. A solemn stillness settled over the meeting, and a message of plain Gospel truth was left with them, in which they were all directed to the alone sure Foundation for succor and support in every condition of life being reminded that "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Many expressions were given of satisfaction with what had been communicated and desires that they might have more such meetings.

As on the previous visits of S. W. J. to Bucks County, there was a meeting appointed for the afternoon at Carversville, the invitations to attend which were generously responded to by the neighborhood generally, and a good meeting was felt to be the result. William and Martha Bishop were also very acceptably in attendance.

The condition of man through the fall of Adam, and the way opened for his restoration into Divine favor through Him, who is the Way, the Truth and the Life, were clearly and forcibly set before the worshipping company and all were encouraged to co-operate with that still, small voice which will direct them into the paths of true peace and lasting happiness. Earnest petitions also were raised to the Throne of Grace that all of every nation might so come under the government of the Prince of Peace that all occasion for war would forever cease.

Many of those present expressed themselves glad of this occasion. A visitor in the village who had not attended a Friends' meeting for forty years, was thankful for such a favored opportunity to renew acquaintance with that people.

These meetings have seemed to leave their impress on many minds and reawakened a more earnest thoughtfulness as to the realities of the more serious side of life, and there is a desire among the people that Friends may keep them upon their hearts and be faithful to any revealed duty to visit in this community, in the love of the Gospel.

DOYLESTOWN, Pa.

BARCLAY STRATTON, THE CONSCRIPT IN 1864.

DILLWYN STRATTON.

(Continued from page 332.)

From Hilton Head, South Carolina, he writes:

"We made our way to the Provost Marshal's office, to whom we are assigned until our regiment may be forwarded or we forwarded to it, from whom we received assurance, as far as words would go, that nothing would be required of us conflicting with our views while under his care. As it may be two or three weeks (and weeks are long here), we hope there may a release accompany the regiment, if it is right that it should be so. Should it be otherwise, I desire above everything else, that I may endeavor to wait patiently all the appointed time, and be preserved faithful in my small measure in the support of the principles of peace. My experience during my absence from home has confirmed me more fully that it is required of our Society to uphold the doctrines of peace, as in former times. I write this sensible of a great deal of weakness, and of my natural inclinations sometimes to give out, for the natural ties and endearments of home."

"Hilton Head is situated on a very handsome island, seven miles long, very sandy, and is said to be very healthy. There are a great many very honest, conscientious men in this company several of whom I have conversed with, and furnished reading matter, which they seem to value. I very much regret I have not more tracts to distribute, as they are so nearly exhausted that I now only lend them, and they are nearly worn out. My health is good as usual, and a great deal better than I would suppose it could be under the circumstances, and I feel altogether that I enjoy many favors."

In a little less than a week we find him writing from the steamer enroute for Fortress Monroe. The sea was very rough, and the only position in which he could write was to lie on his back, and write on his Bible. From Fortress Monroe they went up the James River to City Point, where they were stationed in camp in front of Richmond. They found the old portion of the regiment was still several miles from them, but was expected to come in soon to reorganize. They were now under the charge of new officers, and he writes:

"Our experiences teach us that it is best to acquaint thee with our views before being called upon in public. This officer was very friendly and said he would do all he could for us."

Shortly after, however, he writes:

"We were called upon to drill, which we declined doing, and were the second and third times positively ordered out, with threats we would be sent for. Still remaining in the quiet we were finally told to stay for that time, but the next we would be obliged to go. The company has just gone out again, and we were not called on. Afterward the commander was in our tent, where he became very moderate and reasonable, saying that he had had a talk with the commander of the regiment, with whom we had a full opportunity yesterday, and they hardly knew what to do with us, although his orders required him to report us either sick or on duty. He would endeavor, if we could not report sick, to manage our case for a week or two, so as not to require us to drill or assign us any other duties, and suggested by that time some order might be received in our case, that would relieve us, and I believe added that he hoped it would be so. There is considerable passing among our comrades, who differ in our case, some saying we were right, and encouraging our faithfulness, while others suggest we ought to be put to labor in the front, and still others recommend hospital service, so that we are required to be 'wise as serpents and harmless as doves,' and I do desire that we may adorn our profession here where we are so closely watched, by an humble walk, consistent with our profession on this subject."

After having been a week in camp in front of Richmond, he writes:

"Yesterday morning after eating our breakfast, two of our officers came into our tent, saying, 'Boys, there is good news for you this morning, you are going home.' It came so suddenly that we almost doubted it, but he said he had just come from Captain Johnson's office, and that it was so, and he would send the papers down before long. Sure enough, in a few minutes here came the papers and the captain himself the bearer. He, like the other officers, seemed to rejoice at the prospect of our relief."

A furlough was issued, not prescribing time or place of return, which had to go through the different departments and back before they could be liberated. Shortly after noon of the same day, a young man came into the tent inquiring for him, and handed him a letter, which he said had come to them of this regiment on the picket line. The young man had brought it, on foot, a distance of eight miles. The letter was from Rachel Green of Barnesville, of whom Gadne Patterson, the bearer, had some knowledge. It was the first from any source received since leaving Columbus, and contained much desired news of the welfare of his family.

Having followed the narrative as told by the letters of Barclay Stratton, we turn to the efforts made by Friends at home for his release, and also that of Isaac Cadwallader, who had shared the most of his experience.

Joseph Edgerton and Asa Garretson, a delegation of the Meeting for Sufferings, personally appealed to the President and Secretary of War, and obtained a parole for them, which information they dispatched to Friends at Salem.

Owing to the uncertainty and delay incident to military channels in such matters, it was deemed advisable for Barclay Stratton's brother, Benjamin D. Stratton, and Mifflin Cadwallader, Isaac Cadwallader's father, to take a copy of the parole and proceed at once to the army in front of Richmond, in order to hasten their release. The appearance of Friends in citizens' and friendly apparel made a sensation, so that many gathered around, who manifested a kindly feeling for them as they bade them farewell.

An ambulance conveyed them to the James River, where a boat was provided and they made their way home without delay, after an absence of six weeks and two days.

A MILITARIST'S VIEW.

"If you are to see a new England in the days to come, and the new world to which we hope we are moving, one condition must be fulfilled—militarism must be swept from the face of the earth. And when we talk about our war aims, to my mind there is this one great dominating war aim—the end of militarism, the end of standing armies. So long as the burden of militarism is resting on Europe, so long as our young manhood from year to year has to be sacrificed to this Moloch of war, you will not be able to solve the economic and industrial and social questions which are ahead of us.

I can see the suicide of Western civilization if we are to have this cataclysm repeated. All the great nations are now agreed that after this war there must be some permanent machinery established to keep the peace of the world."—The Friend (London).

EMANCIPATION.

Why be afraid of death as though your life were breath?
Death but anoints your eyes with clay. O glad surprise!

Why should you be forlorn? Death only husks the corn.
Why should you be afraid to meet the thresher of the wheat?

Why should it be a wrench to leave your wooden bench?
Why not with happy shout run home when school is out?

The dear ones left behind? O foolish one and blind!
A day and you will meet—a night and you will greet!

This is the death of deaths, to breathe away a breath,
And know the end of strife, and taste the deathless life.

—MALTBIE BABCOCK.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"SEEK, 'EM, KEEPER."

(Continued from page 329.)

In his perplexity a thought came to him. "My dear friend," he said, "I will tell a vision that was sent to me long ago. It has often strengthened me when I have been in sore straits—and it will strengthen thee, I believe, to-night. When I was yet in my young years I was afflicted with a certain sore temptation. And then one day in a dream I beheld a sheep feeding in a green pasture, by a pleasant river side. There came by an evil man, who, seeing the happiness of the sheep sought to drown it in the river. And verily he had succeeded in so doing, for already the floods were gone over the head of that sheep, and its breath was well nigh spent, when, just as it was on the point of sinking, there came the good shepherd with availing aid. His first care was to gather the exhausted sheep within his arms to rescue it and to place it once more within the safety of the quiet meadow. Then, valiantly he strove with the cruel adversary, and prevailing against him, cast him into the river, where the strong current bore him away. Thus I saw in my vision," continued James Dickinson. "And the reality of this I have seen in my life. For ever since, when I have almost lost the hope of deliverance, it is then the Lord has appeared by His mighty power and rebuked the enemy and delivered me. He drew me out of the troubled waters, and brought my mind into true stillness and to the proper place of waiting upon Him, where I found my strength to be renewed. And the overshadowing of His power I often felt to my great comfort, so that I was made to admire His goodness."

As he spoke the last words, he approached Jane Fearon, and gently raising her from the ground he led her strongly and steadily forward in the direction of the river. She no longer hesitated or drew back. His courage was infectious. Only she shuddered a little as her feet first touched the chill waters. But turning to her companion she said with a tremulous little laugh, "Even the river can hardly make us much wetter than we are already!" For all answer, James Dickinson passed his strong arm about her, and together they stepped down, deeper and ever deeper into the water. How they were guided across the swollen torrent they never knew. Looking back in after years, they could remember nothing but a long, long struggle with a swiftly-running stream, chill as death, that seemed as if it must submerge them. More than once the strength of the current bore them off their feet, and they thought all was lost. Yet always they felt firm ground beneath them once more, until at length they found themselves seated on a sand-bank on the further shore. And there at last James Dickinson's human reason thought that they were surely safe. But once more, and for the last time, the warning Voice spoke to him, and he was obliged to tell Jane Fearon they must go still further. She had lost all will of her own by this time, and was content to be borne along by her stronger fellow-traveler. "Well, I must go by thy faith," was her only answer. So again they went on, until they came to yet another sand-bank containing a deep hollow, in which they thankfully stretched their tired limbs. Here at last James Dickinson said, "I am now easy and believe that we are perfectly safe; I feel in my heart a song of thanksgiving and praise." "I am so far from that," replied his companion, "that I cannot so much as say, 'the Lord have mercy upon me!'" To reassure her, James Dickinson began to chant very softly the first words of the ninety-first Psalm, when suddenly Jane Fearon laid her hand upon his arm. "Oh, hush!" she entreated, "they will hear thee. Dost not hear them?" James Dickinson listened, but no sound reached him. "But I can hear them," Jane Fearon went on, "my ears were ever sharper than others. I hear only too well the sound of angry voices, aye and worse," she shivered, "the baying of a hound." James Dickinson listened intently. After a few moments he, too, heard the sound most of all to be dreaded by fugitives, the baying of a bloodhound on the night air. Then loud calls, "Seek 'em, Keeper, seek 'em, good dog," and a noise of scratching and sniffing. The terrified woman, unstrung by all she had gone through, began to weep; it seemed as if she could not bear to sit and listen to those voices and steps drawing nearer. Her companion was afraid that her terror would make her sob and cry aloud, and that the noise would betray their hiding place. "Remember, our lives depend upon our silence," he whispered gently; as they crouched themselves together intently to listen.

"Seek 'em, Keeper," the call sounded louder, nearer. Now, heavy footsteps could be heard upon the stone work of the bridge. Upon it; but they did not cross over it to the sand-bank where the fugitives lay hidden. "Keeper" had turned back again and was following the scent of the footsteps along the opposite side of the river, till he stopped short, at the spot where they had actually touched the water. There, having lost the scent where they entered the water he flung up his head and howled. Close behind the dog, followed a little knot of people—two men and the woman they had seen at the inn—one of whom carried a lantern. "Those Quakers must have crossed the river," said one voice. "That's impossible, unless the devil himself took them over," said another, "for the river is brinkful." "I've never known Keeper to fail," said a third. This was the woman's voice. "If he stops at the water, and they could not get across, then they must 'e'n be in the water, and a good riddance, too. But I would I had their clothes! True, they were of Quaker cut, but good solid homespun as ever I saw. We do but waste time here now in the wet. Better go back and rifle their saddle-bags." And an evil laugh struck on the night air, that filled the listeners with more horror than even the bloodhound's baying. The two men would not give up the hunt so soon. They wandered up and down the river's bank for some time, accompanied by the dog, till, at last, they realized that the fugitives had escaped, and calling to Keeper, they turned back to the inn. Then, and then only, the shivering Friends on the sand-bank began to feel that the worst danger was over. The instinct of the savage dog, following his animal nature for the chase, had been baffled by the man's intuition, relying upon his unseen Guide. Yet, though they were safe for the time, sleep was impossible in their cramped position on the sand-bank, even if they had dared to think of sleep. As the long dark night wore away, to turn Jane Fearon's thoughts from their present danger, James Dickinson told her wonderful tales of his eventful life.

(To be concluded.)

You can glad your child or grieve it;
You can trust it or deceive it;
When all's done
Beneath God's sun
You can only love and leave it.

LETTERS FROM PARVIN M. RUSSELL.

(Continued from page 329.)

—, Eleventh Month 5, 1917.

TO HIS FAMILY:—

I've just blown my evening half away trying to start a fire with a few embers and much wet apple wood, and since my "Blow, blow, breathe and blow," has produced a cheery blaze, I'll try to remember what has happened lately to interest you. The first incidental remark may be that our good wool sleeping bags came to-night, as well as some small cot mattresses. The bags are double, with two compartments so arranged that a double layer of the bag material may be either above or below the sleeper, as may be most convenient. With the old duflie bag spread out on the cot, the mattress and two thicknesses of blanket under the new bag, then the two layers of the new bag, and three layers of blanket over me, I should be pretty comfortable. Just for convenience, however, and occasional afternoons indoors, it would be mighty handy if you could wrap up my big gray bath-robe very tightly and mail to me at the F. W. V. R. C., No. 53 Rue de Rivoli, Paris. It was a little too much to include in the duflie coming over, but from the way one of the boys uses his, there is no doubt of its usefulness. Otherwise my needs are rather local, being mostly satisfied by three big meals per day. Generally speaking, the meals are mighty good, and even when the soup or stew or rice pudding is burned, it disappears just the same. Fortunately we have real good milk for cereals, coffee, etc., which is quite an advantage, but you can imagine a group of American boys, sweet-toothed as we are, cutting down to a ration of two small teaspoonfuls of sugar per day! That little box of "sweets" will have a royal reception without precedent in my previous experience!

Have I told you yet about our little "igloo" over beside the next house? It is a typical "above-ground bomb-proof" in which the Germans often took shelter no doubt when the shells were making it warm for them, and this particular one looks out on a great large field, since it is built beside the last house on the main street. It is simply a semicircle as you look at it, about seven feet high at the middle, and the whole covering is made of corrugated iron. One end backs up against a brick wall of the house; the other end is built up with bricks so as to accommodate a door and two small windows. I cut a good little pile of small wood from smaller branches of the old dead apple-trees, and started up the stove that I found for the igloo and in a short time it was quite comfortable. Having imported an old rough table as a washstand, one of the boys and I brought over the basins and water and necessary accessories and had our hot bath under most delightful conditions. There was plenty of good hot soft water, and since the place was not otherwise inhabited we splashed and scrubbed regardless of the floor or table.

Last Fifth-day was quite a memorable one for us all in that it was a holiday—All Saints' Day, I believe—and since there were no particular attractions hereabouts, five of us packed up a few things to eat and, with our "permits" and Red Cross identification cards, started off across the country some six or eight miles to the previous front line trenches, where for two years and a-half, the Germans and Allies faced each other behind the barbed wire of No Man's Land. On the way we passed through several absolutely quiet, shattered villages, one of which held the ruins of a very old and rather attractive church. It was indeed sad the way the building had been irreparably blown to pieces and then, too, even one of the vaults of the graveyard at one side had been opened and filled with the broken staturary; and since there are practically no people left in the village, the dilapidation is increased in effect by the neglect which naturally followed.

Walking on from the rear German trenches toward the front line, it was evident how the location of the trenches had been chosen to take every advantage of the ground. Trees—what few there were—were mostly cut and scarred or sometimes riddled by the shells, and even though this section had not been in the thickest of the fighting, the ground still bears the hundreds of shell-holes, now partly filled in by rain and grass. Already some careful Frenchman had cultivated quite a section of this land that we saw between the second and third positions, and had just reaped a fine crop of sugar beets. It was up in the first and second line trenches that the famous dugouts appeared, and you may imagine how the hours fairly flew by as we descended into one after another of these underground barracks and passages, seeing the bunks where the soldiers slept, special places with little stoves for the officers and everywhere the remnants of the days of activity—empty shrapnel shells of the smaller size, rifle cartridges everywhere, and the mysterious-looking hand grenades that we very carefully shun, as it is impossible to tell under what conditions they might go off if disturbed. Most remarkable was the tremendous solidity of the wooden beams and pillars used in building all the stairways and passages; the raw earth was nowhere exposed, so that in all probability they kept fairly dry down there.

We sat down and had our lunch in the front German trench with our hot beans and jam and bread and figs, looking out over the most desolate sort of pitted land, and to add to the picturesqueness, one of the boys read us a number of Robert W. Service's poems from the "Rhymes of a Red Cross Man," which were written after experiences among the opposite trenches, and which described the life that had surged and ceased in these very regions.

In the afternoon we invaded the barbed-wire entanglements between the opposite front trenches, winding our way through little passages and around the Allied trenches, and how typical they were of the hundreds of photographs we saw at home—the sand bags, used to build up the defences, the thatched twigs in places where the dirt had fallen in, or been blown in; the peculiar zig-zag that prevented the use of machine guns to clean out the whole line in case a small section were captured, and here again the stairways into the darkness. Such a drear place cannot be easily forgotten, because there were no trees left alive along whole stretches, and although the weather had been pretty dry, we could get a little idea of the awful, sticky mud that has been such a bane to the men in the trenches. Away down in one of the German dugouts I found an empty shrapnel shell, about three and a-half inches in diameter, which still had the copper band around it, which makes the shell fit tightly into the barrel when it is fired. The band is about a half inch wide and an eighth of an inch thick, and the passage through the barrel leaves a novel design on the thin copper band. By means of two pieces of steel I cut the copper band off without narrowing it scarcely at all, and it makes a very interesting memento, which with one or two other little things I hope to keep.

It was hard to break away from the fascinations of the dugouts, but by five o'clock it was getting rather dark, so we started home—a slightly different way from the one we followed in coming. Consequently, since there are absolutely no lights of any sort for miles in those regions, we got lost, and had to tramp an extra six or seven miles, as we had circled away off to the northeast of our place. Interesting enough, though, we passed through a small village where two of the Americans had just been established to do some agricultural work for the few inhabitants. It was their first night in their little shack, and so our little visit was in truth a celebration. Once on the homeward track, we felt right cheerful, and with some scrambled egg and cocoa to top off with, we felt it was a memorable day; and the only results of an unpleasant sort were several blisters and a lazy feeling the next day.

(To be concluded.)

Do not make the way seem harder
By a sullen fere,
Smile a little, smile a little,
Brighten up the place.

—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 330.)

NINTH MONTH 21, 1917.

Yesterday with a friend, Dr. Birchett, of the Colegio Americano, I climbed to the highest land near here, the summit of the Paramo de Cruz Verde. It was truly Alpine and yielded much; of course I returned laden with specimens and very tired. To-night I finish this to catch tomorrow's mail.

From Girardot, Eighth Month 14th, Dr. Rusby and I came up by train to Bogota. Here we remained then for a week, very busy making many arrangements. I fear Dr. Rusby did not thoroughly see the city, as since his departure on the 21st, I have. He left me, taking part of the outfit and, what I miss, plant-driers, and was planning to proceed to Medellin, Zaragoza and the Rio Sinu. It was necessary for him to reach New York before the opening of college.

Letters since tell of a three days' period spent in a river-boat, at first stranded on a bar, and afterward repairing damaged machinery. Because of that he gave up the Rio Sinu. Then from Medellin came report of other delay and the giving up of the project of reaching Zaragoza. At this writing I believe him to be on the ocean between Colombia and New York.

My one great undertaking since his departure has been the trip over the Cordillera to Villaviciencio at the head of the plains of the Orinoco; purpose, as earlier mentioned, the obtaining of Quina Cuprea; result, fully successful. The trip required five days in each direction, and I was at Villaviciencio eight days; in all Eighth Month 22nd to Ninth Month 8th.

Mine has been but poor success getting transportation mules, or horses as the case may be. For this trip I started with three horses of the poorest in the country, exchanged them en route for three, more willing, though little, mules; and by an exchange at the same point returning arrived on a shoeless horse, my baggage a day late on two bullocks. The first and last stages were but one day—and fortunately slow mules permit of botanical observations.

It is always cool here in Bogota, and, crossing the Cordillera Summit, Eighth Month 22nd, against a wind and driving rain, was one of the coldest experiences I have ever had. On this side of the divide it is too cold to grow much on the mountain-slopes. But over the divide was to me a great revelation.

There comes up to the mountains the winds from the great Amazon-Orinoco plain, and these carry a warmer climate high up the slopes. Very soon we descend to fields of maize, and through a region of this pass for at least ten miles. By the first night I had reached Chipaque on the eastern slope, but my baggage-mules did not. Consequently I had some hours to wait there next morning.

Chipaque is about fifteen miles from Bogota, and on the mountain-side. I wish I could give you some kaleidoscopic impressions of the camino that morning. The next day was the great market in Bogota, and to it the peons were going. Loads were passing almost continuously, some on mules, burros, or frequently bullocks; more frequently on the backs of men, and yet more frequently of women. And heavy loads they were, too, and carried by women, some for at least twenty-five miles over a rough mountain trail up through the thin atmosphere of over 10,000 feet altitude. I remember loads in sacks, likely corn or potatoes, or as likely many things else; great round open crates of chickens, two or three layers high (frequently on other loads would be seen a chicken, or often a chicken or turkey tucked under the arm); especially I recall women with great loads of earthen jars, of local manufacture, fifteen or sixteen, and extending in a pyramid several feet over their heads. On they trudged—at least several hundred that morning—a quiet, but seemingly never happy people.

The fields of corn amazed me. From the narrow river-valley, up the mountain-sides, wherever not actually precipices, to almost their summits, would be green areas of corn, and close observation would show little adobe houses beside each. On slopes so steep you needed care to stand. I saw the women hoing with the large-bladed hoe of this region. The corn-harvest, I hear, is marketed almost wholly in Bogota.

This peasantry works, and, in spite of some present drawbacks, I think is excellent stuff for the future. Not once to Villaviciencio and return was I asked for alms—the greatest possible contrast to the trip to Neiva. The most evident drawback is disregard of sanitary living; little adobe houses, with dirt-floors, these shared in common, during the day at least, by humans, dogs, chickens and, where so wealthy, hogs.

The corn-land is determined by accessibility to Bogota. Beyond were open grassy mountain-slopes—a large pink orchid there making banks of gorgeous bloom—and further east, forest. From the last hill was a wonderful view of the Orinoco plain, dark-green with forest, but here and there with light-yellowish bands of prairie. Villaviciencio, though the capital of the Neta, proved smaller than the metropolis of Mt. Kisco.

(To be concluded.)

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE TEACHERS' COTTAGES AT POCONO.

JULIA H. MOON.

Under date of First Month 15, 1907, George and Elizabeth L. Abbott conveyed the cottage located in Oak Avenue, Pocono Manor, known as the "Acorn," to certain Friends in trust for the Yearly Meeting's Educational Committee for the use of the teachers of the Yearly Meeting Schools. Some teachers and a few others enjoyed the hospitality of this cottage for several seasons.

Subsequently, two other adjoining lots were deeded to trustees by George Abbott and a larger house erected, known as the "Oakwood." This was built for the purpose of accommodating not only our teachers, but also affording a place where others may obtain comfortable accommodations at a moderate cost.

During 1915 and 1916 it seemed advisable to the donor of these gifts, to the various trustees, and to the Yearly Meeting's Educational Committee that to combine the management of these two cottages would reach the interests of the teachers as well as others to the best advantage.

At a recent meeting of the Yearly Meeting's Educational Committee, the Committee in charge of the "Acorn" and "Oakwood" reported a prosperous season. The houses were well filled, the majority of the guests being Friends, several teachers among them. The close of the season found an indebtedness still existing by reason of the initial purchases of furnishings, etc., but through the kindness of the Pocono Manor Association this entire debt has been taken care of.

It having been proven that the project of the "Acorn" and "Oakwood" is a success, we can but hope that many teachers and their friends may avail themselves of the comforts and possibilities for recreation here offered in the future.

ABLE DEFENSE OF OUR POSITION.

In the Public Ledger of the 11th, C. B. Cochran claimed that circumstances so alter cases, that the patriotic duty of Friends would now carry them into war activities. We are happy to print the following defense from the Ledger of the 10th.—E.D.S.

To the Editor of Public Ledger.—

It seems necessary that I answer a letter you recently published, for I also am a "fighting Quaker," yet one who fights neither for the same cause nor with the same weapons as does Doctor Cochran. The difference is, perhaps, one of aim, but not so much so of method and accomplishment. This is illustrated by telling two stories of the last generation.

Once an old squire of New Jersey quietly objected when two quarrelling men used violent language to each other in his office. An unheeded second and third admonition ensued the squire to blot his legal papers rise to his full six feet of stature and, taking one man's collar in his right hand and the other man's in his left, he threw one blasphemer up the street and the other one down. "They hired a boy to come back for their hats." The issue was plainly a spiritual one, the method of dealing with it Prussian and effective only so far as the presence of the squire was concerned. No one with imagination can doubt but that, in the safety of the nearest alley, the men continued their profanity with the defender of the faith as the complacent victim of their anathema.

The other story illustrates the same spiritual issue, but this time it is met by spiritual force, and the result justifies the method. A blacksmith was filling his shop with bad language when a Pennsylvania farmer quietly asserted a fact, "I think I cannot bear to hear such things." Then he went outside. Years after the blacksmith testified: "I never swore again. I thought that if my language made a man like him feel the way he did I had better change my language."

Both the New Jersey squire and the Pennsylvania farmer called themselves Quakers; yet one followed the old Mosaic law and the other the law of Him who said, "I am the Way." One thought he had succeeded when he had failed; the other succeeded far beyond what he would have thought possible.

Yes, there are such things as "fighting Quakers," but they fight in an army that makes alive; for a country whose boundaries are beyond the war zone; a country whose citizens never criticize the Administration because their loyalty is given without drafting it to the Prince of Peace. His methods are perfect. His liberty is glorious, and His democracy—although not very safe for special privilege—is a solid rock for the kingdom that is coming.

Peaceful penetration into the history of Friends will show that the Society is not founded on freedom of conscience as an end in itself, but on good-will as an omnipotent force behind free will. And just because the world—and occasionally our own members—cannot understand good-will, men fear and punish free conscience as socially unsafe; and they are justified in so doing until they learn what "having mercy and not sacrifice" means. Did Friends really exalt free conscience into a religion such as Doctor Cochran describes, without good-will as a basis, they would be anarchists and unworthy to serve society by their martyrdom as apostles of a free creed.

HELEN ELIZABETH RHODS.

WEST CHESTER, Pa.

WITH THE FARMERS IN FRANCE.

HOWARD W. ELKINTON.

MY DEAR FATHER:—

Cæsar, as thee may recall, with scholar's grasp, spoke in his famous Commentaries of hibernation or hibernating during the winter months in certain Gallic towns. One of these most assuredly must have been Evres. For to this day it seems necessary for the writer to do the same thing. It is truly hibernation of a very quiet, warlike nature that awaits its winter. If the war should stop to-day, I honestly believe we should not hear of it till the week-end (when we return to Sermaize). Isolated by no communication, with no time to read, no manner of frequent correspondence, too tired usually to do aught else but sleep, so we live removed from the jostling throngs that inhabit big cities and make such a pleasant, sweet-sounding din. But we have our noise and clang and roar in the blessed threshers. Indeed, I dreamed the other night that I was upon the engrainer's (feeding to the machine) platform swaying from side to side with the vibration of a humming machine, even as a captain carries the motion of throbbing engines and rolling sea about with him on land.

You probably know by this time that the agricultural department so divides its work that the ten threshers are sent to so many separate areas, where two youths repair to run each thresher. There are usually five or six villages in each area. It so happens that one Raymond MacDermid, a friend of the Hodgkin family and from their home town, and I work the district of the (new) Alesse, the northernmost area of the expedition and now we labor in the most northern town of our area. We eat at the boards of those farmers for whom we thresh, while we sleep in our caravan.

Oh, yes, we drink at one of the wells marked "Eau Non-potable," which means that the authorities have deemed the water unsafe. But rumor has it that despite the sign it is the best water in the district (which may not be saying much); further rumor has it that the authorities went around to all wells and tacked up the sign ("Eau Non-potable") more as a matter of courtesy than anything else.

There are humorous sides to the work. The field mice on the sheaves always afford endless amusement. All women dread them racing about over the sheaves. One day, as an act of frivolity, I took pains to catch a few that insisted in bumping into me on their way from the beater. Instead of flinging them at the head of a French lass, Nellie, who was cutting the sheaf strings on top of the threshers, I merely held the little beasties up to her view and threatened, then stuck each animal into one of the pockets of my blue overalls. When I had finished, you can imagine the collection. But the joke rather went against me, for, forgetting the prank entirely, I went through a week's work at other barns to return to my old friend, Caillet, and discover when engraining with Nellie that my collection was still with me, only one week older.

What does thee want to know about what we are doing? I should be delighted to write of anything, of how we all shiver around a flickering fire, absolutely confident that there is no possible way to put more heat in this barn of a place and no possible way to ward winter off. Or should I write of how I wriggled on my uncomfortable bed last night, thinking all the while of that lovely sofa bed that once I slept in at Moylan. It seemed so like a dream, so very, very far away and unreal. Or shall I tell thee of the week of bad luck that I have just experienced; how first I had to go to Evres with a new man and then the water tank burst, and then a ride on bicycle back to the Scource, twenty odd miles on bicycle. Then another new man—he, poor lad, knew nothing of machinery and hardly knew enough to draw water with success. Or shall I tell thee of the lovely bicycle ride K, and I took this afternoon to the Chateau of Trois Fontains, where we poked about the ruins of an ancient abbey. How we probed further about a most well-kept garden to come upon an elderly gentleman raking up leaves, to discover that he was the Count of Fontenay and owned the whole estate. We later met a most attractive old lady whom we learned was the Countess. She owned a very energetic bulldog which insisted on kissing us on the mouth by great leaps in the air. K, cared for it more than I, although I was quite interested in the political significance of the affair as the Countess had named her pet Herr Von Bethman Holweg. But if I write of these things they will think that we lead very ordinary lives eating and drinking and giving talk as any humans.

For "THE FRIEND."

"TILL SEVEN TIMES PASS OVER HIM."

AGNES S. POLLARD.

"The king spake and said, Is not this great Babylon that I have built—by the might of my power and for the honor of my majesty?"

Is not this the trouble to-day among the rulers of the earth? And among those of lower rank? Will they not take warning "till seven times pass over them?" We gather that seven was considered a complete number among the Jews, so this seems to imply that they must come to the place or position where they become convinced that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men and giveth them to whomsoever He will." It would appear that most of those in high places are some distance from that yet. Oh! if they could only realize how futile is human strength or ingenuity compared to the invincible power and majesty of Omnipotence who has declared "My glory will I not give to another nor my praise to graven images."

And how is it with us as a people? Are we sufficiently humbled within ourselves to realize that of ourselves we can do nothing that will improve our undone condition or bring honor to the cause of Peace, Truth and Righteousness?

A Society is made up of individuals, so each one has an influence in it and each one is responsible in greater or less degree for our influence in the Church and in the world. What shall that influence be? We have the privilege of choice—"Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Surely none of us will doubt as to Whom we should serve, or Who is most worthy. "The fear of man bringeth a snare," How true this is, more so than we realize many times. "I cannot bear what my friends will say if I do so and so." This is often felt, even in what might be called trifling matters, and how much greater the cross when it comes to withstanding the powers of evil. "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. . . . But fear Him, which after He hath killed hath power to cast into hell: yea, I say unto you, fear Him."

"But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows." "The fear of man bringeth a snare, but whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe."

"Till seven times pass over him." We are apt to feel that we have all the trials that it is possible for us to bear, but we are not the judges. We may feel that self in us has been reduced as much as is required, but the Infinite One knows better than we do. Let us keep very low before Him, therefore, that He may favor us with His life-giving Presence.

"To be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." Is it true that we are either one or the other? If we are earnestly concerned daily to live and act as we are shown by the Light of Truth in our own hearts that we should act or think, it seems to me we would be quite sure to find life and peace, even when outwardly we may be far from comfort. Oh, that all of us who call ourselves Friends may double our diligence, if possible, to see to it that the Light of Truth shine through us individually, that we be not stumbling-blocks in a brother's or sister's way, but may, by our example, lead others in the right way.

ELEVENTH MONTH 23, 1917.

NEWS ITEMS.

REPORT OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE FOR WEEK ENDING TWELFTH MONTH 22, 1917.

Amount reported last week	$254,107.77
Received from 17 meetings	$10,731.66
Received from 12 individuals	1,103.00
	11,834.66
	$265,942.43

FOR ARMENIAN RELIEF.

Amount reported last week	$362.69
Received from 3 meetings	$63.39
Received from 1 individual	5.00
	68.39
	$431.08

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

THREE HUNDRED MEN WANTED FOR FRANCE AT THE RATE OF TWENTY-FIVE PER WEEK.

We have just received the following cable from France:

"Civil Affairs Department needs 300 additional American Friends for repair and reconstruction, partly in devastated regions, partly to repair and equip hospitals for tuberculosis and children and similar work. Would like 25 per week each with foreman competent to oversee repairs, equipping and opening institutions. Each party should include men with experience in some form of building work. Must be men of education, discipline and character."

This indicates that the Red Cross has decided to give us the chance of supplying most of the men for civilian relief, and opens up the opportunity that many of us have been dreaming about. The confidence thus reposed in us is a great tribute to the men whom we have sent.

Our ability to accept the opportunity will depend upon action by the War Department recognizing this work as non-combatant service for Friends of military age, since we cannot possibly fill the request with men below and above military age. We have sent about a hundred men of military age, securing exemption on industrial grounds from their various Exemption Boards for the few who were in the first draft. We cannot hope to secure such exemption for very many in the second draft, and we cannot now take the risk of sending more men, subject to the danger of having to bring them back in a few weeks.

Two representatives of our Committee in a recent interview with the Secretary of War were told that no ruling would be made until Second Month at the earliest. We are now planning to use every influence at our command in securing a favorable ruling in the very near future. To lose this opportunity would be a tragedy. The men are desperately needed in France; the French government is very anxious for them to come; from every conceivable standpoint it seems reasonable that men who are by law exempted from combatant service should be allowed to enter this important international work, which is very definitely a part of the world obligation of the United States. The council of all Friends in helping us effect a solution of the problem will be appreciated.

OUR WORKERS AND FRENCH CHILDREN.

"I am in the workshop where the wooden houses are made in sections. There is a great demand for houses, and every hour in the day finds me busy with the saw and hammer.

"I see a great deal of war activities about me, but mostly its horrors, its crippled men and suffering women in black. The saddest and most pitiable thing of all is to see the ragged, dirty refugee children. They follow me in the street and, with a pleasant "Bon jour, Americaine," offer me their grimy little hands; they crowd about the workshops ready, with their huge burlap bags, to catch every scrap of wood that may fall their way. But now the gates of the shop are closed. No more wood can be given away for there is a shortage in timber and our own fuel supply is getting low. The pitiful faces at the closed gate haunted me, so I purchased a bag of "charbon" and am giving the most needy a daily ration—barely enough to keep them warm."

ANONYMOUS.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.30, 8.21 A. M. and 2.44 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

THE Thomas Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College announces a course of Lectures on Conditions after the War.

Friends' Select School, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, has offered its Lecture Room for the purpose.

The following are arranged:

First Month 4, 1918—Dr. Sidney L. Gulick (Secretary of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship)—"Christianizing America's Relations with China and Japan."

First Month 11, 1918—Gifford Pinchot—"The Farmer After the War."

First Month 18, 1918—Dr. John Dewey (Professor of Philosophy in Columbia University)—"Education After the War."

First Month 25, 1918—Dr. John Haynes Holmes (of the Church of the Messiah, New York)—"The Message of the Church After the War."

Other Lectures may follow. Admission is free and all are invited. Lectures begin at 8 o'clock.

DIED.—M. Hackenfield, N. J., Twelfth Month 16, 1917, Lucy E. HAINES, daughter of the late George and Edith T. Haines; a member of Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting, N. J.

—, Tenth Month 30, 1917, at her home near Athens, Ontario, Can., ALIZIA ROBESON, widow of Justus Robeson, in the eighty-fifth year of her age; an Elder and member of Leeds Monthly Meeting (now discontinued).

—, at the home of her niece, Delora C. Nately, at Middleton, near Columbus, Ohio, PHERE ELLYSON, widow of Robert Elyson, Eleventh Month 24, 1917, in the ninety-fourth year of her age; a member and Elder of Middleton Monthly and Particular Meetings.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

SWARTHMORE, PA.

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for the Winter Term, 1918:

"The Life of Christ," "The Hebrew Prophets," and "Church History," by Elbert Russell.

"The Adolescent Age in the First-day School," by William Byron Forbush.

"International Organization," by William I. Hull.

"The Development of Religious Thought," by Rufus M. Jones.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community." (To be announced.)

Term begins First Month 7th.

ELBERT RUSSELL,

Director.

WISSAHICKON INN

REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Stream heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

The stamp of quality on Plumbing Fixtures

The Hajoca trademark represents an experience of sixty years in making sanitary plumbing fixtures. It stands for a reputation earned by ever-increasing excellence of the product. It assures you of health-protecting designs, and guarantees Hajoca quality.

Come and see the advanced designs of Hajoca Plumbing Fixtures. Our showrooms are with-in easy reach of City Hall. Write for Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES & GADBURY CO.

1130-1144 Ridge Ave.

(at 12th and Spring Garden Sts.)

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL PHONE.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. PHILA.

W. J. MacWaters

Let Me Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO

Importers and Breeders

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.80

1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

By freight or express, i. o. b., Colera.
Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,

COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family Home of Established Reputation.

Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch in pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolleys.

Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—BY AN EFFICIENT AND WELL-RECOMMENDED married man of 31 years, exempt, a position in mechanical line, with a firm of Friends or other Christian denomination.

Address, care of "THE FRIEND,"
207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—IN THE J. LEWIS CROZER HOSPITAL, Chester, Pa., ten (10) young women of good character, between the ages of 19 and 25, in the training school, giving a general training. Special work given in diseases of children. Location of hospital good, grounds covering forty acres; comfortable home life for nurses.

Apply to HOSPITAL, S. K. UDEL, Superintendent.

WANTED—ANY FRIENDS' BOOKS OR WRITINGS, or any reading matter pertaining to The Society of Friends, which any Friends can spare or send to help make a collection. All highly appreciated and carriage paid.

Send to JEREMIAH C. ALLEN,

Boylston, Va.

W. B. WEAVER

UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1850

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER and GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS,

1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.

Prepared under the direction of and published by the Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs.

This book is printed and in process of binding. Orders received now will be filled very soon, perhaps at once upon receipt of order.

12mo, 270 pages, illustrated, bound in extra cloth, gilt top, postpaid, $1.50

FOR SALE BY

CENTRAL OFFICE, FIVE YEARS' MEETING, Second National Bank Building, RICHMOND, IND.

WALTER H. JENKINS, Stationer, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

140 North Fifteenth Street,

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

304 Arch Street

FRIENDS' BOOK AND TRACT COMMITTEE, 144 East Twentieth Street, NEW YORK CITY

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. Z. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped, prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton

TELEPHONES

Ball—Spruce 17-41 Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN

JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RESIDENCE: 251 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH and RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1848

THE following timely books recommended by the Social Order Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, are for sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

- "The Practice of Christianity," $2.00
- "The Church and the Hour," 1.00
- Vida D. Scudder,
- "The Social Problem," 1.25
- C. A. Ellwood,
- "The Abolition of Poverty,"75
- J. H. Hollander,
- "Christianizing the Social Order," 1.50
- Walter Rauschenbusch,
- "The Day of Our Visitation,"50
- William Littleboy,
- "A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich,"05
- John Woolman,

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

'Phone, Spruce 3032

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense
Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth
from 30c to 50c.
REDUCES
FIRE RISK. Guaranteed for one year. $16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels
Paper

Paper Bags and Tissue

259 South Third Street

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1571.

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mimeographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Type-writing, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Genealogist Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 S. Stockton St. Treator, L.I.

GIRARD TRUST CO.

BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian, Administrator, Assignee and Receiver. Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults. Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 10, 1818.

No. 28.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to
THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

TWO ESSENTIALS IN ONE.

A Chinese official, at one time resident in the United States, made (as Dr. Lynch says) a correct "diagnosis of Christianity" when he observed that it is distinguished from all other religions by its demand of personal holiness and "the love of the enemy." He showed much penetration, both in discovering these characteristics as superlative and in perceiving their logical union, since he apparently regarded them as together constituting "the one thing" peculiar to Christianity. Could he not then accept this religion for himself? No; because he considered its requirements unattainable, as indeed they would be if Christianity were only a code of rules or a system of thought: if it were not an actual "way of life" permeated by the ever-present and infinite Spirit of its Divine Founder; if it did not mean fellowship and companionship with Him, by coming into His likeness through "the revealing of the power of immortality" in our human souls.

Herein, perhaps, was the failure of apprehension on the part of the distinguished foreigner; but his recognition and frank confession of the paramount demands of Christianity may well induce a sober reflection in those who claim to be followers, not of Confucius, but of Christ. Is there not with some a lurking unbelief—a practical doubt at least—as to the necessity of such a soul-transformation, such a conquering work of Redemptive Power, as would correspond with the declaration, "This is the will of God, even your sanctification?" Paul writes to the Corinthian Christians as to those that were sanctified, "called to be saints;" and John, the apostle of love, looking forward to a complete vision of the Master and to our being "like Him," makes this confident affirmation: "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as He is pure."

Neither Scripture teaching nor historical evidence gives us to expect this attainment to be a sudden phenomenon coming down upon us as a separate "blessing," but rather it is shown as a condition brought about within us through our obedience to the living Word. "Wouldst thou now be made perfect without an effort?" was the tender reproof of an experienced

Christian to one who seemed impatient with the slowness of his own advancement. The process of this change may be as gentle, as gradual,—as normal, may we not say?—as the growth of the grain-bearing plant from the tender blade to the full and ripened corn. It is both progressive and fruitful; and, carrying out the analogy, we may assume a patient cultivation of the ground to be needful, as well as the stimulating and replenishing grace of the early and the latter rain.

We are not always given to see to what extent this work has been accomplished in the experience of others, and perhaps even our own condition may sometimes be veiled from our knowledge; but that humility which is part of a genuine growth in heavenly life will, at least, save us from presumption, from boasting, and from "spurious pretensions." Probably not many of us could fittingly venture beyond the testimony of those two heroic women Friends in the prison of the Inquisition at Malta. "We have been cleansed and sanctified in part, according to our measures," said they, "and we do press on to that which is perfect."

A longing for this redemption, a sustained and insistent desire for perfected Christian character, possesses in greater or less degree the hearts of those who have had any sight of "the beauty of holiness;" not merely as a subject for mystical contemplation, but as the condition of the highest union and fellowship and satisfaction, and of service too; for the path of purification joins that of consecration. The way of holiness is also a highway, an avenue of communication, an open road, wherein the Lord's messengers go His errands. "I have commanded my sanctified ones."

But who could picture such a state without including that supreme virtue which, in modern phrase, has been described as "the ultimate principle of the universe," and which an apostle defined as "the fulfilling of the law?" Even the Divine holiness is in some sense comprehended in it as shown in the assurance that God is love. For ourselves, the keeping of the first and great commandment and of that which is like unto it is presented as comprising all; but in viewing this pure standard, and measuring our statures by it, what misgivings assail us! what conviction of unworthiness and shortcomings! Nevertheless, that which is required cannot be finally impossible, and therefore we are to press on toward the goal.

But this "ultimate principle" is no mere sentiment, stirred by uncertain and changing impulses; it is the basis of sacrifice, of endurance, and of "patient continuance in well-doing." For again, to be "rooted and grounded in love" is the condition of being able "to comprehend (or receive fully) with all saints." And so we are brought back to the first thought of the characteristics of Christian faith, finding it re-enforced by the injunction, "If ye love Me, keep my commandments,"—which commandments do clearly include the requisitions of individual purity and righteousness through the grace that makes possible all things that are thus required, even to "the love of the enemy." M. W.

"IN THE SECRET OF HIS PRESENCE."

In the secret of His presence how my soul delights to hide,
Oh, how precious are the lessons which I learn at Jesus' side!
Earthly cares can never vex me, neither trials lay me low;
For when Satan comes to tempt me, to the secret place I go.

When my soul is faint and thirsting, 'neath the shadow of His wing
There is cool and pleasant shelter, and a fresh and crystal spring.
And my Saviour rests beside me, as we hold communion sweet:
If I tried, I could not utter what He says when thus we meet.

Only this I know: I tell Him all my doubts, my griefs and fears,
Oh! how patiently He listens! and my drooping soul He cheers.
Do you think He ne'er reproves me? What a false friend He would be,
If He never, never told me of the sins which He must see.

Would you like to know the sweetness of the secret of the Lord?
Go and hide beneath His shadow: this shall then be your reward;
And when e'er you leave the silence of that happy meeting place,
You must mind and bear the image of the Master in your face.

THE COMING FORTY YEARS.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

The writer wishes he were about twenty-one years of age, instead of about sixty-one. Since he was twenty-one years old he has, through many misadventures, in much spiritual weakness and surrounded by innumerable temptations, tried to serve, even very imperfectly, the Lord Christ. At home and abroad he has felt called upon to preach Christ and Him crucified. The forty years have fled as the coming and going of a meteor in the night. But although they have been full of brightness and possibilities of service for Jesus' sake, they have been as nothing in comparison with the light and the love that may be poured into the darkness of the decades yet to be. The coming forty years may be to young Friends as the shining of the sun when he goeth forth in his might. Are they ready?

The portents of the day prophecy an era of sin, greed, pleasure-seeking, political disturbance, intolerance, church apostasy and forgetfulness of God. If conditions continue to develop as they have the past few years Friends may expect to have repeated in their career the experiences of the seventeenth century. Faithful Friends, like Whittier's "Quaker of the Olden Time," may see their motives misconstrued, their love of God and men divided, their bodies imprisoned, their estates depleted. Withal, they may "walk the dark earth through," calm and confident in the knowledge that the imperishable assets are their riches, and that Jesus will lead His people to victory in the end.

I ask my young brothers and sisters to gird themselves for the coming days. I want them to keep to the simple faith and to the unmixt methods their fathers knew. I want them to be frequent in prayer. I want them to ask much for the baptism of the Holy Spirit which only can make them clean for the service of the Lord. I want them to be ready to pass through the fire for His name's sake. I want them to be vanquished by the Spirit of Love. I want them to subdue others with the same unconquerable spirit.

When another forty years shall have rolled away, those who are then living to battle with the hosts of the mighty will be able to say that God has been very good to them. He will have kept them, "as the apple of the eye." Not one promise will have failed. He will have guided them across the weary deserts in safety and at other times led them by the still waters of peace. They then will not be far away from the gates of the beautiful City—the eternal service, the wondrous joy!

I envy my young Friends the coming forty years.

SAN JOSÉ, Cal.

GENERAL MEETING IN AUSTRALIA.

[The Australasian Friend of Eleventh Month 16th is duly at hand. We are reprinting somewhat liberal extracts from the reported proceedings of the General Meeting.—Eds.]

MINISTRY AND OVERSIGHT MEETING.

This year, as for several years past, the sittings of the General Meeting were preceded by a meeting of members of the Committees on Ministry and Oversight of the various Monthly Meetings, which all Friends concerned were invited to attend. Probably this year marks the last of such gatherings, for reasons which will appear in the proceedings of the General Meeting. There was a good attendance, and the subject introduced by the Clerk of the General Meeting had reference to Prayer, particularly to Vocal Prayer in Meetings for Worship, which it is said has considerably declined of late. It was thought that the fact that Vocal Prayer was now less frequent than of old does not necessarily mean that there was less of the Spirit of Prayer now; that it may be due to the great change which has come over man's conception of God and His relationship to mankind. Vocal Prayer is not in itself necessarily helpful to the spiritual life of the Meeting, and certainly earnest, silent prayer is preferable to the "prayer of words alone." We realize that our Meetings for Worship are not an end in themselves, but the means of fitting individuals and Societies for the living of their true life. It was hoped that all through the General Meeting we might be in the Spirit of Prayer, with the desire present in mind and heart. "Show me Thy will, O God," and the determination that as that will is revealed we would go forward to do it at any cost. The discussion was general throughout the Meeting. One Friend said, "There is undoubtedly a change in men's conceptions of God, which largely influenced them in prayer. It was essential that those who exercised ministry in our Meetings should go more deeply into questions of this nature, and strive for mental clarity for themselves and their hearers." The Meeting was felt to be a helpful one, and it was ordered that a report of it should be sent to the General Meeting.

The first sitting of the General Meeting for 1917 was held in the Friends' Meeting House, Adelaide, on the twenty-fourth of Ninth Month. It opened with a time of silent devotion and of vocal prayer. After the calling of the names of Representatives, a letter was read from Annie Littleboy, conveying a message of greeting from her son, Wilfred E. Littleboy, now suffering imprisonment on account of his refusal of military service. His message was greatly appreciated by the Meeting, which directed that a reply should be sent.

After the usual formal matters were dealt with, the reports from Monthly Meetings and the Tabular Statement were read, and these formed the basis for discussion on the state of the Society, which was at once proceeded with. The Clerk, in opening the discussion, called attention to the decrease in membership which the Tabular Statement revealed, and the fact that the reports from the Monthly Meetings in their negative aspect, and, as in the case of Queensland, in the almost despairing note it sounded, told the same story. He called attention to the fact that, year by year, when the state of the Society has been considered, the result has been summed up in a minute of greater or lesser length, and sent down to Friends, and so far as we know that is all that has come of it. The time has now arrived when something more must be done, something that shall awaken interest and move our membership to the realization of its position, and so a different plan is suggested this year. Apart from the decrease of membership and the decrease of attendance at our Meetings, another fact of great importance has to be noted, and that is the ineffective condition of the great part of our membership, apparently based only on sentimental grounds, and with no recognition of any responsibility whatever. If such a condition obtained all round, it were only a question of a very short time when the Society would cease to exist. Does this thought trouble these Friends or not? If responsibility attaches to membership in any Christian body, surely it does to that of the Society of Friends. What are the means by which we may get our members to realize their responsibility, and to see how more than false is the fact of a name being on the roll of a Christian Church when there is no actual fellowship therein? For membership without fellowship is dead. Moreover, without fellowship life and growth are impossible; neither Church nor individual can live to itself or expect to grow where life is absent. These things are said, not for the sake of fault-finding, but with an earnest desire to probe things to the bottom, to find out our weak spots, and to apply the remedy in the hope that future General Meetings will have different reports laid before them.

The more we see of events, the less we come to believe in any fate or destiny except the destiny of character.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

Edwin Ashby said that, as Friends, we have never set out to push for merely an increase of members, but he thought we would have no difficulty in adding to our roll if that were all that were desired. The great thing is that our membership should be a living membership, true to its ideals, though its numbers may be few.

William Benson said it was sometimes good to get a severe shock, and such a shock Queensland's report had given us. Something must be done; it is individual earnestness that, under God's blessing, will turn the current of the Society's dwindling membership, and make us the power we ought to be. It is easy to speak, but not so easy to suggest what ought to be done. In one of our Meetings there is not a single young Friend, nor had there been one for years. Where are our young people? Have they gone to other Churches? And are those Churches more truly alive than ourselves? We need to look into these matters.

Harriet C. Fryer would not have us too much depressed. Some others of our Meetings were a while ago without children, where now there is a number.

Stanley F. Allen felt that what we have heard caused much searching of heart. We are proud of the name of Friend, but what is it worth to us? Is it merely a name? Or is it our life? What is the future going to be to us who are young? Is it to go forward, or are we to dwindle to two or three before we pass out altogether? His hope, his prayer, his conviction, was that this was not going to be, but we must have enthusiasm and the force of life that would lead us to tackle the questions of the day fearlessly. He himself came amongst Friends convinced of their principles; he was thankful he came, and trusted that his children when they came would only come so convinced; he hoped there would be a Society of Friends to welcome them. It is for those who are young to serve our Society by coming out and standing up for its ideals without counting the cost. He urged more social life in our Meetings, more particularly for the sake of the younger portion of those Meetings. We should endeavor to fill up the gap between school and that time in life when deeper and stronger convictions come to young people. The editor of a Sydney paper had said to him, "You people are too backward, afraid of coming out into the open and telling people what you think." There is plenty of room for this in the Sydney Domain; are we ready to take the message to men when and where they will gather to listen to it?

Thomas Miller said we are called upon to determine by which of two methods we, as a Society, shall work; whether by permeation of other bodies, or direct action on our own account. Workers by the former method cannot give much time to Monthly Meeting work. He himself favored the principle of permeation; the name or the label matters but little. We must individually determine which of the two is the more effective way for us, and follow it.

Frederick Coleman emphasized the remarks of the Clerk with regard to ineffective membership, and the suggestion that an early appeal should be sent to all our members to put forth their very best, and to make the most of life; he also thought that it was time we took some decided action in reference to scattered membership, but that this was a matter rather for Monthly Meetings themselves, who were in a better position to offer encouragement, and so help to the fulfilling of individual responsibility. "Primitive Christianity revived" should be the aim which the Society of Friends should strive after, and if we lived up to our ideal we should be successful in this.

[This subject was committed to the constituent meetings to be dealt with directly by them.]

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS.

William Benson stated that Representatives had met, and decided to recommend to the Meeting the re-appointment of the former officers for the service of the Meeting for the coming year, viz.:—Clerk, William Cooper; Assistant Clerk, Frederick Coleman; Treasurer, Harry B. Robson.

The report of the Meeting of Ministry and Oversight, held on Second-day afternoon, was now presented in accordance with the direction of that Meeting, and it was decided that, in future, the Meeting held on Second-day afternoon shall form the first sitting of the G. M. proper, the nature of the business to be taken and the re-arrangements that may be necessary to be left in the hands of the Clerks. The hope was expressed, however, by several Friends that the Meeting of members of M. and O. Committees would not be cut out altogether, as many feel the need of such help as that Meeting has given in the past towards the fulfilling of pastoral work of their Meetings. Some Friends thought that the first sitting of the G. M. could still retain the character of the Meeting of M. and O. Committee members hitherto held, having reference primarily to its devotional character and the special subject arranged beforehand.

REPORT OF HOBART SCHOOL.

As no written report had come to hand, W. Lewis May, a member of the Managing Committee, was asked to give a verbal report. He began by stating that the School is now run, as it were, in two divisions, the educational and the household. The educational is under the care of W. C. Annells as headmaster, and the Committee has reason to congratulate itself upon the excellent work which he, with the loyal support of all his staff, is doing, not educationally alone, but in striving to the best of his ability to follow the wishes and ideals of the Committee. Owing to the present dearth of teachers, no school is so good that it couldn't be better. We should like to have one or two young men Friends on the staff, but under present circumstances we have every reason to be thankful for the staff we have. As to the lady teachers, we can particularly congratulate ourselves.

The Committee has decided to inaugurate a proper Kindergarten Class, and a building is now being erected specially for that purpose, thanks to the help of English Friends. The services of a young lady, thoroughly trained in kindergarten methods, an old scholar of the School, have already been secured.

Numbers in attendance keep up fairly, but not quite equal to last year. The State, with its free secondary schools, is our chief competitor, and a new State school now being erected in our neighborhood does not promise to improve our prospects.

On the household side, Alfred H. Brown, as Superintendent, is doing excellent work, and the staff co-operates harmoniously with him. A system of self-government which he has introduced promises good results. The tone of the School throughout is satisfactory.

The Report of the Friends' Peace Board, which followed, referred to the resignation of Stanley F. Allen from the Secretaryship, and the appointment of Edwin Ashby in his place, to the endeavor by means of correspondence to stimulate activity in peace work throughout the various Meetings, to the attempt to obtain certain literature, notably "The Last Weapon," from England, and the failure to do so, as also to get it printed in Australia. Literature of various kinds was circulated, but mainly a reprint of last Year Meeting's Epistle; and Meetings were held in Melbourne and in Sydney. Margaret Thorp's work in Queensland in connection with the Board, was most hopefully spoken of. Her opportunities have been many, and, not the least encouraging of all, the open door she has found into the public schools of the State, and other schools besides. All the State schools, under the present régime, seem open to her. In conjunction with our Friend, Thomas J. Miller, Margaret Thorp engaged in a "No-Conscription" campaign in Queensland, and afterwards entered a boot factory, as an employee, in order to get experience of the workers' point of view. As at one time Margaret Thorp had reason to think that some utterances of hers on socialistic lines were not in accordance with the general views of the Society, she tendered her resignation, but "at the request of the Committee the resignation was withdrawn. They recommended her to state definitely, when she was expressing views in public, upon which there is considerable divergence of opinion amongst the members of our Society, that she was expressing her own individual opinions, and not necessarily those of the Society she represented."

(To be concluded.)

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE AND THE AMERICAN PACIFIST.

WILLIAM L. HULL

The President's annual message to Congress on the 4th ult., like his address to the Senate on the twenty-second of First Month last, was intended as a standard around which should rally all true liberals everywhere. It sounded the death-knell of the hopes of the "bitter-enders" for a "knock-out blow" by which to crush Germany, and the hopes of the munitions makers, the money mongers and the exploiters of every kind who fatten on the carnage of war. It has given the signal for the liberals and the Tories, the progressives and the reactionaries, in our own and other lands, to draw the line sharply between them, and to renew their old, old struggle for the advancement of human welfare or the exploitation of human life and labor.

Whether the liberals in Germany and Austria can confirm and extend the victory which they have won over the Junkers during the last few weeks remains to be seen. Whether the Allies, repudiating the leadership of their present reactionary rulers, Lloyd-George, Clemenceau and Sonnino, can check the British, French and Italian jingoes and expansionists who demand the dismemberment of the Central Powers and the increase of their own opportunities for economic imperialism the world is now anxiously waiting to see.

The American pacifist, at all events, may be happy that the tide of moral and diplomatic conflict is turning decidedly in his direction. How greatly the President's message is calculated to advance the pacifists' cause and help it on towards final victory the following brief analysis of it will reveal.

There are eight war aims stated in the message. Seven of these constitute the program for which the American pacifist has been striving during many years. These are:

First, the triumph of popular government;

Second, reparation, by the German people, of the wrongs done by the German autocracy to its victims, and specifically to Belgium and Northeastern France;

Third, the relinquishment of Prussian military and commercial domination over Austria-Hungary, the Balkans and Turkey-in-Asia;

Fourth, freedom of the seas and free access to the seas;

Fifth, no economic war after the war, unless against an autocratic government;

Sixth, no partition of, or injury to, the Central Powers;

Seventh, an international organization, a league of nations, a partnership of peoples, which shall by all means include Germany (unless it remains autocratic), and which shall substitute judicial settlement for armaments and war for the preservation of international peace and justice.

Ever since William Penn established self-government in Pennsylvania and advocated an international court of justice for the nations, and ever since the Constitution of the United States embodied a republican form of government and erected the Supreme Court for the judicial settlement of disputes between or among the sovereign States, the American pacifist has based his hopes of a permanent peace on world-wide democracy and all-inclusive international organization.

Ever since Roger Williams and the Rhode Island Quakers established friendly relations with the Indians, the American pacifist has placed international and interracial good-will in the fore-front of his program, and he should be delighted to aid in every possible way the German people and the Allies in their efforts to repair the damage caused by both sides in the war to many lands in Europe, Asia and Africa.

Ever since the American colonists were striving to become independent of Great Britain, and throughout the weary nineteenth century, when every one of the "civilized powers"—the United States included—was striving to place its military or economic yoke upon weaker peoples, white, yellow, brown, copper-colored or black, the American pacifist has sympathized heartily with every people's right to rule itself.

Ever since Benjamin Franklin and John Jay endeavored to secure from Great Britain, France and Prussia the guarantee of peaceful commerce and neutral rights, the American pacifist has striven to promote the freedom of the seas as for neutral nations in time of war and for all nations in time of peace.

Ever since Thomas Pinckney, in 1795, secured from Spain an agreement to open up the Mississippi and make New Orleans a port of deposit and commerce, he has advocated the internationalization and free use of such waterways as the Aegean, Adriatic, Baltic and North Seas, the St. Lawrence, Rhine and Mississippi Rivers, the Suez and Panama Canals, the Dardanelles, Skager-Rack, Cattegat and Magellan Straits.

For many years the American pacifist has opposed discriminating tariff laws and so-called protective duties as a principal cause of economic suffering and of war. He is entirely in accord with President Wilson's opposition to any economic war after the war and hopes to eradicate another economic wrong and menace which has fastened its octopus-claws upon its victims both at home and abroad—namely, the economic imperialism which is the disgrace of Christian civilization and a prime cause of two centuries of foreign warfare and domestic violence.

Thus the great heart and brain of the President's Message gives complete and eloquent expression to the American pacifist's most cherished ideals. There is one point out of eight at which the pacifist and the President are at present in disagreement. The President advocates the crushing or boycotting of the German autocracy's military force and fraud by "winning the war," which means presumably by achieving decisive victories over Germany's armies, navy and air-fleet. At present he is thoroughly convinced that the military way is the right and effective way of achieving the seven aims of the war which he is striving for in common with the liberal everywhere and with the American pacifist. The pacifist, on the other hand, remains convinced, as he has always been convinced, of the truth of John Hay's assertion that "war is not only the most ferocious, but also the most futile of human follies." While he rejoices, therefore, over the powerful aid which the President has rendered to the cause of peace by the two great messages, he patiently and confidently awaits the spring-time and the summer, when the President's and the pacifist's common program of liberty and justice will secure a genuine and permanent triumph through negotiation, mutual concession and rational settlement in the peace conference and through the progress of democracy in Germany and its preservation at home and among our Allies.

Meanwhile, the American pacifist rallies with glad enthusiasm to the standard of liberalism, democracy, economic justice and internationalism, which the President has so bravely set up for the guidance of our own and all other peoples.—From Friends' Intelligencer.

"COMPOSURE is often the highest result of power."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"SEEK 'EM, KEEPER."

(Concluded from page 342.)

It was not till some hours later, just when the dawn was breaking, that he said, "Let us creep to the edge of the sand-bank and peer forth very carefully, so that we may see, without ourselves being seen." Indeed it was not yet safe to venture forth. As the morning light increased, a high hill became visible on the opposite side of the river. On the top of it a man's figure could be plainly seen, outlined against the sky, obviously looking for some one or something. To their great relief the Friends discovered that the hollow in which they sat was in a cavity underneath the river's bank. It was also overhung by the roots of trees which cast such deep shadows that, even when the sun was high, they could remain there safely and not fear being seen. But they also discovered that the sand-bank on which they had first sought refuge was in a much more exposed position. Had they remained there, unmindful of the warning Voice that told James Dickinson to move further, they must certainly have been discovered with the first beams of morning light, by the man who was watching for them. As it was, the figure on the opposite hill, seeing no trace of the fugitives whom he sought, presently disappeared. The two Friends therefore continued quietly in their retreat till some time after sunrise. Then the question arose, what should they do next? Were they to leave their horses and their saddle-bags at the Inn and go on foot to the nearest town and make known their case? Jane Fearon was all for this course, having very little courage left after the night's adventures. Small blame to her! She begged James Dickinson to escape while they could, and not go near the wicked Inn. "Let them take all else," she repeated, "if we may but escape with our lives. Can we but reach a town the magistrates will surely send for our belongings, when they have heard our story." "Thou art forgetting, Friend," replied James Dickinson, "that we are two Quakers, and that the magistrates are less likely to bettir themselves on our behalf than to seize the opportunity to clap us both into prison. For my part," he went on, "I have a leading that we should return to the house; I fully believe that our clothes and bags will be ready for us without being asked a question and that the people we saw last night we shall see no more."

Jane Fearon could scarcely believe her ears. "Thou wouldst return there?" she repeated. "To that den of evil? Then thou must even return alone. Grieved am I to desert thee after all we have gone through together—but return thither with thee of my own free will, I neither can nor may." The rays of the morning sun shone full on James Dickinson's face; but there was a brightness in it beyond any that the morning sun could give. He seemed to be giving and receiving a Light that she could not see. When he returned to her, his whole countenance shone with an assurance of faith that Jane Fearon had never seen in any human being before. "Thou mayst safely come with me, dear Friend," he answered, "for I have seen that which never failed me."

The solemnity and peace of his words laid all the woman's nervous fears to rest. Like a little child she followed him, and scarcely seemed to know where she was going, only that she was being led and protected and carried along by a stronger faith than her own. Back they walked in the still morning light along by the swirling stream, quieter now, but still swollen and foam-flecked after the fury of last night's storm. Back over the high arch of the bridge, and right over it this time, up the steep hill beyond, and so finally past the out-buildings to the high, arched door of the Inn with its swinging sign-board. It was less than twenty-four hours since they first had seen that sign-board, but it seemed like many years. But the door stood open now. James Dickinson did not even knock. He strode boldly in, as if he were the master of the house and not a guest. Neither the men nor the woman who had welcomed them the night before were to be seen. The whole place was deserted, except for one old woman, who had not appeared on their former visit. She sat blind and deaf, nodding over the kitchen fire. But the outdoor garments of the two Friends were waiting ready for them, brushed and dried, and through the window they could see their two horses with the saddle-bags on them, champing in their stalls and ready to depart. James Dickinson put a gold piece in the old woman's skinny fingers to pay for their entertainment, and in a few moments the two Friends were riding away on their journey, in the peaceful morning light.

Arrived at Jane Fearon's home they had a strange story to tell to her husband. But the night of adventures remained a mystery till a few years later, when James Dickinson was again in that neighborhood, and riding down the well-remembered road he found no trace of the mysterious Inn—only a heap of stones by the wayside. On reaching the town, he enquired what had happened, and was told that the house had been pulled down some time before, and its inhabitants executed.—L. V. HODGKIN, in Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

LETTERS FROM PARVIN M. RUSSELL.

(Concluded from page 345.)

Eleventh Month 8, 1917.—This three-day intermission has been a rather busy one because MacDowell, who lives in the same room with me, had been laid up with some sort of infection or fungus on the lip; naturally it swelled all out of proportion, and made his face nearly uncouth. He was able to get around somewhat at first, but finally had to stay in, and so yesterday I acted as nurse for a good part of the day, getting him comfortable, washed and fed, and we spent about an hour fixing up his lip. In the afternoon, however, a doctor (American) from a hospital off in a small hospital in a nearby village, dropped in to see MacDowell and examining and dressing the sore place, promised to come again to-day to watch the developments. As a result he came to-day and took MacDowell off to the little hospital where he can watch him more closely. The doctor is a Red Cross man in charge of a relief hospital for the civilians, and particularly for children. He was most cordial, and promises to do everything he can for any of our men who need attention. That is very fortunate, and you can all be sure that we will not hesitate to take him at his word, because after this little session with MacDowell I realize that we must be exceedingly careful. Fortunately, I never felt better, because I am getting plenty of sleep, and when there is no opportunity to get anything to eat except what is served at table, we are not apt to eat much that disagrees with us. The days out in the fresh air are perhaps largely responsible for the way I feel, and there may be a possibility of my beginning to get fat!

This morning the French woman who does our cooking failed to appear, and the head of the unit here asked me to take the job for dinner and supper! Of course, there is one fellow who is head menu-maker and keeper of supplies, etc., who does all the ordering, and who keeps a few recipes. But the main part of the job is keeping the fire going, and doing all the necessary work to feed sixteen hungry fellows, when the stove only has two "burners"; and especially when the menu consisted, as to-day, of soup, lentils, prunes and a custard sauce, all of which required boiling, with a limited amount of time to do it all! But it was only a little bit late, and the fellows seemed to enjoy it. Tonight we had a very nice roast, with real gravy, and potatoes, and on the suggestion of the "steward" I attempted a fig pudding. Well, it was funny—he told me approximately the amounts to use, but was very indefinite about the liquids required. Imagine me working with powdered rice and oatmeal flour, instead of real white flour, egg powder, instead of eggs, margarine, instead of butter. I had a whole pan full of "dry" materials, which had to be brought to the right consistency by adding figs (chopped) and a little milk! Naturally that didn't work, but finally, by adding milk and fig juice from stewed figs, I got it into a very thick paste, somewhat like the stuff that "hermits" are made of. It was certainly a hazard, considering the little oven to bake in, but two good-sized basins came through the ordeal, and when I turned them out on big plates like brown bread, a more beautiful brown bottom was never seen on a cake in France! The stuff was served hot from the oven, with a sauce of stewed chopped figs, well spiced, to go with it. No kind of food for a man who doesn't get any exercise, but it all disappeared as usual! Very likely the woman will be back tomorrow, so the fellows won't be under further risk.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

(Continued from page 328.)

ELEVENTH MONTH 18, 1917.

School has been running for about three weeks now in one room, two of the other three are almost ready for occupancy, and the fourth, which was totally destroyed to block the cross roads, hasn't been touched by us yet. We have, however, covered a good many roofs, some with slate and some only with tar paper, but lots of people are more comfortable for what we have done. We have also repaired a school-house about one mile from here at Cremery, and are all of us learning to be more skillful and resourceful.

Cooking is an awful nuisance, for our cook takes a holiday whenever the fit strikes her and somebody has to abandon his work and attend to her job.

The other day we had a very indignant visitor in the person of an old lady who protested we had done nothing for her and were working for her neighbors—probably only to get quarters ready for troops. We found we had spent two hundred hours on her place and had really done a good deal more to it than to many others. She went away in a good humor but was back the next day. She took Cross off to show what she wanted done and on the way she asked who paid us. When he said we were not paid she stopped short and her mouth fell wide open and her whole attitude changed. She took him home and told him how her father had been shot by the French as he sat at his front door—German troops being in the house at the time—and I hope her conversion will make others more sympathetic with us, though I believe we are very fortunately located among people who appreciate our work and most of whom realize that we cannot do everything at once. Another old lady whose roof I have been slating for the last two days, and before that filling up a hole under her wall into the cellar, told us that the town of Roey near here was taken and retaken twelve times, which accounts for some of the destruction and desolation I have seen there. I know now what it means to lay waste a country, and when I realize that not far away the same thing is going on that we are trying to repair here, I feel as if men were very slow to learn.

To give you some idea of the wasteful way things are left behind an army I will tell you what we have of German manufacture that we have collected from dugouts, etc.,—one camp stove—the other four or five stoves in other rooms are also German camp stoves, all of different sizes and design—two tables—a German shell basket for waste paper, a German helmet for string, German telephone wire to hang clothes on. The only thing I need very badly is a German latch so I can keep my door shut, but I shall have to make one of wood I fear.

Our poor garden on which my window looks is very desolate now. I can see over the broken wall the ruins of a large barn and two or three carts that the Germans chopped the wheels from and the withered flowers and grasses, together with a good deal of rubbish, to say nothing of the dugout and bomb-proof, are not very inspiring. However, everyone's spirits are high and the Englishmen, considering that they have been away from home so long, are wonderful. They show more seriousness than we do, as is natural, for they all have felt the strain at home far more than any of us did, and most of them, I expect almost all, have to look forward to a very unwelcome return after all this mess is over from their relatives and friends who are not members of Friends. They have thought out their position much more clearly than we, and though some of them take the war as a personal affront and inconvenience, that attitude is not at all usual. They are going to help in the reconstruction of national relations after the war and I expect will have a bigger share and influence than ever. All of them know somebody in prison for his views and, of course, that doesn't tend to cheer one up, although the letters of such in The Friend, London, which is sent to us regularly, are very beautiful and hopeful reading.

J. H. H.

(To be continued.)

FRIENDS WHO MAKE FRIENDS.

LEWIS GANNETT.

(Lewis Gannett has been appointed official correspondent of American Friends' Service Committee and we hope his articles will appear frequently in THE FRIEND.)

Gruny is a long straggly village in the eternally flat and misty country of the Somme. It was only partially destroyed when the Germans left, but "partially destroyed" means very badly battered. I had a chance to see it last week when I went up to show Gaston Deschamps what the Red Cross is doing. It is an out-of-the-way village, off the main road and hard to find. We weren't certain that it was Gruny we were entering until we caught up with a little donkey-cart driven by a French peasant, under Kellum's able supervision. Then we saw two more brown overalled figures—Hadley and one of the Murray boys—with armloads of sound boards which they had filched out of the remnants of a completely destroyed house and were carrying over to the house they were repairing.

It didn't look like much of a home—that house. But when you studied it a bit more closely, and saw how much had already been done, you appreciated what the boys were doing. They had to put in a new I-beam, and half the roof was slated. They had patched up broken parts of the wall, and gradually that house was becoming habitable. As fast as the houses are finished, the sous-prefet sends in another refugee family.

Further down the road was the school-house. This is their masterpiece. For, although it isn't showy work, there are thirty children back at school where there hadn't been any school for three years. To look at the school-house you might think it had never been blown up. Zavitz was chipping slates in the yard when we passed by, and Jenkins was doing a few finishing touches to the roof, but the building looked finished. This is the building where they had the formal ceremony of re-dedication, presided over by the Mayor, when an American cent, an English penny, and a French sou were boxed together and mortared into the foundations.

Macy and Dunn turned up while we were looking at the school-house. Down a side road we caught a glimpse of Titcomb, Russell and two of the English boys busily cleaning bricks for a side wall which they had nearly finished. They pointed out half a dozen nearby houses with roofs patched with slates of a darker color, brought from the other end of the village, where the destruction had been more complete.

Across the street from them was a house with a large court-yard. There, we were told, the Germans had established a camp in the days of their occupation. The old couple living there now, lived there before the war and through the long years when the Germans held the town. Hayles was hard at work jacking up a partition wall that had been knocked out of place; two or three more of our Unit were cleaning up the place.

The "House of the Green Vine" is at the very end of the town—the last house. Most of the boys live there. I had only a moment to look in—a cosy room full of beds, a fireplace, and one world-weary looking individual sitting disconsolately before the fire. It was Carleton MacDowell, with an infected cheek which laid him up, and entered him, the next day, as the first patient in the new Red Cross Children's hospital at Nesle, three or four miles away.

At Tugny-et-Pont, nearest of the Friends' villages to the front, we found Pye-Smith and Oldham, two of the English Friends, finishing up a group of the Friendly brown barracks made at Dole. The houses, built on an orchard hillside just on the edge of the ruined town, were very attractive. The American boys working there had just left Villers-St. Christophe, nearby, when we hurried through there, but we stopped long enough to see three or four of the little houses set up amid the ruins of the old stone buildings.

I think one's first impression in that region is that the desolation is less than it has been pictured in the press. And then, as you come closer to it, you realize that while the trees and vines are rapidly hiding the ugliness, the sheer mass of detailed destruction is enormous. The problem of reconstruction is not one of months or years or even decades: it is one of generations! There are towns so completely razed that it is hard to believe they will ever be rebuilt. What the Friends and others can do, here and there, is infinitely little in comparison to the extent of the problem: it is in establishing the physical basis for spiritual reconstruction that it counts for most.

When you give a family even a tiny, two-room shelter to live in, where there was nothing but a heap of dust, and a few jagged bits of stone and plaster, you have given it something to call home. And if you add the cheerful presence of half a dozen American boys whistling at their work in the next lot, a few of them able to talk enough French to really become friends to that family, you add more than anyone who hasn't seen those towns can realize. The work of spiritual reconstruction which our boys can do as they come into closer and closer relations with the people among whom they are working is, I believe, even greater than the physical rebuilding.

A lonely old woman had just moved into one of the houses at Villers-St. Christophe two days before we arrived. She had not yet fixed up her cabin, but she was sitting in the doorway mulling over a bowl of soup. When we greeted her, she broke into tears and could hardly tell her story. But between the sobs, she told us a little—that the Americans had built her house, and fixed up her garden, and put up her stove. They had brought a new hope into her old life; that is what the English Friends have been doing for three years, and what our boys begin to do.

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 320.)

I learn there is a great wealth of animal life in the Orinoco lands, and near Villavicencio I had more success seeing this than elsewhere. I had never seen such gorgeous butterflies, they would rise from the trail in clouds of the richest colors. Of birds I saw the toucan, bill and all. Of snakes several sorts, one the coral-snake, but I think finer than ours of the southeast. (Since my return I have seen in a museum, from that country, enormous boas—ours of the Zoo are puny—these I did not see wild.) But I did see monkeys, a large sort, called "micos," mostly legs and arms, but I suspect standing would reach nearly four feet. They were dusky fellows, companionable—in groups of a dozen or twenty—and of course lived wholly in the upper forest, leaping from tree to tree. They would let me watch as long as I liked.

While I was in Villavicencio occurred the first and the most serious of the earthquake-shocks, which for over two weeks have kept us alert. The first was in the midst of night during a thunder-storm—most fortunately it was not severe. The second, and only serious one, over a day later, was about seven in the morning. I had just emerged into the hotel corridor, and it was but a few steps to the middle of the street. There came the people, very scared, the women and girls largely in tears and appealing to the "Santa Virgin." Little damage seemed to have been done,—a little loose mortar and adobe down here and there—when looking toward the church I saw abundant reason for fear. From its face was coming a cloud of dust.

It was the hour of early mass, and the faithful were within. Priests and people—Villavicencio has the finest-faced (almost the only fine-faced) priest I have seen here—forced the door, and then we knew the full truth. Part of one wall had fallen inward, and under it were the injured, and, as it proved, eight dead. Everywhere over this part of Colombia has been the same story of churches, the only, or almost the only buildings damaged, but fortunately I know of no other serious accident. Bogota has suffered little real harm, and other places the same.

I had carried a tent with me, but, on the route over, the slopes had been too steep to possibly use it. Often we had gone along the middle of an open slope; below us, almost directly down, 500 to 600 feet or more, flowed the roaring river, rightly named Rio Negro. Beautiful cascades were frequent. Such topography is excellent for landslides, and for some days the return had to be delayed, until the camino was declared passable. Even then we had some difficulty. We thought the shocks over, but this proved a mistake, we feeling several slight ones during the return. This did add a very real spice of danger, until we had safely passed the open cliffs. These are the main portion of the route.

Since my return I have been waiting here for the arrival of a quintal (100 pounds) of bark from Villavicencio; and of course for instructions from New York. It is pleasant here, surprisingly so by reason of the friends made here.

I am glad to have met Dr. Lund, but did not have the fortune to find his hospital until quite recently. I should have, for it is near enough. I fear he has to struggle with a management not sympathetic to scientific practice.

Especially have I enjoyed the companionship of the Americans, Presbyterians by sect, of the "Colegio Americano" here. They are a fine group, and doing an excellent educational work where it is much needed. We came from New York to Girardot with one just arriving here, Mabel Barnhouse of California, and this gave us an excellent introduction to the group.

With some of them, I have been on several delightful local excursions. Last week a party of us, at Tequendama, where we saw the great falls unusually well. They are about 500 feet high. And I have already spoken of yesterday's trip to the high Paramo.

Now I have written far more than I had thought to do. There seems an indefinite amount to tell, but I must bring this wanderer's tale to an end. I have other letters for this mail.

With best wishes to all, and thanking you indeed for your recent interest on my behalf,
FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(To be continued.)

NEWS ITEMS.

As finally passed by the English House of Commons, the act disfranchising C. O.'s has been amended so as to recognize some lines of non-military service. It now remains with the House of Lords to confirm or reject the bill.

INQUIRIES have been made by the friends of Dennis and Elizabeth Gray as to their address. They are located until Spring at 288 Third Avenue, E. N., Kalispell, Montana. Lumbering in winter and farming in summer occupies Dennis, and their little daughter is recovered from her illness.
H. P. M.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING FIRST MONTH 5, 1918.

Reported last week	$268,419.07
From 13 meetings	3,607.08
From 27 individuals	6,345.25
Interest	780.25
Received for patterns	30.00

$270,182.13

ARMENIAN AND SYRIAN RELIEF.

Reported last week	$642.16
From 14 meetings	272.50
From 2 individuals	10.50

$924.16

CHARLES F. JENKINS, Treasurer.

FRIENDS may be interested to learn that the Collegiate Anti-Militarism League has finally brought out the first of this year's issues of "War?", the bi-monthly periodical of the League. According to the editors the policy of the magazine will be to "keep the colleges alive to the real issues of the hour," and "through free discussion and interchange of ideas to clarify the thought of college men and women on vital matters, and thus enable them to make their ideals felt in a practical and efficient manner." They also hope to make it "a clearing-house for all the best thought of the country on such questions as democratic liberties in time of war, the treatment of conscientious objectors, war aims and peace terms, disarmament, world organization, and the eventual elimination of the curse of war and militarism from the earth."

Among the contributors to this issue are Elbert Russell, David Starr Jordan, Joshua L. Baily, Jr., and J. Howard Branson. A letter to the Secretary of War expresses very forcefully the view-point of a conscientious objector who is outside that charmed circle of those who are "members of a well-recognized religious sect whose creed or principles forbid participation in war."

The Advisory Committee of the League contains the names of the Presidents of four of our Friends' colleges as well as Wilbur K. Thomas of Boston, and Jesse H. Holmes of Swarthmore. The League has representatives in over thirty colleges. Its aim is to foster in the colleges the growth of a group of young people whose aims and ideals are in that spirit "which does away with the occasion of all wars," with the hope that they will not be open to the reproach, "Why were you not true to your ideals? For if you had been then would this curse have not been laid upon us?" The two secretaries of the League and editors of the magazine are Friends, graduates of Haverford. The President of the League though not a Friend is a member of the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

The following letter in the Boston Transcript will interest our readers. We print it without editing.—Eds.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

To the Editor of the Transcript:—

A court-martial in the Western Department of the Army is reported, in a news despatch from San Francisco, dated December 20th, to have stated that ten years in a military prison will be the sentence imposed hereafter upon conscientious objectors to the draft; two such sentences were noted in the same news despatch.

For nearly three years the United States Government was a conscientious objector to the greatest war for liberty that the world has ever known. Are the "ten thousand talents" that this Government owes to Frenchmen, Armenian, Serbian and Belgian to be collected in sums of "an hundred pence" like this?

Everyone who saw the men in registration booths on the day of the national draft, who saw the men going to cantonment and who read the daily reports of the spirit of the men there, knows that nine hundred and ninety-nine in a thousand are, to say the least, willing. Punishing the thousandth for refusing to act contrary to the dictates of his own moral judgment can only blot the draft record and parallel the Belgian deportations; for winning the war means more than outdoing the Prussian in his idea of the game.

In the New York Times of December 23, Dr. Mead, of the University of Chicago, says: "It is not conscription of bodies that threatens democracy, but the conscription of ideas;" and in the same article he says: "The recognition of conscientious objection to fighting appears definitely in the exemption given to those whose religious tenets forbid army service. This exemption not only recognizes the objection, but admits that it constitutes a valid ground for not accepting the draft. Why, then, should not the exemption extend to all those who have such conscientious objection, but who for other reasons do not belong to these non-resistant religious sects?"

II.

DR. GULICK ON CHRISTIANIZING OUR RELATIONS WITH CHINA AND JAPAN.—On the evening of the 4th inst., Sidney L. Gulick, of New York, delivered his lecture on the above subject in the course at Friends' Select School, on "Conditions After the War," given under the auspices of the T. Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College. Dr. Gulick was over twenty-five years a teacher and missionary in Japan, and, for his strong convictions and broad knowledge and experience of the Orient, has been chosen as Executive Secretary of three important inter-denominational commissions or alliances devoted to the promotion of international justice, good-will, and friendship.

Dr. Gulick believes that the predatory methods of European nations in the Orient are at the root of all our difficulties. He thinks that while American treatment of China and Japan across the Pacific has not given ground for shame, our treatment of Chinese and Japanese laborers in America has been shameful. We have at times inflicted on them humiliation and cruelty such as we have never inflicted on European peoples. Consciously or unconsciously we have assumed an unwarranted race superiority. Congressional legislation has repudiated treaty obligations.

What is needed now is a new policy toward China and Japan, fitted to keep their friendship. It must be based on justice and good-will. It must be free from invidious race discrimination and must scrupulously regard treaty obligations. America should lead the way to a new and sincere policy of fair treatment. The rights and interests of Asiatics must be the first consideration in dealing with Asia. National honor and dignity must be respected across the Pacific as well as across the Atlantic. China must no longer be regarded as an opportunity for predatory exploitation. Our treaties with China should no longer be regarded as scraps of paper, but our pledges should be kept through enactment of proper legislation. Differential race legislation, humiliating to those against whom it is directed, should not be allowed. A satisfactory solution to the problem of Asiatic immigration may be found, Dr. Gulick thinks: (1) "In the regulation of all immigration on a common principle; (2) In the specific training of all immigrants for citizenship; (3) In the giving of citizenship to all who qualify regardless of race."

AUDIENCE AT CAMP MEADE.—This morning (Twelfth Month 29 1917), orders were given that all Friends, Mennonites and Dunkards should prepare for a hike. This was later amended to include all but Socialists and I. W. W.'s. We were marched to a Y. M. C. A. behind Colonel ———, Captain ———, Lts. ——— and ———, and two sergeants—an extraordinary escort.

Upon arrival, we filed into the auditorium. A General (name uncertain, but probably General ———) and several other officers came in. "Attention" was called, only one man stood up.

The General started out by explaining that he wanted to have a heart to heart talk with us. He wanted to find some kind of work that we could do. "Do you want to do something about camp or just 'lay' around like a lot of ——— chestnut worms? A lot of men here are willing to fight for your mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts, now what are you willing to do? We have much respect for those who are real religious objectors, but after to-day will not recognize others than those who are Mennonites, Quakers and such."

Care was taken that all soldiers be sent out of the room. A wedding-oid process then commenced. Joseph Gallagher admitted to being a Sinn Feiner when called upon, but he wanted to be a Christian and did object to his society's use of force. "Take him out; we don't want him around here." Christian Lellig, being a Catholic, went out voluntarily. Alonzo Payne, Methodist, was ejected with a curse and remark that some of the best fighters here are Methodists and "you have a yellow streak a yard wide up your back." Josiah Tyson explained that he belongs to the United Evangelical Church. The General didn't know or care anything about that church nor did he care what became of the man so he was allowed to stay.

"Now is there anybody here so small as to object to doing work around camp which would release other men for their training to fight for you; I'd like to see him." Practically every one in the room arose without hesitation—Stabler saying as he stood that we would not do military work.

"Would you lay water pipes to supply yourselves with water?" he asked Stabler.

"Yes, to supply our own needs."

"Would you cook for yourselves and get your own coal?"

"Yes, we have been doing that, except that we burn wood, not coal."

Stabler sat down.

"Now who would do work as cooks or as clerks," the General asked. Several stood, perhaps ten.

"We need six men who will clean up at the Y. W. C. A. Postess House and tend fires, etc., there. Are there some who would volunteer to go down and help the ladies. That's for the good of your mothers and friends, when they come to camp." A good number stood including most of the Quaker crowd, and Lieutenant ——— took down some of the names.

It was asked whether this was to be done under the direction of the Y. W. C. A., or under the military authorities. "No, if it were under the army, I would not ask for volunteers, but order you to do it."

Elmer Ruhl asked if we had to sign the muster roll. "No, the less you take, the more we'll have." "Will what we do be used later on as a weapon against us?" "I'm not here to try to put something over on you. On my honor, what you volunteer to do will not be used against you."

"The Y. M. C. A. wants helpers, too. Are there any who would help them out?" Several were willing.

Robert McClay objected, saying that he could not help the Y. M. C. A. He was over there once, asked the Secretary their object and purpose. The reply was to the effect that it was to hearten the men and make them better soldiers. McClay asked the Secretary if he could explain the way of salvation, but the reply was that that was not in his line, so McClay couldn't help the Y. M. C. A. At this juncture, just as McClay was getting well started, Colonel _____ silenced him, while the General remarked, "Those are only one man's views."

The General then said that after to-day none but those in the room would be recognized as C. O.'s. He directed that the Socialists and "those that we don't recognize" be placed in separate quarters with a guard to prevent our intermingling.

We were then dismissed.

CHRISTIAN PACIFIST TRIAL IN LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA.

[The following account of the trial of three Christian Pacifists is forwarded to us by Septimus Marten.—Eds.]

The attempt of the Christian Pacifists to hold a Conference in any public hall in Long Beach and Los Angeles, California, being frustrated by the authorities, they held their first meeting in an unoccupied room in a large office building in Los Angeles, and it was there that the Chairman, Robert Whitaker, pastor of the first Baptist Church of Los Gatos, Cal., the organizing Secretary, Floyd Hardin, who until then was pastor of the Methodist Church at Atwater, Cal., and Harold H. Story, belonging to the Friends' Church and a recent graduate of Whittier College, Cal., were arrested, and when arraigned before the police court judge they were let out on bail of $500 each, and their trial by jury was fixed for Eleventh Month 14th. This in no way deterred them from attending the sessions of the Conference, which, however, had to be held at private homes.

The trial, which lasted between three and four weeks, was the occasion for many times of great spiritual uplift, and we have reason to believe that this was by no means confined to the sympathizers.

In spite of all the arguments being in favor of the defendants the jury brought in a verdict of guilty against all three of them and on all the three points, namely—(1) holding an unlawful assembly; (2) refusing to disperse when so ordered; (3) disturbing the peace by tumultuous and offensive conduct.

Even the witnesses for the prosecution had to admit the meeting was not tumultuous, for the only intimation of approval or applause was the holding up of a hand, and all present were sympathetic except the officers of the law.

On conviction the bail was increased to $1500 each, and two days later, when the maximum sentence of six months' imprisonment and $1200 fine for each of them was inflicted, the judge increased the bail to $2500 each. So far the trial, including the preliminary expenses for taking the case to a higher court, has cost about $1000, $700 of which has been subscribed for, locally, principally through the sympathy and generosity of one lady and $300 from the National Civil Liberties Bureau and the F. O. R. of New York.

Many of the days in the police court were as spiritually uplifting as the meetings of the Conference had been, especially when the attorney for the defence, J. H. Ryckman, read extracts from the literature of the F. O. R. and the 23rd Psalm, while the Pacifists were repeating in unison when the defendants were being arrested, and perhaps the climax was reached when Floyd Hardin's mother was asked to repeat the prayer she had made during the first meeting of the Conference; this seemed to wrap the whole court in an atmosphere of sanctity and worship. Attorney Ryckman was ably assisted in his wonderful defence by Samuel W. Packard, a well-known but retired barrister of Chicago, now living in Pasadena. The former took over the case when there was not a cent at the back of it, and the latter did it entirely for the cause of freedom and justice, and has probably permanently and seriously injured his already failing eyesight.

The prosecuting counsel laid great stress on the idea that if the jury were loyal patriots they would bring the defendants in guilty or otherwise they would go before the public of the United States as unpatriotic and disloyal citizens, and the fear and prejudice of the jurors were further worked upon by grossly unfair rulings and instructions.

If this National Test Case is to be successfully carried forward through the Superior and, if need be, to the Supreme Court of the United States, immediate and substantial promises of financial help are necessary and should be sent to Septimus Marten, 62 N. Bonnie, Pasadena, Cal.

ENGLISH FRIENDS are face to face with a new situation in regard to the censorship. It is made clear in the following extract from the reported proceedings of the Meeting for Sufferings on Twelfth Month 7th in The Friend (London):—

CENSORSHIP OF LEAFLETS.—The main interest of the Meeting was consideration of what should be the attitude of Friends towards the new regulation 27c of the Defence of the Realm Act. The subject was brought up by a minute of the Service Committee, stating that they felt unable to be bound by it, since to work for peace and good-will was the duty of all, and could not depend upon the consent of the Censor. This minute was unanimously endorsed by a conference of representatives of the following Committees: Service, Message, Yorkshire 1905, Home Mission and Extension, Peace, All Friends' Conference, Friends' Foreign Mission Association, and Friends' Tract Association, together with the Clerks of the Yearly Meeting and Meeting for Sufferings and the Recording Clerk, and was sent forward by the Peace Committee.

Joan M. Fry, on behalf of the Service Committee, said that the regulation went to the very root of our existence as a free Society. All history was pushing us forward along a quite simple and clear line, and she hoped we should give out a definite statement that we cannot accept the law as binding our action, since the Christian conscience could not be bound by the State. Quakers and Peace were linked together in the minds of people at large, and we ought to give our best thoughts to the way of peace, and to be allowed to express them. If we, as a religious Society, are to submit what we have to say to a Government office, we give away our whole position as Christians; we cannot give up the right to say what seems to us the teaching of Christ. A great tide of fear is whirling past us; we must be like the rock and stand firm for the things for which we have always stood.

J. W. Graham, as clerk of the Conference, said that it had been very remarkable to see how Friends had come up from all parts of the country with the clear and unanimous feeling that the time had come when the Society must stand for the liberty of delivering its message. Milton's plea for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing had been successful, and to get a parallel for the present regulation it was necessary to go back to the time when the New Testament in English was forbidden. If the Meeting for Sufferings could see its way to public utterance, it might do much to cheer and help other bodies. Our principle must be that we will not be bound or hindered by Government rule from publishing anything we feel it our duty to publish. Our young men have been willing to go to prison for conscience' sake, and older men must now be ready to take their part in the struggle for freedom of conscience.

A great number of Friends took part in the discussion that followed. There was almost complete unanimity in regard to the impossibility of the Society of Friends allowing itself to be silenced by an outside body; but some Friends thought that there should be delay until the final form of the regulation was known. It was pointed out, however, that the action of the Message Committee would be at once affected, and that the fact that the rule was under consideration was a reason for acting promptly.

L. Violet Hodgkin said that the original seventeenth century name for Friends had been Publishers of Truth; was the twentieth century name for them to be Censored Publishers of Truth?

John Morland thought that as a religious body, no other course was open to us but that of the apostles: "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." The press had now largely taken the place of the spoken voice. But it behooved us to be more than ever careful that the things we do speak or print are the things we have seen and heard. There needs to be more careful internal censorship; but having seen this, we must be prepared to take the consequences.

W. E. Wilson said that besides our traditional interest in peace, there was our further interest in absolute toleration, and this was perhaps even more important than the other.

After full and careful deliberation the Clerk submitted a minute appointing a few Friends to draw up a brief and dignified statement of our position and to make it clear that we could not be bound by the Censor in what we might feel it right to issue. This statement was brought in to the afternoon sitting and agreed to as follows:—

"The Executive body of the Society of Friends, after serious consideration, desires to place on record its conviction that the portion of the recent regulation requiring the submission to the Censor of all letters dealing with the War and the making of Peace is a grave danger to the national welfare. The duty of every good citizen to express his thoughts on the affairs of his country is hereby endangered, and further, we believe that Christianity requires the toleration of opinions not our own lest we should unwittingly hinder the workings of the Spirit of God. Beyond this there is a deeper issue involved. It is for Christians a paramount duty to be free to obey, and to act and speak in accord with the law of God, a law higher than that of any State, and no Government official can release men from this duty.

"We realize the rarity of the occasions on which a body of citizens find their sense of duty to be in conflict with the law, and it is with a sense of the gravity of the decision, that the Society of Friends must on this occasion act contrary to the regulation and continue to issue literature on war and peace, without submitting it to the Censor. It is convinced that in this standing for spiritual liberty it is acting in the best interests of the nation.

"J. T. ELIOTT, Clerk."

It was decided to send a copy to members of the Government and to all Members of the House of Commons; to Preparative Meetings, to the various publishing committees of Friends, as well as to the press. A suggestion to endeavor to arrange for a deputation to present the statement to the Home Secretary was put on one side, on the ground that it would cause delay.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[Our Friend, J. E., kindly permits us to print the following.—Eds.]

VEYTAUX, Belmont Road, Reigate, Surrey

DEAR FRIEND, JOSEPH ELKINTON:—

For many months I have wanted thee to know how very useful the Philadelphia FRIEND is. My niece, Mary Fox, sends it to me. I pass it on to our Reigate Friends, and the latter of these posts it to a Friend in New Zealand. For myself, I read it with the deepest interest, and should miss it nearly as much as our own Friend if deprived of it. It is a paper that has become in its widening scope what my father would have called "juicy." What I enjoy most is the narration of the active service you Friends are accomplishing, enough to put us to shame, for we are still rather slow. It fills one's heart with hope to see how you and we are joining hands in various ways.

I think both A. K. Brown and Blair Neatby would find place at once in the hearts of the more conservative Friends. I noted they had been at Moylan and at Philadelphia. Please kindly continue to us the favor already bestowed. The articles on the C. O.'s at Camp Meade I read lately at one of our F. O. R. gatherings.

NOTICES.

At the Abington Monthly Meeting, held last month, it was decided that hereafter the Abington Monthly Meeting will be held at Abington each month, instead of alternating with Horsham.

WESTWON SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westwton Station trains leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia (Penna. R. R.), at 6.21, 8.21 A. M., and 2.45, 3.35, 4.55 P. M., other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

THE THOMAS WISTAR BROWN Graduate School of Haverford College announces a course of Lectures on Conditions after the War.

Friends' Select School, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, has offered its Lecture Room for the purpose.

The following are arranged:—

First Month 11, 1918—Gifford Pinchot—"The Farmer After the War."

First Month 18, 1918—Dr. John Dewey (Professor of Philosophy in Columbia University)—"Education After the War."

First Month 25, 1918—Dr. John Haynes Holmes (of the Church of the Messiah, New York)—"The Message of the Church After the War."

Other Lectures may follow. Admission is free and all are invited. Lectures begin at 8 o'clock.

The hour for holding the First-day Meeting at Springfield, Pa., has been changed to 11 A. M. The Bible Class meets in the Meeting-house at 10.15 A. M. The attendance of interested Friends will be welcomed.

The women members and attenders of Twelfth Street Meeting are cordially invited to the Monthly Meeting Room on Fourth-days, 2 to 4.30 P. M., to sew for Friends' Emergency Service.

THE CLOTHING DEPARTMENT of the American Friends' Service Committee is now prepared to supply patterns of foreign garments to any individuals or Monthly Meetings that wish to do relief sewing. Our patterns have been made according to directions received from English Friends by the Home Pattern Co., of New York. They represent the most accurate form of instructions for making foreign garments which we have been able to obtain. They may be had from Anne G. Walton, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

MEETINGS FROM FIRST MONTH 13th to 19th:—

Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Western District, Twelfth below Market Street, Fourth-day, First Month 16th, at 5 P. M. Business session at 7 P. M.

Burlington, Fifth-day, First Month 17th, at 10.30 A. M.

MARRIED.—At Friends' Meeting-house, Haddonfield, N. J., Twelfth Month 15, 1917, ARTHUR E. HAINES, of Paoli, and MARION D. WHITACRE, of Collingswood, N. J.

—, at Friends' Meeting-house, West Chester, Pa., Twelfth Month 8, 1917, GEORGE E. MATAACK, of Moorestown, N. J., and SARAH H. FORSYTHIE, of Westwton, Pa.

DIED.—At Baltimore, Md., Third Month 9, 1916, FRANK H. DAVIS, son of Clarissa and the late Charles W. Davis; a member of Baltimore Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at the home of her niece, Rebecca C. Hopkins, Colora, Md., Fourth Month 3, 1917, CLARISSA DAVIS, aged eighty-five years, widow of Charles W. Davis; a minister of Baltimore Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, Twelfth Month 20, 1917, at West Georges Hill, Philadelphia, SAMUEL M. BINES, aged eighty-nine years; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting.

—, Twelfth Month 25, 1917, ARNOLD CHASE SCATTERGOOD, son of Maria C. and the late Thomas Scattergood, aged nineteen years; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

—, Twelfth Month 18, 1917, at the residence of her son, Joseph J. Hartz, LYDIA ANN HARTZ, widow of William D. Hartz, aged eighty-two years; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, at his home, near Rich Square, N. C., Twelfth Month 28, 1917, HENRY T. OUTLAND, in the seventy-second year of his age; a member and minister of Rich Square Monthly Meeting.

CORRECTED NOTICE.

—, at the home of her niece, Deborah C. Battey, at Middleton, near Columbianna, Ohio, PHIBBE ELLYSON, widow of Robert Elyson, Eleventh Month 21, 1917, in the ninety-fourth year of her age; a member and Elder of Middleton Monthly and Particular Meetings.

WM. H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS,
No. 422 WALNUT STREET, PHILA., PA.

FOUNDED 1865.

THE PROVIDENT
LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY

OF PHILADELPHIA

Insurance is Protection—Insurance is Saving—Insurance Establishes an Estate.

How can a man begin better than by taking a practical Provident policy?

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER

S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.

COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET

PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: LOCUST 243
RACB 601

WISSAHICKON INN
REDLANDS,
CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley. At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roofs for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER and GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
1724 SANSON STREET

Engraving and Printing
FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY
Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting
Cards. Die Stamped Writing Paper

TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School
SWARTHMORE, PA.

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for the Winter Term, 1918:

"The Life of Christ," "The Hebrew Prophets," and "Church History," by Elbert Russell.

"The Adolescent Age in the First-day School," by William Byron Forbush.

"International Organization," by William I. Hull.

"The Development of Religious Thought," by Rufus M. Jones.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community." (To be announced.)

Term begins First Month 7th.

ELBERT RUSSELL,

Director.

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Cutsm of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER
GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1898. Experience 20 years; Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

W. J. MacWaters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic - - - - - Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhart Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.80

1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

by freight or express, l. o. b., Colara.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mimeographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Typewriting, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO
well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolleys.
Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."

SMALL HOUSE WANTED IN SUBURB OF PHILAdelphia (Rural preferred); near School and Friends'
Meeting; with good train or trolley service.
HAROLD TRYST,
CARE OF "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—ANY FRIENDS' BOOKS OR WRITings, or any reading matter pertaining to The Society of Friends, which any Friends can spare or send to help make a collection. All highly appreciated and carriage paid. Send to JEREMIAH C. ALLEN, Boylston, Va.

TANNATE ROUND BELTING

Has The Grip That Stops the Slip

It is tough.

It saves break-downs.

It reduces repairs, idle wages and overhead charges.

Its grip and flexibility favor easy drives and save take-ups.

Sizes $\frac{1}{8}$ " to $\frac{3}{4}$ " in diameter.

The larger sizes made in two or more plies securely joined.

Prove its advantages by a parcel post order.

J. E. RHOADS & SONS

PHILADELPHIA: 12 N. THIRD ST.
NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.
BALTIMORE AGENCY: 37 S. CHARLES ST.
FACTORY AND TANNERY: WILMINGTON, DEL.

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.

Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of

RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton

TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Barling 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH and RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1649

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E.

Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

THE following timely books recommended by the Social Order Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, are for sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

"The Practice of Christianity."	$2.00
"The Church and the Hour."
Vida D. Scudder,	1.00
"The Social Problem."
C. A. Ellwood,	1.25
"The Abolition of Poverty."
J. H. Hollander,75
"Christianizing the Social Order."
Walter Rauschenbusch,	1.50
"The Arm of God."
William Littleboy,75
"The Day of Our Visitation."
John Woolman,50
"A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich."
John Woolman,05

GIRARD TRUST CO.
BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian, Administrator, Assignee and Receiver. Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults. Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 17, 1918.

No. 29.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSTHTE.

Editors
{ J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVIS H. FORSTHTE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

*Lord God of love, let us have peace,
From war's vain sacrifice give us release,
Grant peace that victorious war cannot know,
God of the Ages, thy mercy show.
Hast Thou not seen thy fields and meadows green
Red with the blood of men where war hath been?
Dost Thou not know war's fearful, endless roll,
The countless graves of those who paid the toll?
Teach us to learn to build, O gentle Lord,
Not to destroy; but bend each wielded sword
Into a ploughshare, Thy fields to increase,
Lord of the lives to be, let us have peace!
God of the fatherless, we pray to thee,
Father of all of us, hear thou our plea,
"Peace and good-will!" Thine own word increase,
Lord God of Love, let us have peace!*

—Anthem by Bell.

Sent as greeting from Isaac and Catharine Bean Cox, Honolulu.

THE ANGEL OF SORROW.

"Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee, O Jehovah; Lord, hear my voice."—Psalms, cxxx: 1.

We all have many happy days, yet trouble some time or other is the common lot. I often think of sorrow as an angel knocking, knocking at our hearts. We do not want to let him in. We are afraid of him. His message seems cruel. The distant beatings of his wings dismay us. His presence terrifies us. We do not see the smile upon his countenance. We do not understand what consolation he may speak. We do not appreciate the balm he offers. We do not realize that he beckons us to peace.

My heart goes out this morning to a sorrowing world. I think of the pains that afflict mankind from the cradle to the grave. I remember the destitute, the starving. I see the economic pressure on every side; the physical, the moral, the mental, the spiritual stress about us. I recall the separations, the dissipated hopes, the tears, the agonies of the battlefield. I think of the millions who need a Saviour, who know not the love of God, and who do not realize that there is happiness and vigor in Jesus Christ.

So the old cry, the cry of all the ages, the cry of Jehovah's mighty prophets, the cry of His broken little children rings in my ears: "Why is it so? Why is it so?"

God's ways are not our ways—His thoughts are not our thoughts. As the heavens are above us, so is His intent higher than we can comprehend. He does not willingly grieve the children of men. History discloses, our deeper experiences teach us that He permits the angel of sorrow to visit us for our good. Happy are we if we with faith reach out our hands to the somber messenger for then the rustle of his pinions will become as music to our souls.

I ask God's suffering people who may read these simple lines to humbly bow beneath the storm that seems to make shipwreck of their faith. After the angel of sorrow has passed Jesus comes. The chastened soul is the Tabernacle into which He enters. The heartache, the tear, the moan are relieved and cease with submission to the will of the universal Father. God reigns behind the clouds. After the darkness and the prison-house come light and gladness. "Sorrow may endure for the night, but joy cometh in the morning."

Then I think of the wonderful land to which the angel of sorrow beckons us. He points to heaven. The thorny path—nail some day be no longer too, temptations must forever cease, death shall be swallowed up in victory. Then the beautiful angel of gladness shall welcome us and the Cross of the Crucified One will become our eternal theme.

W. C. A.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL.

OUR DISLOCATED SOCIETY.

Comparatively speaking, we have been at war a very short time, but it is likely one would have to seek far to find a household, or even an individual, that has not suffered some inconvenience from the general demoralization of ordinary living and business conditions. In one place the food shortage has been acute, in another the coal famine has left families or business undertakings helpless; everywhere the price and scarcity of labor have paralyzed not only new undertakings, but the ordinary service of our home activities. In some lines the Federal Government has come to the rescue with its larger powers and its more centralized organization. This relief, however, is largely future, and in order somewhat to appease public discontent, there has been set in operation, also by the Federal Government, more than one distinct line of appeal to the patience and patriotism of our people—to display a reasonable amount of heroism in suffering inconvenience or even serious loss.

Although apart from the considerations at present in mind, in writing this editorial, it seems quite natural to observe that our two and a-half centuries of training as a people have produced an aversion to the necessary fruits of war, as well as to war itself. It is really a part of our democratic heritage to regard the present sum of inconvenience and suffering (although it may be but a beginning) as actually a great wrong. The nation may bear it, but its real protest against it can not fail to impress those in authority. This is constantly evident in the very general response to every glimmer of hope for peace, and especially is it evident in the way the nation listens to the President as he unexpectedly addresses Congress on International Relations.

366 CYRUS COOPER
H. V. D., P. O. 2

How, as Friends, are we facing these altered conditions of life? Can we as Friends find a way to face them that will exalt the "better way of life" we profess?

Friends have been largely responsible for their own kind of training, now for more than a hundred years. In addition to a well-established tradition of home-making they have had their own schools. Much outside testimony might be cited, were it necessary to show, that this combination had produced a distinct type of character. Two points in this type will be generally recognized. It is religiously averse to waste. It is trained to a measure of self-help that at least affords some degree of independence in the face of labor shortage. Without in any way claiming a monopoly of these characteristics, it may be in order for us to inquire what our present responsibility for service with them may be.

We may feel very keenly that we do not intend to serve war aims with our homes or with any special gifts we may have by training or heredity. Far be it from us to make any plea against such resolutions. We sympathize with them. But all the while the vast army of the innocents, many times larger than that in uniform, silently appeals, not only for our money but for us. If these are rightly on our hearts, if we have any particular capacities, even if we feel that we have very limited capacities, we can not resist such calls. Shortly after the war commenced, a private letter from England told how two women Friends had vacated a large and most attractive home, and hired in its stead a small but convenient cottage. The spur to this action was not so much necessity, as the conviction that a suffering world would need them and their surplus of money. The simple establishment released them from many cares and its inexpensiveness gave them a larger surplus to distribute. In some cases this might be very ill-advised action. Comfortable and somewhat spacious homes if maintained in simplicity may be most valuable instruments of service. The point we wish to make is that the unprecedented world situation is of direct concern to us. We cannot shut it out of our lives.

Our young Friends have struck the heroic note in leaving all and going out to France and Italy and Russia. We stay-at-homes, however, are not excluded from the field of heroism. If our faith and practice are to be properly squared with the belief that a new world order is possible we shall have to be examples of it. Some lines of work are clearly too closely associated with war activities to appeal to us, but a multitude of others can not be objected to on this ground. As pointed out before in THE FRIEND, our regular institutions of education, of relief, of uplift are under great strain. It is something to meet with their committees, to confer with their executives. Are we preparing ourselves to go to them in person with a free bestowal of the labor of our hands or of our head? Another year of war will find us sorely beset with such appealing opportunities? Our reputed ability in thrift and in self-help should be of very great service.

J. H. B.

DOUBLE NUMBER.

Many Friends have welcomed the previous double numbers of our paper. The editors are especially pleased with the situation of accumulating matter that makes such numbers necessary. It shows a widening interest in expression. Behind this we take it there is the assured feeling that we are more confident amongst ourselves of a growing fellowship. Our small group represents many varieties, but the common bond of love—when it is really of the Christian kind—is able to bring us all together.

DELAYS IN DELIVERY.

We are unaware that THE FRIEND has been very irregularly delivered for some weeks past. At no time has it been late in leaving our office. The explanation at the Post Office is that many of their employees have volunteered for service, and that new men have not learned their jobs. The congestion of express business has put the Department under great stress because of an increase in parcel post mail. It may assist some, for Friends to send a line to the Philadelphia Post Office noting the delay. We shall do all that seems compatible with the unnatural situation of affairs.—EDs.

RETROSPECTION.

Our most excellent Discipline strongly advises our members to examine at least once a year the state of their temporal affairs and make their wills and settle their outward estates whilst in health. Being careful upon this point suggests a far more important matter—that of taking an account of our spiritual condition particularly at the beginning of a new year so fraught with momentous considerations. The query forces itself upon our minds, have we fulfilled our mission in the year that has passed? And can we not do better in the year upon whose threshold we are now entering? Considerations like these will lead to a feeling of the necessity of girding on the whole Spiritual armor and standing ready and waiting for the call to service, no matter what that service may be. It is no time to give way to discouragement—the situation calls loudly to us to be "Up and doing with a heart for any fate,

Still achieving, still pursuing, learn to labor and to wait.

In the world's broad field of battle, in the bivouac of life,

Be not like dumb driven cattle, be a hero in the strife."

It is a time when tremendous sacrifices are being made by those who honestly are offering their all in response to what they believe to be their country's call, and shall we do less at the call of what we understand to be the will of Him who is Lord of Lords and King of Kings? The faithful of all generations have helped to build up the Militant Church of Christ, and the faithful of our day are hastening the glad time when Christ's Militant Church will come forth from the wilderness, leaning upon Her Beloved. It would seem that very little can be done to stop this most cruel war, but much can be done in casting into the Lord's treasury our own offerings, even though it be the two mites. The great Lord of the harvest will do the rest. Thus we shall do our part in hastening the glad day when wars shall forever cease and the reign of Christ the Prince of Peace, shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

"The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." We have our martyrs in this day of trial, who are adding their all to put new life and power into the Church militant, and these shall know an overcoming and be favored to sit down with Christ in His throne.

B. V.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER WRITTEN BY HENRY LLOYD WILSON TO JOSEPH ELKINTON, TWELFTH MONTH 12, 1917.

"One advantage of a quinquennial meeting is that it affords a more decided comparison with the former one than is the case in an annual one.

"We watch our Yearly Meetings as a series and note the developments over a period, only very occasionally noting a great contrast between two consecutive ones.

"The mention of the greatly-increased interest in the Five Years' Meeting compared with the former, makes me wonder what is the cause. Is it the drawing together of the separated bodies of Friends, or the deepening of real spiritual life and earnestness throughout the whole Society? How much of the greater interest was due to the deepened seriousness caused by war?

"When I think of the experiences we have gone through during the three and a-half years of war and then realize that your great country is only just beginning to understand what it means in daily experience, I am filled with an intense longing that the ghostly tragedy may close before you have slid too far down the slippery slope to be able to stop. The suffering and sorrow are awful, but the appalling collapse of morality in every walk of life is more than I could have thought possible in this country. It has come gradually and I think a great many people do not at all realize it."

THE CALL FOR A NEW EVANGELISM.

[In a feeling that this call is world-wide and very distinctly applicable to Friends in our country we reprint from The Friend [London] the following letter.—Eds.]

DEAR FRIENDS:—In view of the tremendous need of the present time in our own and other lands, between forty and fifty Friends met in Birmingham for prayer and conference from the twenty-third to the twenty-seventh of Eleventh Month, by special invitation of Cornelis Boeke and George A. Fox. Without any prearranged design, the group was found to represent England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland, and missionaries from five of our fields attended.

It was in an upper room at Bull Street Meeting-house that they gathered with one accord and in which the leadership and power of the Holy Spirit were strikingly manifested. The subjects that came under consideration were as follows: (1) "The Need of the World," (2) "The Problem," "The Seeking of the People," (3) "The Tool," "The Condition of the Churches, including our own Society," (4) "The Message," "The Abundant Sufficiency of Christ," (5) "The Principles of giving the Message," "The Psychology of Evangelism," (6) "The Practice of giving the Message," "Breaking the Bonds of Conventional Methods," (7) "The Call to our Society for a New Evangelism."

As they waited upon God their own impotence and failure to reach the hungry souls with the message of a living Saviour were deeply realized, and a loud call was heard to put on one side everything that hindered the presentation of Jesus to the people. He asks that each of us may be so entirely yielded up to Him that He alone may be magnified, that all men may be drawn unto Him. The anarchist for his gospel of destruction is prepared to sign his own death warrant, deny himself wife, home, family, and all that we hold dear, to become literally dead to the world. How much more must we be willing to sacrifice all to proclaim the Gospel of Salvation in and through Jesus Christ. The presence of Catherine Booth-Clibborn, under a strong personal concern to attend, was felt from the first to be unmistakably in right ordering, and again and again her messages were in life and power.

The empty places of worship seemed to constitute a clear indication that the people have lost confidence in Christians, but abundant evidence was given that they have not lost their confidence in Christ. The multiplying movements of the day are many of them the outcome of the Churches' failure to proclaim a full Gospel.

Out of a deep sense of humiliation there was born a mighty hope and a strong conviction that the triumph of Christ is assured; it only tarries through our lack of love and our faltering obedience. There was a desire that similar groups might draw together in different centres. Already a gathering is planned to be held at Colchester, First Month 13th to 18th.

A fuller account of the Birmingham Conference is being prepared and will be sent free of charge to those who are interested, on application to George A. Fox, 1, Ivy Place, Colchester. Thine sincerely,

RACHEL B. BRAITHWAITE.

LONDON, Eleventh Month 30, 1917.

HENRY OUTLAND.

JACOB ELFRETH.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." The above lines came into my mind on hearing of the death of our dear friend Henry Outland.

Several years ago, while on a visit at our house, we were talking on Prayer, and on its being answered by our Heavenly Father, when he told me the following:—

When he was about thirteen years of age, during the Civil War, the President of the Southern Confederacy issued a call for 200,000 men, to be raised by draft. At that time his father was about thirty-five years of age and subject to draft. He had a family of little children, and he and his wife were in great distress at the probability of his being drawn, and she being left to provide and care for their family. Henry said one day while in the field ploughing he was suddenly arrested by a voice within (which he said was the Holy Spirit) telling him if he got down where he was, and prayed to God not to have his father taken to the war, his prayer would be answered, and his name would not be drawn from the wheel.

He said he knelt down where he was and prayed to his Heavenly Father that his father's name should not be drawn, and that he should not be taken from them. He said while kneeling he was told that his prayer had been heard, and that his father would not be taken. He arose from his knees, went to the house and told his mother what had occurred, and the promise that his father would not have to go. The draft took place in a few days and his father was not drawn. There were several drafts afterwards, but he was not drawn.

A year or two after the war closed, H. said he went with his father to Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina, on some business. There were a number of men standing around in front of the steps leading up to the capitol building; among them was a State official, who had been Provost Marshal of the district in which they lived during the war. Henry said his father went up the steps while he stayed below. As his father was going up the steps, one of the men who was talking to the Provost said, who is that man going up the steps? His reply was his name is Outland, he lives near High Point, and there is something about him I never could understand; during the war I put his name in the draft wheel five times, and yet it was never drawn. Henry said to me I knew and understood the reason. Yes, my dear brother, "God is a God, hearing and answering prayer."

LANSDOWNE, First Month 7, 1918.

It is very important that teachers should realize the importance of habit, and psychology helps us greatly at this point. We speak, it is true, of good habits and of bad habits; but, when people use the word "habit," in the majority of instances it is a bad habit which they have in mind. They talk of the smoking-habit and the swearing-habit and the drinking-habit, but not of the abstention-habit or the moderation-habit or the courage-habit. But the fact is that our virtues are habits as much as our vices. All our life, so far as it has definite form, is but a mass of habits—practical, emotional, and intellectual—systematically organized for our weal or woe, and bearing us irresistibly toward our destiny, whatever the latter may be.—WILLIAM JAMES.

WHY NOT TRY IT?

A. M. WILTON.

"What you say," writes a correspondent, "is all very true. But the world can't be run on Quaker principles."

I don't know! I have been thinking it out. Here is the world we have made, this world of blood and tears, of anguish and hate and dread.

How have we come to this chaos? We have said, or we have allowed to be said, without contradicting the lie, that emulation is the necessary stimulus for school life; that competition is the soul of business; that advertisement is the great secret of success; that ambition is the master key of life. We see now, on the largest scale, competition at work—not between man and man but between nation and nation. They have been competing for years for the things that have to do with life; for trade, for influence, for new territory, for money and power and fame. They are competing now for the means of death; for the biggest gun; for the most deadly poison gas; for the most complete means of starving each other. Emulation has been at work, and the contest is now which school, which business, which county, which nation shall send the largest number into the general slaughter. Ambition has had full swing, the capitalist has seen, and used, his chance to make more money than ever in his life before, and the workman who is getting treble his former wages is furious at finding that he has to pay three times as much for everything that he buys, and so is very much where he was before. And advertisement! When has the world seen such an orgy of bragging as the last few years have witnessed? Is there anything about which we don't brag, from our Empire and our army down to our food economies and our shabby clothes! And, most amusing of all, we still brag of our national modesty and reticence.

Suppose that, turning in utter weariness and disappointment from this world which we have made, we turn to the one human life which the world has agreed to recognize as the one supremely beautiful, the one entirely successful life, though it closed in apparent failure, with almost all the world against Him.

"Learn of Me," says the quiet voice, "I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." "Love one another as I have loved you." "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness." "If thy brother trespass against thee go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone." "Forgive until seventy times seven." "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones." "Become as little children." "A man's life consists not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Let us imagine a world in which these principles were not merely acclaimed but were the acknowledged law of life. What a lovely, loving world it would be! What a happy, peaceful, energetic world! Think of a world in which there was no striving for mastery, no trying to get the best place; where forgiveness was ready for every repentance; where every child was tenderly cared for; where no one need be anxious about the supply of the daily human needs, and no one would care to lay up treasure for himself, knowing that there would always be enough for all.

Imagine such a world—a world relieved from care, from hunger, from spite, and arrogance, and selfishness, and dishonesty. A world that had ceased to be anxious about the morrow, yet that was keenly, resolutely bent on serving, a world in which all the energy of life was poured into one un-resting quest for the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.

If these are Quaker principles they are so only because Quakers have decided to put in practice the laws which almost all the world accepts in theory, alas! in theory only.

"But," say the objectors, "it isn't practicable. It couldn't be done."

Is there any sphere in which these principles have actually been applied? If so, what is the result of the experiment?

There is one thing in which I think we may claim to have made a success, more or less complete. It is the family. Family life is not all that it might be, but there are everywhere to be found beautiful homes where love is the law of life and service the aim of the household. And even where the family unity is imperfect and the flame of love burns low, all the happiness there, is obtained by the deliberate rejection of the world's maxims, by willingness to serve, to put aside one's own claims for the sake of others, not to insist on one's rights, not to revenge an injury, to feel that the happiness of one is the happiness of all.

No high range of idealism is necessary, merely the ordinary human decency which is almost universal, to ensure that in the family the claims of the helpless come first. The baby, the young children, the sick, the aged, must have their wants supplied before the others can be fully satisfied. Even where, as is the case in almost all working-class families, the father is well fed, often at the cost of the mother and the children having less than they should, this is no selfish act. It is as the breadwinner that his need is satisfied, it is for the sake of all the rest.

Let us think, on the other hand, of the families we know which have made utter failure and shipwreck. Do we not see in every case that there has been an adoption of the maxims of the world? A resolve to dominate on the part of the parents, resistance to such domination on the part of the children; the attempt to outshine, to surpass others; the toilsome accumulation of things which bring no joy to the heart that gathers them; the disposition to exact, not to render, service; the remembering of little offences, the treasuring up of the sense of injury; the hardness which sees in the sick and the aged only obstacles to the "living of one's own life."

Well, it is so obvious that the principles of Christ, when followed out in the family prove an entire success, when set aside spell ruin, more or less entire, is it not just possible that if they were tried in other spheres—say between workmen and employers—the experiment might result in an undreamed of success? I think in a wonderfully short space of time a new feeling would spring up, and the bond of brotherhood would become, not a thing which could only be dreamed of by cranks and fanatics, but a living, practical reality.

"I am sick of it all," I have heard more than one employer say. "I am not the men's master; they are my master."

There, then, is the word for you—the weary and heavily-laden rich man. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart. . . . I came not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

And then, between nation and nation. We have tried the one way and it has not been a success. Can we not give at least a trial to the other? We have run the world on the principles of the firm of Mammon & Moloch. And we have made of it a hell. Might we not try "Quaker principles" as offering the greatest possible change?

There are three instances in which Quaker principles have been tried and in two already the world has come round to them. The pioneers of prison reform were Elizabeth Fry, a Quaker, and John Howard, who, though not a member of the Society of Friends, was deeply imbued with their principles. Gentle and humane treatment of the insane was, in great measure, initiated by the Quakers. In these things the world has endorsed their judgment and adopted their plans.

In the third case the great experiment was tried of a community living unarmed, unprotected, with open doors, in the immediate neighborhood of tribes who were the sworn foes of every "pale face;" who were noted for their relentless cruelty and for the horrible atrocity of the tortures they inflicted on their victims. William Penn, armed only with justice and good-will, buying from the Indians the land which a royal grant had already bestowed on him, making a treaty with them that there should never be injury or strife between their people and his, has shown for all time what can be done when there is the sincere wish to love mercy and do justice, and walk humbly with our God. And as long as Penn lived, the Quakers were the only white men who lived unarmed among the Indians, and the only ones who were never attacked by them.

Why not at least try "running the world on Quaker principles?"—From The Ventureur.

Reprinted at the suggestion of Frances Tatam Rhoads.

DO YOU GIVE LIKE THIS?

PAUL J. FURNAS.

For three hours we had tramped through the sand and the pines of Camp Jackson, South Carolina. Leonard F. Winslow and I were searching for Friends sent to the camp from within North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

Our list had dwindled to one name. All the men listed had been located with this one exception. More than once I questioned whether it was worth while to search further. Finally, after again tramping almost the length of the camp, we found the barracks where the man we sought was enrolled. An unsatisfactory conversation with a sergeant, to whom the fact that I was a Quaker did not recommend me, and then a much more satisfactory conversation with the captain resulted in the sergeant searching out the man we sought. In a few minutes we felt entirely repaid, for at once our new found Friend was telling us of his trials and experiences. He was a true spirited, mild-mannered young man, whose character reminded me of John Woolman's. His commanding officer had told him that if he would not do service in the army, he couldn't eat there. He had replied that he preferred to buy his own food anyway.

Two more Friends having been found, I outlined to the three the great constructive ideal which Friends are attempting to express to the world through our Reconstruction work. As I spoke to them, my first found Friend reached in his pocket and taking from it a little roll of money, unrolled a dollar bill and handed it to me. As he did so, the other two Friends reached into their pockets for equal amounts. I could scarcely bring myself to take the money, yet I would not have refused this wonderful expression of sacrifice and good-will coming from these three men from the mountains of North Carolina, one of whom was living on sandwiches bought with his own money at a canteen and the other two of whom had been brought to camp under arrest because they could not take part in acts which would deny their consciences before their God.

If Friends everywhere had the abiding Christian spirit in their hearts and the will to sacrifice which these three men in Camp Jackson showed, we could finance a work of a million dollars per year instead of the five hundred thousand dollars work which we have undertaken.

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 355.)

BOGOTA, Colombia, Ninth Month 28, 1917.

My days of waiting here are valuable for collecting specimens for the Garden, and, unexpectedly for this season, we have been having good weather, for tramps and for drying specimens. I have been almost daily on the mountains or sabana. Yesterday was the week's great trip, and in the most novel company for me, that of the Hermanos Cristianos.

The Hermanos de las Escuelas Cristianas—Brothers of the Christian schools—commonly called Christian Brothers—are a group of Catholic men, devoted to teaching. They appear to have the best schools here, and are doing a most valuable work. For natural science their museum here is the best in Colombia, and among the instructors in their University of La Salle are four or five much interested in botany. These four or five, as apparently most of their teachers, are French.

Yesterday we left before 7 A. M. and, with three black-robed brethren, one no older than myself, I tramped up mountain trails over the paramo to three little lakes, one of which was Laguna de Vergon. I had seen this name on the map, but had expected it to be larger. The three brothers all were botanical (and all spoke English); the youngest, name unknown, hunted ferns and club mosses ardently; another, who had much the best knowledge of the flora, helped me much by telling me the genera of plants, his name I need to see in writing, to learn; the third, whom I had met at the college, was almost uncomfortably friendly, would carry my specimens that I might have hands free to collect, etc., etc. He it was who at the college had pressed wine upon me with an insistent courtesy most difficult to refuse—yesterday, as a further act of courtesy, knowing my stubbornness—the good brothers carried no wine for lunch. An ample and good lunch they provided, however. Brother Ariste was the third brother, he has been here fourteen years; he is from Alsace, and his French sympathies are most decided. We had, or rather the brothers had, a peon to carry the large valise from which came the lunch and into which went our specimens. I took José to carry plant-press and camera, but the former I did not use, and the latter (because of lack of sun) very little.

It was a good day on the paramo, cloudy but the clouds high. Usually, or at least very frequently there, the clouds drift by you as chilling banks of fog (making you think of the obscurity of snow flurries). We returned with many things.

I have now over 2250 collections and 55 species of Scrophulariaceae, more of this family than I had supposed possible to obtain from the little area from which I have collected. Castilleja leads with nine species and Bartsia (a mountain genus first seen during my return from Villavicencio) is now second with eight. The *Penstemon*s, so abundant in the western United States, and likewise the Gerardias of our Southeast, are here completely absent (the former not occurring south of Guatemala, but the latter in eastern South America.)

The Hermanos Cristianos have arranged a trip for me which sounds very pleasant and worth while. It is for a few days to Guasca in the mountains northeast of here, where it seems they have a school. They say it is "lejos"—far—but from the map I can't make it more than 40 kms., less than 30 miles away. But it is in the mountains, and I will see mountains en route, and costing me nothing—being their guest—I am minded to go. One of the Brothers must go on some business and I accompany him. They speak enthusiastically of the natural surroundings of Guasca.

Fourth-day evening, by previous secretly communicated invitation of the Birtche't's (this is the correct spelling!) I was at their home at the Colegio Americano for supper. The reason for the secrecy was that that was Dr. Birtche't's birthday. I expected likely a small party, but found myself the only guest. I think the hostess planned a small party, but gave it up because of the unusually small dimensions of the two ducks obtained for the occasion. They were wild fowl, from the market here, and quite delicious.

The maternal grandfather of my hostess—if I have it right—was Governor of Pennsylvania, and on his death her mother was left in the guardianship of a Dr. Pennell, of Millfintown, Pa. She (from her mother) seems to have had quite a veneration for that doctor. I have been trying to recall the grandfather's name. Mac— somebody—I fear I'll have to ask her again.

(To be continued.)

REVELATION.

As one may climb a mountain's craggy steep,
Then on the looming summit turn and see
The wondrous miles: so we may wake from sleep
To view the wonders of eternity.

—ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH, in The Springfield Republican.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

ABRAHAM'S OAK.—(MAUDE ROBINSON, in Friends' Quarterly Examiner. Reprinted by the author's kind permission.)—There was a busy scene one brilliant Spring morning of the year 1725 in a place that was normally a deep solitude in the forest region of Northern Sussex. All around, the ground was carpeted with bright Spring flowers, anemones, primroses, goldlocks, and large dog violets. The air was full of bird notes. The song of the ox-eye tit, exhorting his hearers to "Set your beans! Set your beans!" mingled with the cry of the wren, locally called "the flaving bird," because it is always in evidence when oak trees are flaved or stripped of their bark. This task was going on now. A dozen giant oaks, all but one that were large enough to be worth felling in this particular copse, lay prone in all directions, gaunt and white, for the bark was set up in long rows to dry for the tanner. One of the trimmed trunks had been laboriously hoisted, with the primitive machinery of those days, on to a timber wagon, and drawn outside the wood by eight strong red oxen, who were now taking their noonday rest, standing like statues under their heavy wooden yokes, except for the steady working of their lower jaws, one of the advantages of an ox team being that they carry internal provision for the day and so need no nosebags.

A dozen sturdy laborers were also taking their meal, before pulling down the last tree in the wood, which its magnificent trunk nearly severed, still stood erect, its yellow green young leaves, and catkins which would never come to acorns, standing up bravely against the cloudless blue sky.

A little apart, on a fallen trunk, were seated the seller and buyer of the timber, the latter a keen-eyed middle-aged man, whose garb, though of the plainest Quaker cut, showed that he was a well-to-do tradesman from a town, as did the strong bay horse which was allowed to graze in an adjoining meadow while its owner, John Deane, shared the bread and cheese and cider of the owner of the woodland.

John Prier was a younger man, a simple Sussex yeoman, but behind the sturdy honesty of his face was the thoughtful refinement which genuine Christianity brings with it. Leaning against his knee was his only child, a boy of nine years, a little copy of his father in his leather breeches and long-tailed homespun coat, an excellent specimen of a rosy, chubby country lad.

"Go down to the stream and pick thy mother a posy, Abie, my boy—Friend Deane and I are going to talk business," said John Prier, when the meal was finished. "But I want to see the last tree fall—thou wilt call me, when they are ready, won't thou, father?" said little Abraham, eagerly. "Oh, yes, thou shalt see it fall," and away went the boy, jumping gaily down the steep slope to where the edge of a little brook was gay with marsh marigolds.

The two men went soberly to work, reckoning the value of the oak timber.

"When my old father died last year," said John Prier, "he left me the farm as the eldest son, but I have to pay the portions of the others. I want to do it as soon as possible—brother Edward needs capital for his dairy business at Dorking—a fine team of cows he has, and could do with more. Then sisters Susan and Lydia's husbands have a struggle to get a living from their small farms, so I felt it best to have a broke of the timber. Job Humphrey, the wheelwright of Crawley, bought two fine ash trees and three elms, and when thou pays for these oaks I shall only owe them a small sum each, which I hope to work off by degrees from the farm; but, as thou knows, ready money is not plentiful, and my Nancy, though her price is above rubies as a wife and mother, had no portion of this world's goods."

"If thou wilt fell those six large oaks up in the home paddock next year, I will buy them. The one near the house is a fine, straight bit of timber."

"Nay, nay, Friend Deane—those trees I cannot part with. Five of them shelter the homestead from the northeast, and as for Abraham's oak, as we call it, it is as good as a play-fellow for my lonely boy. Ever since he was a baby he has amused himself under its shadow, where his mother could keep her eye on him from her kitchen window. I have known him pick up nigh a bushel of acorns from that tree alone, when he was not more than five years old—nay, we must not cut Abie's oak—unless it was always a desire of mine to give him a good education. That would be an inheritance that no one could take from him. To send him to a good school I might even cut his oak."

John Deane was surprised. He knew that honest John Prier was no scholar himself. He could not even write his own name, although he could read well, and had the marvelous memory of those who have never trusted to note books.

"Why should Abie learn more than his worthy parents?" he asked.

"George Fox always upheld good, plain schooling for young Friends, and there is a rare good school at Brightelmstone, kept by John Grover. Friend Stapley says he is making a fine scholar of his lad Anthony, and that there is a real Friendly influence among them all. Thou sees in our Society we never know on whom the Lord may lay a gift in the ministry and a call to public service—surely our sons and daughters should be prepared for that?"

"Book learning is not needed for a Friend to preach to edification, if he has the true Seed within him. Our Lord's first disciples were simple fishermen of Galilee."

"Yes, Friend Deane, but Peter and James and John must have had some earthly learning, as well as heavenly wisdom, before they wrote those epistles which give us such blessed teaching. Many of the unlearned have been greatly used for good in our Society, but we need the scholars too. How useful Friend Ellwood has been in making the writings for all the new Meeting-houses! And dost thou not remember what our elders have told us of William Penn's wonderful power in preaching? He made good use of his book-learning; and his Guli, what an influence she had in her gentle courtesy to all! After she died, when the news came that William was to take as second wife Hannah Callowhill, of Bristol, my father was appointed by the Monthly Meeting to enquire into his clearness of other marriage engagements. I remember father saying there was little chance of William Penn looking at any of our homely Sussex maidens, after such a gentleman as Guli, and I reckon that Hannah Penn was of the same sort. I trust that Abraham will always be an honest yeoman on the old farm, but that is no reason why he should not have all the book learning I can get for him."

"Well, I hope thou wilt manage it, for he is a bright lad; and now I will go and call him, for I see my men are ready to bring down the last tree." And John Deane strode away among the hazels towards the dell where Abie had disappeared.

He was startled by a sudden crash. By some inexplicable accident the great tree swerved, rocked, and fell over at quite a different point to that arranged for, and John Deane saw the sturdy form of John Prier struck down by some of the lesser branches, and pinned face downward on the soil. With frantic haste he and his men tried to lift the branches, but in vain, and they were just beginning to saw them away when poor little Abraham rushed up, crying piteously that father was killed.

"No, my boy, I trust not," said kind John Deane. "We will soon get him out, and thee take my hat, and fill it with water at the brook, to revive him."

Away ran Abie and soon returned, carefully carrying the felt hat full of water, and by that time John Prier was lying clear of the boughs, leaning against his friend, and gasping painfully. They bathed his face and hands, and in answer to the boy's eager questions, he murmured, "Not much hurt; only dazed like." After a little time he tried to rise but sank back. "I seem to have lost my legs," he said. "At a word from their master the strong workmen laid their coats on a new hurdle and, gently lifting him, carried him through the fields to the house and laid him on the great four-post bed, with checked linen curtains, where he lay helpless for many a day, devotedly nursed by his good wife, Nancy.

(To be continued.)

PERSONAL ECONOMY AND SOCIAL REFORM.

JANE W. BARTLETT.

The range of discussion in this paper must of necessity be very narrow, but if it stimulates earnest, intelligent, sincere thought which is followed by works, it will have fulfilled its purpose.

It is not probable that there are many among us who feel that personal economy,—the getting and spending of money—is such a private matter that they resent any discussion of the subject. The Government certainly does not consider that citizens are at liberty, in time of war at least, to use their money as they wish.

Our personality and our power for service, are vitally affected by our getting and spending. "The only test of progress," it has been well said, "is in the development of character." Sacrifice for a good cause imparts strength and beauty to character. If such a cause is unpopular it loses nothing of the power of development. Whittier's advice to young men was that they early ally themselves with a just and unpopular cause. Service for others is the joy and privilege of life. Never before in history was there such a field for service as now, never such a call for the exercise of love and intelligence and the highest powers of heart and mind.

To all those who have made the "great decision" and recognize that all they have and all they possess belong to our Heavenly Father, the question of personal economy and its relation to the social order resolves itself into the problem: "How much can I spend and be spent for others and yet not cramp my highest service and my growth in Grace?" The English Friends have declared: "If we are to determine the question of what is a Christian standard of expenditure, we must think hard and work hard, singly and in groups, asking ourselves how much we dare spend upon ourselves in the face of the enormous needs of the mass of people (under) the present social order. . . . We need to realize that to live up to the Christian religion requires a greater faith on our part in incurring economic risks and sacrifices." The habit, so dear to the thrifty, of having a "margin of income" each year is here questioned. A dear Friend among us upon discovering that such a margin was left, appropriated it to making the home of the farmer comfortable and up-to-date. It was thus possible to furnish him not alone with needed bath-room, but with electric light and other modern conveniences.

The social problem ramifies every avenue of life and forms a complicated network of associations. While it cannot be solved by individual efforts, yet, as has been pointed out, each individual should do a share and at least should see that he does not further complicate the situation. But we must recognize, as Rauschenbusch puts it: "The greatest contribution any man can make to the social movement is the contribution of a regenerated personality, of a will which sets justice above policy and profit, and of an intellect emancipated from falsehood."

If our personal economy is the result of the loftiest aim, the Christian aim of serving others, our homes may be the centres at which social reform may begin. They will be little beacon lights pointing the direction in the maze of the larger group of which we are a small part. How can we bring into our own households this longed-for simplification of life and put into practice this desire "to return," as John W. Graham says, "to Quaker simplicity, to the quiet grace of an inexpensive life?"

The starting-point is not far to seek. It concerns the status of the help under our roof. The regulation of the household is considered the woman's function, but it cannot be well done without the co-operation of each member of the family and so it is a family problem. If housekeepers would take the opportunity to do all kinds of housework, sweeping, washing, cooking, they would be far better fitted to meet the difficulties which arise in the so-called domestic problem. Lady Carlyle of England has made herself famous as mistress of the household arts and as a mother pre-eminently skilful in training her children, by adopting this plan. In the course of a month, working one day each week, she has made it a point to do the housework in all its variety without any assistance except that given by her daughters.

In such an experience, the housekeeper discovers the necessity for economizing work not alone by labor-saving devices, but by having a cheerful kitchen where everything is as conveniently arranged as modern skill can devise. More than this, she will appreciate the ability required to do housework. The successful cook must have judgment, knowledge, skill, while the waitress and chamber-maid must know their work and the washer-woman must be more than merely strong. The maid-of-all-work must combine these qualities. She must have varied gifts and wide information in order to do the diversity of work required of her. Honor to each of these workers, but especially to the maid-of-all-work!

The employer of domestic help will gain, in this housework experience, insight into the causes for what she had considered unreasonable temper on the part of her help. We all know something of the perversity of inanimate things and how some days, without apparent reason, everything seems to go wrong and what patience is required to bear these vexations. This experienced housekeeper discovers how many are the interruptions and how unexpected and numerous the demands made on the household helper. She now wonders how these annoyances have been borne with so little or no appearance of anger. The housekeeper who understands the situation will be able to treat with her help wisely, will study them, and kindly, but not condescendingly, will promote their comfort and welfare. Now she can with understanding practice the golden rule.

These maids often throw light on the problem by their remarks and betray their philosophy of life. This is very helpful and valuable when such remarks are side-lights, by-products of conversation, and are not the result of posing for effect.

The housemaid is an anomaly. We have inherited the system from the time when the women of the household were the slaves and there has not been the great progress here as in most other relations of life. In the long and uncertain hours, the personal service often required, the lack of freedom of movement, the situation of the household helper is more like that of a slave than is that of any other worker in our present scheme. Here surely reconstruction is sorely needed, here in our homes it should begin.

The question is a social one and concerns the social status of the worker. Co-operation has here a field, but we are still very crude and unskilful in co-operating either with our household helpers or with other householders, as the failures in community housekeeping efforts testify. As in all efforts to improve the condition of others, Rauschenbusch's contribution has a place and goes to the root of the matter when he says by "social reform we must mean that it is a moral question," for "when the question of economic wants is solved for the individual and all his outward adjustments are as comfortable as possible, he may still be haunted by the horrible emptiness of his life and feel that existence is a meaningless riddle and delusion." "If the question of the distribution of wealth were solved for all society and all lived in average comfort and without urgent anxiety, the question would still be how many would be at peace with their own souls and have that enduring joy and contentment which alone can make the outward fair and sweet and (enable one) to rise victorious over change."

Why these domestic helpers, these contributors to the family comfort should be considered menials it is difficult to understand. Wm. Braithwaite says of genuine Quakerism it is a "Christian experience that makes all life sacred, all days holy, all nature a sanctuary, all work a sacrament and gives to every man and woman in the body fit place and service." Theoretically we agree with this statement, why in practice do we regard housework as an exception?

Cannot the employers of this kind of help rise to the demands of the situation? The problem is delicate and difficult, but it grows not less so by delay. Justice to the household worker and the necessity to conserve the most efficient life of the family call for prompt, effective consideration by the Christian householders of the land.

In the larger world the social system is based upon competition and between employer and employee the effort, generally speaking, is for each side to get the most out of the other. Why may not co-operation here, too, take the place of competition and mutual trust and helpfulness the place of suspicion and the effort to overreach the other? This is the method taught by our great Exemplar who saw in each man potential good and by love and understanding called out the best. One of the most encouraging triumphs in the business world is, that so many have made these substitutions of co-operation. Of an increasing number can it be said as it was of John S. Huyler: "his money did not come from the grudging toil of unhappy and slaving workers, but from the cheery co-operation of employes who well knew his friendship for them." This calls for great tact and patience on the part of employer especially, but it has been well said:

"Endurance is the crowning quality,
And patience the passion of great hearts."

Surely the social order needs something more fundamental than reformation; it needs reconstruction, it needs vitalizing by the regenerating principle of Christianity. Rauschenbusch calls this "Christianizing the Social Order," by which he states that he means "bringing it into harmony with the ethical convictions which we identify with Christ." The moral principles involved "find their highest expression in the teachings, the life and spirit of Jesus Christ."

The question of personal economy and its relation to the social order has an individual and a corporate bearing. The effort is made by the Religious Society of Friends to bring this home to the membership through the Queries and Advices. The present awakening to social responsibility ought to give these increased value and helpfulness. Wisdom and judgment exercised under the direction of the Head of the Church should so vitalize them that they would meet the daily need of the entire membership.

Friends to-day in all parts of the world are aroused on this subject of personal responsibility for all they possess and its relation to their brethren less favorably situated. The war has made this feeling acute and some remarkable conferences have been held. One at Oxford, Eng., had, among other objects, "to consider how best to give practical assistance to those who, desiring to follow more literally the teaching of our Lord, feel uneasiness as to their present mode of life and personal and family expenditures." "For it is not just the extravagance of the very rich, whom it is so easy to throw stones at, which is responsible for the poverty of the poor," "it is the enormous amount of wealth held by the good, sound comfortable Christians," as we Americans would put it, of moderate means. Upon serious and sincere examination how few of us can confess that we are free from this charge!

"As cherishing the spirit of love and meekness belongs to the family of Jesus Christ," Woolman contributes, "so to avoid those things which are known to work against it is an indispensable duty. Every degree of luxury of what kind soever, and every demand for money inconsistent with Divine order, hath some connection with unnecessary labor." "As many who manifest some regard to piety in degree conform to those ways of living and of collecting wealth which increase labor beyond the bounds fixed by Divine Wisdom, my desire is that they may so consider the connection of things as to take heed lest by exacting of poor men more than is consistent with universal righteousness they promote that by their conduct which in word they speak against." "They who enter deeply into these considerations and live under the weight of them will feel these things so heavy and their ill effects so extensive that the necessity of attending singly to Divine wisdom will be evident; and will thereby be directed in the right use of things in opposition to the customs of the times; and will be supported to bear patiently the reproaches attending singularly."

That eagerness to acquire wealth and the power it bestows has developed an almost universal spirit of covetousness among men and between nations is acknowledged by serious thinkers to be the primal cause of the present world cataclysm. One again cordially unites in the aspiration of our eighteenth century saint: "O that we who declare against wars and acknowledge our trust to be in God only, may walk in the light and therein examine our foundation and motives in holding great estates! May we look upon our treasures, the furniture of our house and our garments, and try whether the seeds of war have nourishment in these our possessions. Holding pleasures in the self-pleasing spirit is a strong plant, the fruit whereof ripens fast," but "those who are so redeemed from the love of the world as to possess nothing in a selfish spirit have their 'life hid with Christ in God.'"

It is stated that in England before the war about one-fourth of the nation's annual income was being spent on luxuries. We in this country are also offenders against the law of true economy and of right outlay of income. Herbert Wood says: "This extensive spending on luxuries is sometimes defended on the ground that it provides employment, but this defense is vain. The same power of spending in the hands of others would equally well keep men occupied and busy." "The individual in some cases needs to recognize that less expenditure on himself and more on others would be a gain both to others and himself. Money that is now misspent on luxuries could be devoted to objects that are of real value. It aggravates the offence of luxury, that it uses up the resources and labor-power of the nation for such futile ends. That it gives employment is no defense—it is part of the crime because the employment it gives is so useless. It mis-directs human labor, sets men working for useless objects when there is so much needs to be done."

Here again Woolman's aptness forgives quotation: "Were all superfluities and the desire of outward greatness laid aside, and the right use of things universally attended to, such a number of people might be employed in things useful that moderate labor with the blessing of Heaven would answer all good purposes, and a sufficient number would have time to attend to the proper affairs of civil society." "The greater part of the necessities of life are so far perishable that each generation hath occasion to labor for them; and when we look toward a succeeding age with a mind influenced by universal love, instead of desiring to exempt some from those cares which necessarily relate to this life, and to give them power to oppress others, we desire that they may all be the Lord's children and live in that order and humility becoming His family. Our hearts being thus opened and enlarged, will feel content with a state of things as foreign to luxury and grandeur as that which our Redeemer laid down as our pattern." "To labor for a perfect redemption from this spirit of oppression is the great business of the whole family of Christ Jesus in this world."

At another conference at which the simplification of life was considered, the causes for the present increased interest in this subject were outlined as: "1—the natural revulsion against an over-elaborate civilization; 2—the desire for economy brought on by the war; 3—the sense that so many are without the necessities of life; 4—a desire to break down barriers between classes." After discussion these thoughtful seekers decided that "Christ's words seem to them not to be interpreted as teaching that poverty, in the sense of destitution, is good, nor deprivation (what the majority of people in all classes agree to call asceticism with its deliberate refusal of many of the most natural joys of life), is that to which we are called. But we are taught that material possessions definitely tend to be a hindrance to the spiritual life, that while our minds are full of care about them we cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven and that this applies not only to those who have possessions, but to all who put their trust in them, i. e., strive after them as an end in themselves." "We have then," they conclude, "to accommodate ourselves to living in a world where this ideal has not yet been wrought out and to endeavor by our service to express love which is the only basis of true living."

Some of the valuable suggestions brought out by this conference were: co-operative spending, the trial of a change in environment and a change in housing conditions, reduction in amount and character of furniture and ornaments and the cultivation of fellowship. It was recognized that the many Friends who feel concerned on account of their manner of life "need help in making the change" and the proposition was made that a simple handbook be prepared to meet this demand.

John W. Graham suggests that children should be trained to a degree of hardihood and should early learn that their parents cannot afford everything that they desire. "By a real simplicity of life," he affirms, "we may free ourselves from many servitudes." "Luxury," he considers, "is superfluous fat and must be worked off."

The wise and oft-repeated injunction of a friend has here a place, "Do not be under the dominion of things." This is further amplified in one of the planks of a message sent to all Friends from the London Conference of 1016: "That we shall all seek for a right way of living that will free us from the bondage of material things and mere convention, that will raise no barrier against brotherly comradeship with all and will put no oppressive burden of labor upon any by reason of our superfluous demands."

Hannah C. Pyle in a helpful consideration of this subject proposes that it would be well to work toward a simplification of our scale of living, especially with regard to house-equipment and luxuries; to "introduce into our schools education toward simplification in all lines; toward moderation of standards of living and of things required to make one happy and toward elimination of waste;" "to strive to reduce the amount of time, energy and money spent on dress, food, house-equipment" and "to do some line of daily work (oneself), the kind of work usually left to servants."

Jesse Holmes in a thoughtful paper asks some penetrating questions: "Should we all confine our personal expenditures to the average value annually produced by an industrious and effective worker? Should we attempt to live on a scale of the average possibility of industrious, honest families, and especially should those living on unearned incomes so limit their expenditures and regard themselves as in the employ of the society and in duty bound to give (it) their time and energy?"

Of the three chief avenues of approach of this topic—Personal Economy and Social Reform—the sociological, the ethical and the religious, the third is most dwelt upon in this paper. It is the method of the Religious Society of Friends, but every help, every contribution toward the wise solving of this subject has its value and useful place.

John Woolman is the honored example of care in the acquisition and the expenditure of personal income and of its relation to the condition of those around him. When as a young man, he considered how he should make a livelihood he decided to learn a trade. In this connection he says: "I believed the hand of Providence pointed out this business to me and was taught to be content with it, though I felt at times a disposition that would have sought for something greater. But through the revelation of Jesus Christ I had seen the happiness of humility and there was an earnest desire in me to enter deeply into it and at times this desire arose to a degree of fervent supplication wherein my soul was so environed with heavenly light and consolation that things were made easy to me that had been otherwise" for "there was a care on my mind so to pass my time that nothing might hinder me from the most steady attention to the voice of the true Shepherd." When his business grew so that he felt that it demanded too much care and time, he became uncomfortable. After a struggle to know the mind of Truth, the Lord gave him a heart resigned to His holy Will. "Then," he adds, "I resigned my business."

John Woolman's Journal is accepted as a classic in English literature. It is a classic, too, in the treatment of personal economy and its relation to social reform. A little treatise, first printed in 1793 and now issued in pamphlet form, entitled, "A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich," contains so much that is valuable for those of moderate means as well as for the rich that it is difficult to make extracts. He thus betrays the secret of his life: "Divine love which enlarges the heart towards mankind universally is that alone which stops every corrupt stream and opens those channels of business and commerce in which nothing runs that is not pure, and so establishes our goings that when in our labors we meditate on the universal love of God and the harmony of holy angels, the serenity of our minds may never be clouded by remembering that some part of our employments tends to support customs which have their foundation in the self-seeking spirit."

Herbert Wood in his recent book, "Personal Economy and Social Reform," has also so well discussed the proper function and value of wealth that the following extended quotation seems justified: "Secretly the Christian world is tempted to endorse the criticism that Jesus undervalued riches and that He overlooked the opportunity of usefulness that it brings. Perhaps this rests upon a misunderstanding. Jesus regarded great possessions as a danger and not as a sin. If we did not usually forget the dangers altogether, the desire for riches might be legitimate in itself. In any case, under modern conditions, the man of capacity will find that great riches come his way in the discharge of the business functions which are, or should be, his main line of public service and this power for good may be thrust upon him. . . . To control modern industry and secure for the public the advantages to be derived from its more complex methods requires no mean power of direction and the men who possess such powers cannot refuse either the absorbing tasks of guiding production or the large rewards attached to a capacity which is unfortunately too rare. . . . But to recognize that our ablest men cannot, and should not, avoid wealth, to recognize that this puts in their hands a great power for good, is not tantamount to admitting that we ought to seek great riches as a source of usefulness. For the plain fact is that we exaggerate the value of wealth as a power for good and we ignore the dangers and difficulties which lie in the way of making that power more effective. It is perhaps a minor point, but a point of no small significance, that, as wealth increases, our resolution to treat our wealth as a means to our greater usefulness is not proportionate to the whole increase in wealth—we do spend more on ourselves than we should otherwise do, and we give up to conscience by assuring ourselves that we will do the good we are postponing, when our wealth has increased yet more. Undoubtedly wealth is power, but it is a power which is more readily served than mastered. It subtly perverts the judgment and makes it hard for a man to believe in spiritual realities. . . . Is not our confidence in the importance of wealth as a power for good due to some such perversion of the judgment? To possess great wealth carries with it great power over the lives of others, but it is a power much more severely limited for good than for evil. This is indeed the main consideration and we should be more alive to it if we realized the difficulties of doing good through charity or benevolent expenditure." Again, "Money is therefore an instrument which has spiritual and social uses. Through it we help or hurt others, woo them to a higher or to an unworthy scheme of life, link them to our lives in fellowship or separate ourselves from them in selfish isolation. Money is a great gift and a great trust. It is only in its misuse that it is evil. The love of money is indeed a root of every kind of evil, but the wise use of money is the root of every kind of good. To those whom it makes its tools it becomes that which degrades and spoils, but to those who master and use it it becomes the instrument of true social ends." "The stream which ends in a stagnant marsh," says Ruskin, "overwhelms the plain, poisons the wind, breeds pestilence and works famine. The same stream rightly diverted flows in soft irrigation from field to field, purifies the air, gives food to man and beast and carries their burdens for them on its bosom." Can we not count among our dear personal friends those whose large benevolence is like the stream rightly diverted?

Great wealth does not bring with it a proportionate amount of benefit. As the author of "Pro-Christo et Ecclesia" says in her recent book, "The Practice of Christianity," the fact is, "We do not find that joy and wisdom and goodness and knowledge increase with the increase of wealth after a certain standard has been reached. Up to a certain (still undetermined) point they do increase; above it they appear rather to lessen. No one who has watched a town in our Western wilds grow from the stage of cruel hardship to that of moderate comfort, and from that to the stage of opulence and luxury can for a moment question which is the stage of greatest happiness and moral welfare."

It has been said that the message and mission of Quakerism will introduce the spirit and methods of Christ into all life's relations. The early Friends were characterized by simplicity in all their acts and association. In a conference of English Friends held last year some one said, "It seems to me we need to make a point in our Quaker economy that simplicity of life must govern our ways. I would almost go so far as to say that it should be as much a condition of entry into the Society of Friends as views upon war or upon the taking of the oath that the applicant should be prepared to live an absolutely simple life." And yet who can make rules in regard to simplicity? The helpful point is that simplicity is a "state of mind." When the author of the "Simple Life" was in America he was puzzled that he could not make clear to his hearers that simplicity is not a cult, that it is not a manner of living or the result of a certain environment. He insisted that it is an active principle, that it controls the environment, forms the character, regulates the ways and habits of life. Simplicity then is not attained by the adoption of rules but by the every-day practical living of a principle. It is not an end but a means; in Edward Grubb's discriminating phrase it is a "question of values." "What one most doth value must be won." "A plain life is in itself best, yet by living plain in a selfish spirit," says Woolman, "we advance not in true religion."

If the aim of simplicity in personal economy is thereby better to serve—to have a "heart at leisure with itself to soothe and sympathize," to minister to the needs of others and to contribute to their happiness, each one must work out his own plan. Why should this be so difficult if one has the desire pure, the mind open to learn from Christ and the will strong to perform? To be specific the unpopular subject of simplicity in dress may be taken as an instance. Some claim that the manner of dress among Friends of the past generation required more time, gave more labor and involved more outlay than the present mode. In cases where this was true it resulted from the acceptance of distorted values. Simplicity in such an instance was viewed as an end, not as a means to a much higher end. Again it is urged that the simple hat or other article of clothing is more expensive than the much trimmed garment. This must be due to the better quality or superior workmanship of the simple article. Trimmings often cover defects which injure the wear of the garment and are means of deceiving, an effort to make it appear better than it is. No lengthy argument is required to prove that clothing of good quality is the cheapest in the long run, because it wears longer and keeps its beauty while it lasts. This holds good even with men's clothing. The hat, for instance, which is of excellent quality, can be "done over" a number of times, while the cheaper hat is not worth such care and effort.

It is surprising to see how quickly tradespeople understand when one says the dress or other article to be purchased must be simple, how promptly the dressmaker falls in with one's desires and gives them practical respect when one explains the limit of adornment that one is free to adopt. May we not rightly devote some time and thought and experimentation to this subject in order to have a guide or custom for oneself which is safe, satisfactory, comfortable. Thus future time and thought are saved and the superfluous labor of others eliminated.

The first Friends were the zealous, efficient social workers of their day. Their views of life fitted them peculiarly to be such. They believed that a measure of the Light of Christ was given to every man and hence they could appeal to this even in the most degraded. They taught that obedience to this Light would lead to a changed and regenerated life. This acknowledgment of a common spiritual gift made for a sense of brotherhood and in the love of their Master they labored for the good of others. They sought for sincerity, for reality in the inner life. They saw life as a whole and recognized no distinction between secular and religious. All the acts of life must be religious. This dignified life and all its relations, and made it worth while. The classic instance of sweeping a room as by God's law became practical to them. Edward Grubb in his work: "What is Quakerism?" says, "The Quaker desires for himself this inward transparency and reality but (in the early days at least) he had no thought of resting content while opposite principles prevailed in the world that called itself Christian. He felt he was out to transform it into that which God intended it to be."

Dr. Jöhrn, a German scholar, in her treatise on the Religious Society of Friends and their views of life says that their principles are capable of unlimited development and point the way to the successful working of the social problem. It is rather remarkable that it required a German student to point this out. Within our own resources is a key to this great problem and we have allowed the dust of neglect to hide it and the rust of disuse to impair it. It is a key, too, which has been tried and been found to fit the lock. Shall we not, acknowledging our deficiencies, accept the trust in the love of the Master and in the faith that He will supply the needed strength and wisdom may we not go forth as He calls?

It may rightly be urged that what this tired and weary world needs is love, the love which will give sympathy without the least suspicion of condescension, fellowship, friendship. Perhaps the last will be the most difficult to give, but, as Herbert Wood says, "The Christian has been made a member of a new race, or rather a new family, and the relationships of love, so established, imaginary as they often seem to-day, have to be made constructive in society as well as dominant in the church" and in our daily lives.

In conclusion, the thoughts expressed by English Friends may be in order, "Let us be more than ever strenuous now-a-days in our endeavor so to live and breathe in the Divine communion that amid all these balling complexities, our eye may remain single, our whole body full of light." "We must pray, think, study, wait, suffer. Day by day we must seek to re-consecrate ourselves to God that so the life of Jesus Christ may be manifested and His great reconciling work carried further and further."

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

In the year 1778, after much close exercise from a prospect of religious duty which he opened to, and was united with by, Exeter Monthly Meeting, of which he was a member, Abel Thomas proceeded on a visit to some meetings in New Jersey, and in part of the State of New York, having for his companion James Thomas, a member of the same meeting. As this was the time of the Revolutionary War, and the city of New York was then in possession of the British troops, traveling in our country was rendered extremely difficult, through the great suspicion which was continually excited in the minds of the different contending parties, under an idea that persons going from their places of residence in this season of commotion must have some sinister motives, and would, as opportunities presented, prove inimical to the cause in which they were respectively engaged. Thus in many instances even going to religious meetings, was, in the apprehensions of the persons in power, deemed as sufficient evidence of treacherous designs, concealed under the plausible, yet insincere, profession of religious duty. Accordingly, after visiting several meetings in the State of New York, returning into New Jersey, they were stopped by the military, who, finding that they were innocent men, discharged them, but soon after they were again apprehended, taken to Newark, and after some detention, sent under guard as prisoners to Princeton, where they were examined by the Governor (Livingston), and council, being supposed to be guilty of treason; before whom he made the following defence, viz.:

"The words of a prisoner who had liberty by the Governor and Council to speak in his own defence, supposed by law to be guilty of death.

"I am glad of liberty to speak in my own defence before the Governor and his council. I hope you are moderate, considerate men, and will hear me patiently while I speak forth the words of truth and soberness. We live, when at home, in Berks county, Pennsylvania; I have been looked upon as a minister of the gospel amongst the people called Quakers, from about the twenty-second year of my age; and under the exercise thereof have traveled much in America, and visited the meetings of Friends generally from Nova Scotia to Georgia, and many of them several times over. And in this great work I have ever observed the good rules of discipline used among us. When I have felt my mind drawn in love towards my brethren in any part of America, I have endeavored first to get fully satisfied in my mind whether it was the Lord's will or not; and then, after being confirmed by turning the fleece, that it was his requiring, I have always laid it before my brethren at the monthly meeting for their approbation, and in like manner so at this time, but never met with so much trouble upon the like occasion before; for after I was fully satisfied it was the Lord's requiring, by looking at the difficulties and dangers I should be exposed to in crossing the lines of contending parties, I became weak and fearful. I thought I would mention my concern to the elders in a private way, which I did, but received no encouragement from them to speak of it to the monthly meeting. I then concluded to take no more thought about it, fearing it was a delusion; but I was followed with the judgments of God for disobedience, inasmuch that the nearest connexions in life became withered in my view; and in this sad condition I came to a conclusion that I would endeavour to obey the Lord's requiring, although I might lose my natural life in the pursuit thereof.

"I spoke of it to the monthly meeting, and after solid consideration, they gave me a certificate signed by the elders and heads of the meeting, which I have in my pocket. We then proceeded on our journey, and crossed Delaware at Coryell's ferry, and visited the meetings generally until we came to the North (Hudson) river, which we crossed about four miles below Poughkeepsie, and rode through the town some miles eastward, to a meeting, and so visited the meetings generally in that government without any interruption until we came to White Plains, where we were stopped by the guard. We told the lieutenant we were going to Mamaroneck meeting; he gave us leave to go, but afterwards sent a horseman for us, who informed us we must have a few lines from the colonel before we should go. We rode back four or five miles to the colonel's, who gave us a pass to go to Mamaroneck meeting, and from thence we went to West Chester. After meeting we went to the water side to go over to Long Island; there was no boat there. We made a smoke for a signal to the ferryman on the other side to come for us, which he did; but informed us what we might depend upon, that he was under an obligation to send all strangers that he brought over to the colonel's at Flushing. When we were over, he sent a guard with us to the colonel's. We informed him our business on the island. His answer was to us, If that was our business, it was a pity to hinder us. He readily gave us a permit to travel through the island. We visited eight meetings. I think we were at a meeting every day we staid there, and when our service was over, we crossed the Sound to New York, where we had two meetings; and when we were clear of that place, we, with the assistance of our friends, got a pass from the chief commanding officer of that place, to cross the North river at Powles Hook. When we were over, I gave that pass to the colonel, who went up stairs in a private chamber. While I stood at the door there came an officer (as I thought by his dress,) and asked me if I was not afraid to go among the rebels. I told him I was innocent, and was not afraid to go among my own countrymen. The colonel sent for me to come up to him. He gave me our pass, with an endorsement on the back of it, to pass the picket guards, and offered me a newspaper, and told me I might divert myself as I rode, in reading it. I told him I had nothing to do with politics, neither did I incline to read newspapers. He told me I was at my liberty, and so we parted. We had not gone but a few rods from the door until a soldier commanded us to stop; he began to untie our great coats and search our bags.

(To be continued.)

CORDER CATCHPOOL ON THE FELLOWSHIP OF SERVICE.

'It is idle to speculate on 'what might have been,' and it is equally idle to regret what was not. Those who felt as I did about the importance of the Absolutist position had to look to God in faith that men would be raised up to make the stand. We were, indeed, bound to state our case with the utmost cogency we could command, but in such critical circumstances, we had to leave it there—not attempt to argue men into our attitude; but, having put our position, leave them to settle with God, helping rather by prayer for their Divine guidance to the right, than by human pressure into our course. The choice was too grave for us to make for them; the ordeal ahead too severe for a man to answer for any but himself. The essential of the absolute position is unswerving solidarity—waverers would only harm and hamper. To say this is not to dogmatize; on the contrary, my purpose is to point out that in matters of conscientious conviction, none of us must say that his own particular course is exclusively right. I am putting a plea for broader sympathy and truer unity. My ideal for each line of service is that which I hold, and have stated for the absolutist, viz., profound conviction followed by unflinching action. Only thus can a conscientious objector go forward in that confidence and dignity that will make ultimate victory secure.

"After many months in the crucible, the several forms of service are now crystallizing out. There are Absolutists, there is the Ambulance Unit, there is Reconstruction Work, there is the Home Office scheme, etc. We who have taken the absolutist position, as we fit one by one from prison to prison, catch a whisper that faith has not been vain, that we have our small part in advancing the cause for which we all stand; and we go again cheered and strengthened into the silence. It could hardly be otherwise; but the faith which makes me sure of that, makes me sure that it is true for all who know what they have believed—who have heard a call, and are responding to it with their whole soul. It is not this course or that course of action which is vindicating the cause of Peace; it is honest, whole-hearted service in whatever sphere our duty lies. Such service can only spring from sincere conviction; and conviction is capable of logical and dignified expression. Much has been written: our individual statements would, if collected, form a quaint pot-pourri. But we have all been long enough now at our special work to have a clear idea of our aims, however confused may have been our thinking at the outset. I should like to see an unequivocal, united, constructive utterance from the workers in each field. Such a voice, interpreted by steady, eager service, cannot fail to exert an influence.

"The Friends' Service Committee have recently issued a pamphlet, 'The Absolutist's Objection to Conscription,' which I believe every Absolutist will welcome, as an admirable exposition of his views. The dangers faced by Ambulance men at the front, and their work of healing; the striking positive contribution of those who are rebuilding battered villages in the devastated areas,—each will make its appeal to the public imagination. The Home Office men have, perhaps, the hardest task of all before them, and need the greatest measure of help and sympathy. They have been singled out for slander and obloquy; from the nature of their origin, large elements of disunity are manifest in their ranks. Within and without, they have special difficulties to overcome. Yet I am confident that they too will triumph. By an indomitable will to serve, they are living down opposition, winning honor and respect, and making their own contribution to the common cause. Uniformity is death: individuality, personality, life, postulate divergence. I rejoice at these various spheres of labor. I love to think that in my prison cell I am working alongside the man who is driving his ambulance out to the shelled poste-de-secour; alongside the man who is building barraques on the desolate Somme, or caring for Polish refugees on the Samara plains; alongside the man at Dartmoor who is gracing the lowliest acts by honest industry and integrity of purpose. Let us each be established in the conviction that he has been led by God to choose a reasonable service, and then go ahead with unflinching faith. The victory will then be ours not in the centre or left wing, or right, but all along the line. There will be no room for jealousy. In diversity we shall achieve co-operation, and realize a fellowship that will cement the various elements into a firm foundation for future building in the great fabric of a reconstructed world."—From The Friend (London).

GENERAL MEETING IN AUSTRALIA.

(Concluded from page 352.)

The Committee appointed under Minute 66 of this Meeting, to prepare the special Minute having reference to the state of the Society, now presented this. With slight alteration, it was accepted by the Meeting. It is as follows:—

The reports from our Monthly Meetings, and the figures set before us in the Tabular Statements, of this year, backed by the urgent appeal of one of our Meetings that we should give serious consideration to our condition, have awakened in us much stirring of heart and deep concern for the future of our Society and its testimony in these lands. There is an actual decline of 10 in our membership, but that is a small matter in comparison with the fact that of those who go to make up the total of our nominal strength a very large number are, as regards any outward sign at least, members only in name.

It is not that there are no signs of life among us. We have cause for thankfulness that so much work is possible to the comparatively few in all our Meetings who take actual part in it; but how much more would be accomplished were every member in earnest to realize his potentiality. We have all failed and come short, and have need to confess our failure, and get back to the source of all true life and power. We feel that the occasion requires from us a specially forceful appeal to every one of our members, and we desire Monthly Meetings to see that this is made during the coming year, and that report of actual results achieved be made to our next General Meeting, as far as these can be ascertained. God has countless avenues of work for those who seek to serve Him, and while it is neither desirable nor practicable that all should be working on the same lines, it is obligatory on all that there should not be indifference toward all effort.

Within reach of our Meetings are members who rarely attend with us in worship, and whose help in the activities of our religious Society is seldom given. To all such, primarily, loving appeal should be made, asking them to consider how far they are following, or how far they have been forgetting, what is absolutely needful to justify them in claiming to be followers of Christ and members of a religious body or Church, and reminding all that Meeting attendance, whilst not in itself an end, is a means in the Divine ordering for bringing accessions of power into the life, and creating true workmen for the building of that "City of God" on earth which it should be the chief aim of the Church of Christ to realize; impossible to the individual, much can be compassed by united effort.

With this in view, as well as the quickening of our membership generally, we recommend united local consideration of the vital questions contained in the report appended.

Minute 31.—It is our judgment that a protest should go forth from this Meeting against the "White Australia" policy on the lines of the reports referred to in the previous Minute. It is hoped that the Committee above appointed (see Minute 30), with the assistance of other Friends, will be able to prepare such pronouncement and refer to the standing Committee, who after consideration, shall issue it when and in whatever manner they may deem best.

Minute 32.—It is our judgment that a statement of Friends' position with regard to war, on the lines of a draft submitted by South Australia Two Months' Meeting, should be issued from this General Meeting, to be printed in pamphlet form for the purpose of presentation to enquirers. It is referred to the following Committee for final revision and submission to a later sitting, viz.—Wm. Benson, Chas. E. Howie, Saml. Clemen, and Edwin Ashby.

(This was submitted later and passed. It is already in print.)

WAR AND THE SOCIAL ORDER.

Under Minute 73 of London Y. M., the message from the Conference appointed to deal with this question was brought before the General Meeting. The Yearly Meeting "decided to send the statement to Quarterly Meetings, asking them to report upon it, and especially the seven propositions contained therein, with a view to their coming before us again next year."

William Benson would like to know what the prospect of work among the aborigines of Australia is, so as to have the whole question before us.

Edwin Ashby said that, as regards the objective before us at last G. M. (the sending of our own missionary to the aborigines of the MacPherson Ranges), nothing could, as yet, be done, as the man on whom our eyes had been fixed for the work was still engaged in connection with the war. There is, however, a possibility that the Council of Churches of S. A. would shortly be undertaking work among these people in which we could take our share. Here about 2000 aborigines range over wide areas. The East-West Railway has brought white people within reach of this district. The Churches have united in asking that 76,000 square miles might be set apart as a reserve for these aborigines, and that without a permit no whites should be permitted within the boundaries of this reserve. As these ranges overlap into the Northern Territory and Western Australia, the Federal Government will have to be approached.

Frederick Coleman called the attention of the Meeting to certain proposed action of the S. A. Government, which might not only interest Friends, but have a possible bearing upon their future connection with the aborigines. The Lutheran Church has a mission station at Koonibba, where it has acquired 12,000 acres of land, between 4000 and 5000 acres of which have been cultivated. There are at this station 183 natives, 140 being full-blooded aborigines; the births exceed the deaths; the children receive an ordinary education, the girls being taught sewing and household work; 17,000 have been subscribed by the Lutheran Church for improvements, and only two imported missionaries have been employed here during the past ten years. It is now suggested that this mission station be taken over by the Government, apparently on the sole ground that it is of German connection. A Commission appointed by the Government to enquire into the work of the Koonibba Mission Station reported most favorably, directly and incidentally, upon its work. In view of this, and that no black mark, so far as is known, exists against the station, the taking of it over by the Government would seem to be a particularly harsh measure.

In this matter the Meeting adopted the following minute:—
17a. Referring to the matter brought before us by Fredk. Coleman, we feel that the action of the S. A. Government, in its decision to take over forcibly the E. Lutheran Mission at Koonibba, and its property, is a manifest injustice, not only to the Lutheran Mission itself, but to the aborigines who are its special care, more particularly from the spiritual side of the Mission's operations, and we appeal to the Government to reconsider their decision generally, but mainly in the direction of retaining to the Lutheran Mission the spiritual side of its work.

(A reply received from the Premier of South Australia informs us that care will be taken that no injustice shall be done in this case.)

THE CLOSING MINUTE.

Minute 51.—We bring this, our 16th General Meeting, to a close with the earnest prayer that in the goodness of our Heavenly Father, Whose loving-kindness has been graciously manifested among us, the thoughts exchanged and the work done may not be in vain. May the earnestness which has prevailed among us here be carried by us into our distant homes, and may the fellowship realized in these gatherings also be an incentive to us to bring others into the fellowship also, for truly "our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ." We pray that His Spirit may be increasingly manifested in our lives, in the lives of all our members, and in the work of our Society throughout the coming year.

It may be well to append an extract from the Queensland report referred to above. It reads as follows:—

"We have no report to give of increased attendance or life in our several Meetings. Friends are apparently content with the time-honored phrase, 'Our Meetings have been regularly held.' We think the time has come to enquire into the reasons for the stagnant condition of our Society, and to devise means whereby more thoughtful people may be attracted to our Meetings. We feel that we are using up our energies in a decaying body, and it does not seem right to encourage young people to throw in their lot with a lifeless and dwindling Church. If we have a message for the people amongst whom we live, we ought to be able to gather more around us than we have done in the past. Either our ideals for the establishment of the Kingdom are hopelessly out of date, or our methods for expressing these ideals are utterly unsuited to Australian conditions.

"We shall do well to consider—

- "1. Just exactly what are our ideals?
- "2. What are our methods (if any) for expressing these ideals?
- "3. Where do these methods fail, or where have they never succeeded?
- "4. If they have succeeded, why is there no growth in our membership?"

AUCKLAND NOTES.

The most prominent interest in connection with Auckland Meeting at the present time centres in the fact that fully a dozen of our young men members are now either in prison or awaiting sentence, or expecting arrest as conscientious objectors.

The usual attendance of our Meetings for Worship varies between 25 and 50, so it is evident we have a large proportion of our members in strong sympathy with Peace principles, and prepared to suffer for conscience' sake on that account. We know also that a considerable number of men in membership with other religious bodies are holding similar convictions and undergoing similar punishment.

We are quite unable to measure the real social and political value of the present struggle of conscience against military domination, because freedom of speech on military questions does not now exist, and we shall have to wait until the close of the war restores society to something like normal conditions.

Fellowship of Reconciliation Meetings and other work of Auckland's Meeting continue as usual. Contributions amounting to £400 have now been forwarded to F. W. V. R., and Ambulance Unit Funds. Although no New Zealand representatives have yet been appointed to Friends' General Peace Conference, to be held in England after the close of the war, it is hoped we may participate in that gathering.

LETTER FROM A N. Z. C. O.

DETENTION HUT 21, Trentham Military Camp,
Ninth Month 14, 1917.

We have had quite a procession of Auckland men through our hut. There are about 45 C. O.'s in the Wellington Barracks, all doing 28 days, the last to go down being F. Blanchard, and all of them were very cheerful, and quite pleased to be started on the punishment for having a conscience; the suspense being decidedly the hardest part, to my mind.

Our number in here is now nine, a decided fall in quantity, as all the old stagers are now away to jail for eleven months, there being twenty-five now there and four more, including myself, are awaiting sentence. The Mt. Cook civil jail, which is the hard labor prison, where they make bricks, and is within a stone's throw of the Barracks, is now full, and some of our C. O.'s have to be kept in the Terrace Jail, where the ordinary short sentence prisoners are, and I believe this is about full, too. The civil prisoners (C. O.'s) report good treatment; they are allowed two hours' reading after tea each night, so that it is not so bad. Friends have been very good about sending books. I have a great pile on my shelf, which is being read by both C. O.'s and our guards, the latter being reduced to three men and a corporal, as against six before. We have some fine talks occasionally with the guards, some of whom are violently antagonistic to our beliefs, or rather what they think them to be, but after their twenty-four hours' on guard we part with a very different understanding.

We continue our usual routine, except that we have to go to the cook-house and bring our own rations, as the C. O.'s who used to look after us and did mess orderly work out in the camp, were ordered to join up with the medical corps, and on refusing got 28 days. In all, there have been nine such men (C. O.'s) who have been dealt with in this manner, and some ten others doing fatigue expect to be transferred at any time. I myself was court-martialed, and was given a patient and fairly exhaustive hearing, there being four officers on the bench and a prosecuting counsel, and I might have had a camp lawyer if I liked.

Of course, there is no chance of being acquitted from a C. M., but I was glad that I could get a fair testimony in for their own benefit and for the cause.

PERCY WRIGHT.

IMMORTAL THINGS.

Lay hold, my soul, upon Immortal things!
Fame is a mirage—glory but a lure;—
Riches, the Wise King tells us borrow wings
And lo! the Seats of Power are all unsure!

Let conquerors sound their trumpets earth around
And sway its fortunes for a fleeting day;—
Silence is vaster than the strongest sound
And every king is conquered by decay!

Earth's glory is like moonlight: does not warm;
But cheats the eye with its delusive gleam;—
Is dotted out by the approaching storm,
And seems not more substantial than a dream.

Sculptors may carve, and architects may plan
The august outlines of pretentious piles;
But Time o'erthrows the works of puny man
And tranquil Nature on the ruins smiles!

But in the star-paved palace of that One
Whose name a thrill to all creation brings,
Is permanence outlasting stars or sun:—
Lay hold, my soul, upon Immortal things!

—ARTHUR GODDENOUGH, in The Springfield Republican.

"HE who abandons the personal search for Truth, under whatever pretext, abandons the Truth."

Selected by John C. Maule.

A TOUCHING TESTIMONY.

An occasional contributor sends the following lively letter, written to a Methodist Annual Conference, by George W. Izer, a prominent minister of that denomination, now lying at the point of death. Our correspondent states that he was told by a member of the Conference that when the letter was read there was not a dry eye in the large gathering, and that the invalid's sick-room, although he was suffering intensely with cancer of the liver, seemed like a little heaven.

"To my beloved bishop and brethren of my conference, Greeting: Grace, mercy and peace from God our Father and Jesus Christ our Lord:

"Last August, fifth day, dated the beginning of a series of fierce physical ordeals, supreme tests of faith, patience and hope. Bodily suffering verging the limit of mortal endurance has been a well-nigh constant experience; few painless moments in wakeful hours.

"This crucial experience has furnished evidences of the highest order and cumulated proofs of incomputable value. I thank God for them. They are riches to the soul; they are treasures more priceless than silver or gold or precious stones—rubies and emeralds and diamonds. Pearls are not to be compared with them.

"Sustained and strengthened by grace divine, superior to suffering, I have been enabled to joy and rejoice, to trust and triumph in God.

"How long I may linger in earthly life, a prisoner of pain, no one can forecast; neither my physicians nor my surgeon will give a guess.

"My earthly house shaken, tottering; the tabernacle falling into ruins, it seems to me must soon dissolve. Certainly it has come to be a poor tenement in which to live. I hope to move out at an early date, exchanging for it my 'building of God, a house not made by hands,' a mansion promised and prepared, 'eternal in the heavens.' A fine exchange.

"I do not expect to move far. The paradise into which God's loved ones go I wish is nigh. 'Absent from the body, present with the Lord.' From this stranger land, in which a while we sojourn to the home land in which we shall have permanent abode, forever with our Lord, cannot be greatly distant. There, in God's presence, at God's right hand, amid innumerable company of angels; in association with the spirits of just men made perfect; numbered in the general assembly and church of the first born, written in heaven, we shall dwell in safety and in satisfaction throughout eternity.

"Out of this passing, perishing, present life I am hastening to this permanent abode. Into this presence and at the right hand of God I am pressing with eager desire. Life, in this presence, enriched by fullness of joy; life at this right hand beatified with pleasure for evermore, will be life eternal.

"What the vestibule in its narrowness and barrenness is to the temple, with its amplitudes of space and beauty of furnishings; what the first faint streak of the morning, when the dim dawn just edges the incoming day, is to the noon sun in zenith splendor; what the far-away twinkler caught in the intensely magnifying telescope is to great Jupiter dazzling the unaided eye; what the remotest and least significant satellite, in all the sweep of sky, is to the glowing sun in its system of planets, such is the passing, perishing, earthly life that now is—down amid the murk of time and sense, to the permanent promised life beyond—the life that lives forever, unbroken, unmarred, unmoved, untouched by any ill.

"To this blessed, beatific life, in God's pavilion, and in God's presence, we who love him are being borne, according to His good and gracious purpose.

"There, in the fairest of fair mornings, we shall meet and mingle, separation and sorrow, sickness and suffering, sighs and shadows no part of that life, ineffable and unchangeable.

"Not as a profession of a Christian experience, but as a confession of a personal Christ; not as an expression of any lofty attainment of sainthood, but as a humble acknowledgment of undeserved blessing, I bear testimony to the glory of God, that in every hour of my protracted period of pain,—three and thirty consecutive weeks—in His pity and in His love, He has redeemed me; 'the angel of His presence' has gone before me, saved me, given me rest, made me to rejoice,

"In the furnace and in the floods, I have been preserved and upheld. God has been with me, underneath me have been His everlasting arms. I have rested."

HOW FRIENDS DIFFER FROM OTHER RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

MATTIE C. PURVIS.

The following is part of an article read at the "Young Peoples' Meeting," held at Olney School-house, during the late North Carolina Yearly Meeting of Conservative Friends, 1917.

Let us first consider the source of the title, that of Friends. In an illustration given by our Saviour to His disciples, showing the union between Christ and His Church, He emphatically says: "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you. Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." The last clause may be termed the key to a meditative worship: "For all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." There was such a revelation when Christ said to His disciples: "But whom say ye that I am? Simon Peter answered and said, thou art the Christ, the son of the living God. Jesus answered and said unto him: Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in Heaven; and I say unto thee, that thou art Peter; and upon this rock will I build my church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Thus it is this revealing power, this light Divine, that makes known to the humble-hearted man, woman or child, the fact that they are sinners; and the same power anoints the minister of the Gospel to preach in the power and demonstration of the Spirit; and the immediate revelation of the same to the authorized instrument is, or should be, the only recognized ministry of Friends.

On the other hand, if one should be hired and put in the field for labor we should expect service of him regardless of circumstances. Drawing a salary, he would have to furnish his employers with what they were paying for. Thus the hired preacher has to preach whether he is rightly authorized or not,—but this is not the Quaker way.

Coupled with this revealed power, as the only source of true Gospel ministry, we find also our theory of baptism and the communion. We do not believe that the putting away of the filth of the flesh was the baptism recommended by our Saviour, for He Himself baptized not—but His disciples; and these had long been under power of ritualistic influence of the Jews; in fact, all of them who did administer water baptism were either Jews or Jewish proselytes.

If we claim the apostle Paul as our apostle, that is, the apostle to the gentile world, then why not conform to the doctrines so forcibly recommended by him? He thanked God that he had baptized so few; that was not his mission; he was not sent to baptize, but to preach the Gospel. All through his epistles he tried to turn the minds of the people away from the outward; painting beautiful pictures of the inward power of life; and in writing to the Colossians he includes the whole thing in a nut-shell, when he says, "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ, from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances? (Touch not; taste not; handle not; which all are to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men; which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honor to the satisfying of the flesh." He closes this caution by saying: "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." Being thus individually exercised, we experience by that same revealing power and knowledge afore spoken of, a continual baptism into Christ,—immersed into the ocean fulness of God's love, communing with Him in spirit. "Behold I stand at the door and knock, if any man hear My voice and will open the door, I will come in unto him and sup with him and he with Me," which is an inward and spiritual partaking of the body and blood which was shed for us. That alone can feed and nourish the soul.

With regard to the so-called minor testimonies, Friends are supposed to differ from the worldly in deportment and attire; in the use of the plain simple language,—that is, in addressing one person with a singular pronoun, which is not only grammatical but the recognized language of the Bible. "Let your communication be yea, yea; nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these, cometh of evil." The use of the term "you" to an individual I think was first introduced by those in authority, who felt themselves to be of more than ordinary importance, and wished to be recognized as of more importance than a single person; hence the pronoun "you" instead of "thee" or "thou". The names of the days of the week and months of the year, as commonly used, were honorary to the gods of idolatrous worshippers. Whereas we read in the Scriptures: "For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve Him with one consent." "And in all things that I have said unto you, be circumspect; and make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth."

Friends have always maintained a testimony against war and oaths. We recommend the setting up of the peaceable kingdom in the individual heart, which makes every man at peace with his neighbor and with the world; a condition which would soon bring about the establishment of an international peace; then nation would not lift up sword against nation, neither would they learn war any more. One of our Saviour's last testimonies, a few hours prior to His crucifixion, was in favor of peace. When Peter cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest, Jesus rebuked him and said: "Put up thy sword into its place, for they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." And with regard to "oaths," one sentence in the Scripture, just four small words, will cover any amount of argument in favor of them: namely—"Swear not at all," which is to say, swear not under any conditions; language as forceful as "Thou shalt not kill." These two sentences on the aforesaid subjects should furnish the negative with sufficient to meet any opponents.

Friends do not agree with those who call the Bible the "Word of God." If so we would have to read the first chapter of John thus: In the beginning was the Bible, and the Bible was with God; and the Bible was God, and the same was in the beginning with God,—instead of: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," etc.; and again—"The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." We believe the Word is that speaking Voice,* which manifests itself to the heart and conscience of every individual, wooing and warning of the evils and dangers in life, and showing that the Scriptures were given by Divine inspiration to men of old as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, "and are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Friends are supposed to differ in many ways from the worldly and from other religious denominations, but if they only adhered to the command of the apostle Paul, when he said, "Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God;" whether Friends, or whatever else we might be, we would stand on the sure foundation.

*[We believe also that He suffered and died for our sins.]

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

(Continued from page 354.)

ELEVENTH MONTH 25, 1917.

I have to report a busy but uneventful week. Stanley Davies and I were breakfast orderlies for the first three week days. He is an Englishman who lives in our dugout. He very kindly took the alarm clock and got up at 5.30, waking me at six, when he made the fire, then between us we cooked porridge, made toast out of the war bread which sweetens it tremendously, made tea and coffee, made a fire in the dining-room and set the table, rang the rising bell—a most tremendous affair which stands nearly a foot-and-one-half high and was lugged back from the old English trenches by one of the boys a long time ago—say a month. After breakfast we fetched the milk from the Mairie and water for cooking, fortunately we have enough rain water to wash in and don't have to fetch that. Second and Third-days MacDowell and I worked all day in our orchard cutting up apple trees, that the Germans had chopped down, for firewood. That was pretty tiring work, especially for MacDowell, who has only recently got out of the hospital. Then on Fourth-day I started a hole in the garden for our garbage. I got it about 60x4 feet deep with help from Bay Murray for an hour or two in the afternoon. Fifth-day it was too wet to dig or do out-door work, and as our cook didn't show up I cooked lunch and dinner. Lunch was a huge success—soup of all the scraps and bones in the house, a big lentil pie—first pie crust I ever made—and a bread and fig pudding baked in the oven. But dinner—I followed directions, but the hot pot, which was the pièce de résistance, was raw at 6.30, our dinner hour now being 5.30, and I had to fill the hungry hordes up with cold corned-beef ("bully beef" in tins) and one baked potato apiece, but I gave them a good ginger pudding made of oatmeal flour and arrow-root sauce, flavored with lemon. Sixth-day I finished repairing that shot-to-pieces slate roof that I have written about and started glazing another house. Seventh-day I finished the two windows in the living-room, which are all we have to glaze at present, and loafed most of the afternoon. Geoffrey Franklin from the Paris office suddenly appeared and I had a nice chat with him, and three or four Englishmen from Ham came over to visit. They foregathered in my room before dinner and I had a fine time listening to them. They were in high spirits and chaffed and laughed so as to cheer us all up tremendously. Franklin had a test American sentence to puzzle them with—"Dolled up in his slicker and gums he went out into the truck-patch"—which was Greek to all but me. To-day I was "Sunday orderly," but as we have breakfast at 8.30 it was comparatively easy, although I had no one to help. I got up at 6.30, had a sponge off, for we have had very mild weather for almost a month, but to-day has been brisk and, we have had sunshine and calm, rain and wind and snow, moonlight and rain again. Then I made the fire and coaxed it up, put the toast in the oven, boiled the porridge and made tea and coffee and had breakfast promptly. After breakfast I went for the milk and water and started dinner—our cook had roasted the meat yesterday—so I had only cabbage and potatoes to cook and dessert, which was custard (unsweetened). It went very well, although there was not enough of it. The custard was made of custard powder and milk, for we are lucky enough to get five litres of milk a day by combining the two largest farms in the village. For afternoon tea, as we are out of jam, I had been stewing up prunes all day and I had only to boil eggs, make tea and coffee and set the table with sardines, etc. Then after tea I set off through the moonlight for our evening supply of milk. Then we sat down to half an hour meeting and after that I have sat down to writing again.

I was sent out to look for some slotted iron, which the Germans used for all sorts of purposes to hold things together. It is about two inches wide with slots about 1 1/2 inches long and 1/2 inch wide down the middle and came in long strips, which they cut off to the length desired. Well, first I looted an old house they had used for a forge and gathered my knap-

sack full of the cut-off ends, then I went out to their old ammunition dump to see if I could find any pieces there used to hold the underground workings together and armed with a crowbar to wrench off what I found. When I got there I found I had forgotten my candle, and as the different chambers are all about 25 to 30 feet underground, I turned to come back again after a candle, but cast one despairing glimpse around above ground to see what there might be in the way of loot. The first thing that struck my eye was their narrow gauge railway which had been torn up and stacked by German labor (prisoners, of course) sometime back, and in a neatly arranged pile was a quantity of fishplates, just the thing to substitute for what our head architect wants. He is going to use them to hold demountable huts together. So to-morrow, when the truck comes over, we shall back it up there and load up as many as he needs. We have a general permission from the military authorities to help ourselves to such odds and ends as we can use. Then I got a very undesirable job slating a hole in a roof and spent the morning cutting boards to fit it and the afternoon in putting them and some slate on, not very well, I fear, as I didn't have the proper equipment in ladders and broke a lot of other slate before I got half through. When I found what I was doing it was four o'clock and I quit in order to go hunt a ladder for the roof to-morrow.

We had a sudden change in the weather last night and found ice on our water barrels, which are stationed around the house where the gutters leak to catch rain water, and the sponge off in an unheated bath-room with ice water was very exhilarating, and even led me to shave later on, before breakfast, however. Naturally the sun is very late getting up now and early to bed and we find it impossible to work on cloudy days after 4.30, so our dinner is at 5.30 instead of six. Breakfast is still at seven and we must be up before the sun to be on time. We had a most magnificent morning, clear and cool, with bright sunshine, but this afternoon it clouded over and is still very threatening, although that does not mean necessarily a storm. The normal condition of the weather here is threatening, and though it generally manages to rain a little every day, it is hardly enough to interfere with our work. We get through a decent amount, I think, in spite of our inexperience, and perhaps we may be able to finish up the most urgent jobs before the winter really sets in; our most serious difficulty, of course, is lack of materials. We have to depend, for instance, on the second-hand slates from some tumbled down building, for patching and gathering them doubles or more than doubles the time spent on a job. Almost every job of any kind requires a lot of time in hunting for the necessary material among destroyed buildings and a lot of trouble getting it out and putting it in shape for use. All the new lumber which the Germans left behind them was built into dugouts, bomb-proofs or beds and extra long nails used—twice as many as necessary—and all clinched. We haven't yet undertaken to remove lumber from bomb-proofs or dugouts, it is too much of a job, and the lumber is so thick and heavy that we can't use it anyhow. We want $\frac{3}{4}$ and 1-inch stuff, and most of this is heavy planking, two and three inches thick.

I wish I could write more interesting letters, but being in the Army Zone I can't mention anything of military interest, not soldiers or battles or political news or even news of refugees, for fear of being suspected of conveying intelligence of military importance.

(To be continued.)

J. H. H.

THE MUSIC OF OUR LIVES.—“Not without design does God write the music of our lives. Be it ours to learn the time and not be discouraged by the ‘rests.’ These are not to be slurred over, not to be omitted, not to destroy the melody, or to change the keynote. If we look up, God will beat the time for us. With the eye on Him we shall strike the next note full and clear. If we sadly say to ourselves, ‘There is no music in a rest,’ let us not forget there is the making of music in it. The making of music is often a slow, painful process in this life. How patiently God teaches us! How long He waits for us to learn the lesson!”—JOHN RUSKIN.

FROM LETTERS OF MARY DUGUID.

ELEVENTH MONTH 17, 1917.

We have electricity and also a little fire-place in the living-room. We do have a fire sometimes but of course it is expensive and one cannot be pampered. We have a splendid stove in the middle of the great dining-room, which makes it and the balcony very comfortable and indeed keeps the whole house tempered and very dry. I do give daily thanks for it. Our kitchen is very nice, too. I wish you could see it for it is most picturesque. One more closet for food will make it quite complete.

Our boys are very nice and have the same ideas of democracy which we all had in our self-government days at West-town. One almost holds one's breath when a large institution seems to be going smoothly, for there are so many ways to disturb it.

Just now we have about twenty men, as we are still waiting for machinery and wood. The men are getting the machines that are here set up and are starting on furniture, six little cribs for the hospital at Samoens. We are looking up the springs and mattresses. We think they can be made at Besançon best. I do not know how we would get along without all of these friends in the village that hand us from one to another and always are so kind. You would smile if you heard us talking the worst French possible, but understanding and getting on some way. Of course we are getting to talk better and understand, too. I did not say that we have just gotten permission to buy two tons of anthracite coal a month. I think that it will just about do for the kitchen and a little for the hospital. Madame has used it before and she will tend to it. I wish you could know her. She has the same quality of sense as Bertie and is such a nice person. Things seldom disturb her and she is a tower of strength and an excellent cook. I want to learn how she cooks carrots, they are simply delicious. She is a good worker. She has one son who has just come home to recuperate after being gassed. He is quite well again.

We have just been on our first vacation since we came. Our friend of the Sermaize embroidery department, came down for her vacation, and so we went with her up to ——. We started, she and I, just before lunch up the lovely valley in the sparkling, clear sunshine. We walked about seven kilometres and then sat down by the river with our backs against a great log to eat lunch. It was lovely. The sunset behind the opposite mountain before we finished at one o'clock. Then we quietly went on up. William catching us up just before we reached M., the end of another seven kilometres. We rested and then walked on up the wonderful rock-bound gorge with the silver river below. We did not have quite time to go to the source, which is a great rush of water out of the cliff. We had a very comfortable night at a simple hotel. This morning we climbed the mountain, about 2500 feet high, and had a splendid view out over the Jura Mountains. It was just hazy enough to keep us from seeing Mt. Blanc, which is possible some days. We then took a carriage and drove home, having walked all we could well manage in the two days. It was lovely country and beautiful weather. We want to go again in the Spring, when the hundreds of cherry trees are in bloom. They make a special kind of wine which, by the way, we nearly had thrust upon us last evening by the young Frenchman who spent the evening with us around the one stove in the dining-room. It was a very pleasant change, and I expect rest, too, for we always have something to see to here.

This week we see to buying more chickens, as we have an excellent place to keep them, lots of scraps, and can get the scrapings from a feed mill near. Eggs are ninety cents a dozen, so we only have them about once a week. We are able to get most things and so it is a great temptation to buy them. I suppose this is one of the most fertile valleys and far enough away not to send things to Paris or Lyons. Milk is our greatest difficulty; we only get eight litres for all our men.

We all enjoy our work, and if we were free to go should be quite happy in many ways. I should so like you to step in and see us. Our small apartment is one guest-room with two single beds, one single tiny hall bed-room, our sitting-room, bed-room and the hospital. So you see we could give you either the guest-room or if one is sick the hospital.

ELEVENTH MONTH 29, 1917.

Here we are and in many ways much nearer the war than you and in many ways I believe we are in a more normal state than you are. Here and in all of France, we all take the things that come our way. If they are pleasant we give thanks and fully enjoy them, if very sad, that, too, people bear with the grace given them, and it is extraordinary how people endure and still have a good degree of happiness. You are so dreadfully serious that I fear you worry too much. It is very easy for you to think of all the misery in one lump, and it seems too awful. Here one sees the misery spread out on so many shoulders it does not seem quite so terrible, though some days when the news comes of another man gone or bombs drop, you do feel it.

Food is plenty here. France is a land of beautiful gardens, and so we really have all the things to eat we need.

Here we are going along in quite a good degree of peace. It is the end of the month and so we have been busy on accounts. I am very pleased that our food expenses have been much lower this month, and at the same time we have had plenty and excellent food. We are blessed with seldom having poor food come on the table.

On looking out I see there is quite a flurry of snow. It keeps damp and quite cold and the worst is that the village is in a valley and so the sun does not get us very long each day. That, however, will soon begin to change, and I suppose by the time we get back to England it will be much better. I am delighted to go to England for that month; it will make the winter seem very much shorter.

England has decided to let all her medical men who can finish in three years go home. So — is getting off as quickly as possible to get back into his studies.

So far the sugar has been sufficient for us. This month there is no sugar to be sold in the town, so Baxter is sending us some five hundred grammes a week per person. All the French families have little stores and so have we, so that is what we will do.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

OUR INTERNATIONAL ARMY.

LEWIS GANNETT.

It is a little international army all their own which the Friends have in Europe, and it is fighting on a dozen fronts. It has just sent a corps to Italy. Leah Cadbury was the American representative in the Quaker group that has gone to Italy to help care for the hundreds of thousands of refugees who fled before the Austro-German army as it swept across Venetia.

Few American Friends realize the extent of the Friends' work in Europe. It centres in France; but there is a group of forty (six of them American) doing relief work in the Province of Samara, away off in southern Russia. And there are a dozen English Friends working with the Serbian refugees, some of them at Monastir, some on the island of Corfu, which is nominally Greek, some in Corsica, where there is a large colony of Serbian refugees, and some in Tunis in Africa. Others are at work in camps for Serbian boys in England. There are thirty-five Friends in the Belgian refugee camps in Holland; there is the army of over three hundred in France—and now Italy!

To one type of mind there is a certain satisfaction in being a martyr; to almost any type of mind it is gratifying to be appreciated. The requests for help, and the flattering terms in which they have been couched, which have recently come to Friends in France, have indicated something more than continental courtesy. They have meant that Frenchmen and Belgians and Englishmen and Americans appreciate the service of the Friends.

Sugar is scarce in France to-day, and so is wheat; but scarcer than either is labor. The American Red Cross in its work for the civilian population of France has again turned to the Friends for assistance. One group has just fitted up an old chateau near Paris as a tuberculosis hospital; another group has helped rearrange a former barracks as a children's home; and others are needed in other capacities.

The imperative need for labor—for trustworthy men of intelligence, who aren't afraid to turn in at any kind of hard or dirty work is the reason why the Red Cross has just cabled to America for three hundred more young Friends or friendly workers. They cannot all be absorbed at once into the Friends' organization already existing, but they can be put at the kind of work the Friends are doing, and they can co-operate with the units already in the field.

The grey Friends' uniform and the Friends' star are very familiar sights about Red Cross headquarters in Paris. One Friend has practically managed the establishment of a Red Cross factory for the manufacture of an improved kind of artificial legs—and he devised several of the improvements himself. That is Robert Metcalfe. Another, Walter Wildman, is loaned to a bureau which is planning a farm school where war cripples can be taught to operate farm machinery, or to tend rabbits and chickens. Two others, former newspaper reporters, have been temporarily absorbed into the Red Cross Editorial and Historical Service.

It is too soon to tell of Christmas as this is written, though it will be long after Christmas when it is read. But plans are under way. The candy for five thousand children in the Marne, sent by American friends, is eagerly awaited; Christmas trees have been spotted near all the equips; and toys and good things to eat are stored in hidden places in anticipation of the big day.

Newest of the Friends' équipes, and the only all-American one, is Dr. Babbitt's surgical hospital at Sermaize. The "Hospital du Chateau" received its first patient the middle of last month. Patients had been waiting at the other Friends' hospitals in the Marne region for the opening of the chateau. There are thirty beds in the hospital now; it has room for fifty. The operating-room, isolated from the wards, is on the second floor; the whole building is well lighted, with running hot and cold water—conveniences which picturesque old French chateaus do not always have. There is a small laboratory, with sterilizing and bacteriological equipment. The hospital will treat civilian cases from all over the Marne and Meuse regions, co-operating with the English Friends' hospitals at Bettancourt, Sermaize and Chalons.

There are rumors and hints of other new équipes—for the need is immense, and there are constant appeals for help. But they can't be told of yet!

WINTER LIFE IN A FRENCH VILLAGE.

CARLETON MAC DOWELL.

We are coming to feel very much at home in Grunzy. We know the names that go with faces, we know the children, and where they live, and who their relatives are and their histories behind them. One man picks up one family's history, and another man another's, so we gradually become very intimate with the whole village. At Christmas there is to be a party the like of which Grunzy has never seen. Santa Claus arrived some time ago in the form of a very fat check from a friend of the equipé at home, and now all transmuted, it stands in the form of several great bundles of sweaters and mittens and toys and all sorts of good things, waiting for the day when the school-house is dressed itself up for their distribution.

Just this week has the school moved into its proper quarters—the children have been using the rooms that formerly formed the mairie. Russell and I moved the stove over.

That was a party in itself. The stove was easy enough to move—and fitting the pipe, though not a speedy process, was not particularly difficult. By dusk we thought all was ready, but as a special precaution we made a little fire.

Smoke! Every joint belched and shot out great black clouds! The teacher, who had been back and forth as we worked—shrugged her shoulders. "C'est la guerre!" she said, and went home. There seemed just a chance that a sooty chimney was the trouble, so we turned chimney-sweeps—we removed quantities of soot, then replaced the pipe, this time mainly by feeling, so dark was it; and, as night finally settled down, we had the joy of making a second fire and smelling no smoke at all. That was another of the little things that make our work happy.

It was glorious those cold days last week, when the mud vanished, and for three days you could run without danger of taking a header in the slippery ooze—even at noon the ground did not thaw out.

The mornings were fairylands of pastel sunrises and white frost—frost so deep we had to sweep it off the roof where we worked. Zintz and Jenkins, who were just finishing their roof, made snowballs with it. On the north side of the roof, where Russell and I were working, the frost lasted two whole days. Imagine sitting up there shingling! But the air was so clear and our blood tingled so we just kept singing lustily all day long, in spite of dripping noses and icy feet.

Madame brought us coffee in the afternoon and continued her quite uncensored lessons in French by repeating almost everything we said—naturally in better French! You could see whether you had used the right endings or not. I was doing a bit of first-aid work yesterday on a girl who had put her hand through a window—and Madame would turn around and repeat everything I said to the others, and if Mademoiselle or anyone else made a remark, Madame would repeat it for my benefit. It was a valuable French lesson.

LETTERS FROM CAMP MEADE.

[The following letter, which we give almost in full, was received by William B. Harvey at the Friends' Peace Rooms, just as our last issue was ready for press. We made place for the account of the audience with General —, given in full on page 356 of last number, but were not able to print the letter which accompanied it.—Eds.]

CAMP MEADE, MD.

WILLIAM B. HARVEY:—

Dear Friend—Pursuant to thy request of Twelfth Month 24th, I talked with Lieutenant — relative to the proposed course in reading and study. He said that there would be no objection at all from the officers. The second lieutenant is a Williams College man, who has been quite sociable and open-minded. We have, at his request, loaned him a few booklets and articles which would help him to understand our position.

The enclosed is copy of an account of an audience with General —, which we had yesterday. The other copy is in the hands of the A. F. S. C. His attitude toward the Socialists and I. W. W. and "without-the-pale" C. O.'s may bode them no good.

The General's declaration was that they will be no longer regarded as C. O.'s. At any rate, developments will probably be slow owing to the quarantine for measles which we are now under. It seems to work only to the exclusion of visitors, as yet. Hoffman, Baily, Thorp, Hagaman, Mason and I were among those who expressed a willingness to help at the Y. W. C. A. Hostess House. But we volunteered for the work—our names are not among those taken. The Hostess House, we feel, is meant for the comfort and convenience of camp visitors. It is not quite so hand-in-glove with the army training scheme as the Y. M. C. A. appears to be. If we find that the soldiers are eating at Hostess House instead of at their mess halls; if we find it is too prominent and important a part of camp life, we may cease doing the work. . . . If such work were included in a definition of "non-combatant service" and we were ordered to continue under army orders we certainly would not. We feel that we are volunteering to assist a civilian organization whose building here is for the good of civilian visitors. Perhaps our view will change when, if at all, we get at work for them. We do not want our position as C. O.'s to be compromised—if it seems to be we still, I feel, have the privilege of withdrawing our offer to assist.

We hear of such absurd rumors floating about the city concerning us that we are almost minded to suggest a "Lies Nailer" column in THE FRIEND, similar to that in the Bulletin! For example, we are all on bread and water, or Henry Stabler is in "the guard-house at Washington," or there are serious quarrels and dissensions between us Friends. No basis exists for these accounts. We deplore the latter especially, and would that they would do what thee can to discount it. We do not all see exactly alike, of course, but there have been no acrimonious discussions, no hurling of epithets, no branding of each other as orthodox or heterodox, and absolutely no bad feeling aroused between Friends; nor, so far as I have observed, has there been such between church groups. Everyone is here upholding principles too similar to allow of serious quibbling over minor questions.

With assurance of our deep appreciation of the interest and sympathy of Friends and our desire to respect the ancient testimony of the Society,

Sincerely,

HAROLD M. LANE.

TWELFTH MONTH 30, 1917.

KASUMIGAURA.

(LAKE OF THE SPRING MISTS.)

HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

THE SCENE.—It was near the end of a dull autumn day. The clouds were breaking in the west for a glorious red sunset with its promise of a bright to-morrow. The train had left Ishioka and was soon running beside Kasumigaura on its way to Tsuchiura. I sat, oblivious to the tobacco smoke and chatter, looking upon the scene. The season, the time of day and the overhanging clouds had painted the picture in browns and grays, leaving any dashes of color to an occasional bright kimona, the coming sunset or next year's Spring. Most of the rice, already harvested, was strung along bamboo poles, and here and there was a woman pulling off the heads by drawing the sheaves through a kind of comb. Here was a group of men, women and children cutting the rice. Over there near the lake was a small village with its thatched houses. The shores stretched away on both sides in long, dark lines. The sodden waters of the lake, dotted by scores of tiny, dirty sails, homeward bound, were lost in the hazy distance. It was the soft kind of landscape that Corot would like to have painted—beautiful, yet sad.

THE NEED.—Lost in thought I was carried across and around the lake. I saw the towns and villages dotting the shores. I saw them swarming with people—simple fisher folk or tillers of the soil, but too fond of tobacco and drink. The dirty-faced children ran after me in crowds crying, "Foreigner." They burst into empty laughter when I spoke to them, but real joy was not known in their lives of drudgery. Very few knew anything about the "Good News" that was brought so many years ago. I found one Christian worker in one of the lake towns and a few villages that were occasionally visited by preachers from Ishioka or Tsuchiura. I found the Friends had just started work in the county between the Pacific Ocean and the Lake. But what could one worker, with his little wife, do for these thousands of people? His home and regular work were way up further north. I saw the souls of the people, foggy like the waters of their lake, living in sin, not knowing that there was a better way—the Way of Salvation.

THE VISION.—And as I looked, behold a beautiful white launch put out into the lake, stirring the dull waters into a sparkling foam. It was called the Nikkori Maru or the "Glad Ship," and as it touched the shore here and there it changed the darkness into light, the sadness into gladness. It took "good tidings of great joy" to the souls that were weary and sorrowful. What did it care for the lake mists with its true compass! And as for the cloudy souls, this brave little ship had the message that would bring them sunshine. Gradually the Nikkori Maru became well known around the lake and its coming was welcomed by many who had found real heart-joy. The knowledge spread from the shores to the hundreds of inland towns. No matter how the fogs darkened the days and the daily toil disheartened the people, there was always joy in the lives of the Christians of Kasumigaura.

"My servants shall rejoice."

THE NIGHT.—"Excuse me." I woke with a start. An old lady with a large bundle wished to share my seat. The car was becoming crowded as we neared Tokio. We were far from the "Lake of the Spring Mists" and the sun had disappeared even to the last lingering glow. The lights were not lit in our car. The people had quieted down except for a few whispers or an occasional cough. The train rattled, the whistle of the engine tooted at crossings. It was night.

"THIS DAY IS A DAY OF GOOD TIDINGS." (I Kings vii: 9)—The poor, warring world goes sinning on. Men have not heard the "good tidings," or hearing have not understood. Why do we hold our peace? Let us each one make "this day"—to-day—one of deeper consecration to His service that we may do our part in dispelling the spiritual darkness and mists in the world and brighten our own corner no matter how small it be.

"I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people—Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men."

This is my message to you at this time, and may the season's blessings be with each one to whom this may come.

"A THEOLOGY FOR THE SOCIAL GOSPEL."

HENRY J. CADBURY.

Those who have read Professor Rauschenbusch's two earlier books on the Social Gospel, and especially those who heard his lectures at the Haverford Summer School in 1914, will know what to expect of his latest volume, "A Theology for the Social Gospel."^{*} There is the same clear analysis from the social viewpoint of modern life, the same telling use of pregnant phrase, the same striking illustration from Biblical and secular history, and the same prophetic denunciation and challenge. Words are not wasted, but ideas are packed close together. As its title implies, the book is a new theology, or rather the old theological terms fitted to new conceptions of religion. For many persons, especially Friends, theological terms have little active interest and this indifference may lessen our appreciation of this effort to apply them to a social Gospel. But at least the boldness and the novelty of the undertaking—for it has never even been tried before—will hold the reader's interest. We are curious to see what connection there is between the social message of Christianity and such familiar ideas as the Fall of Man, the Atonement, the Sacraments, and Eschatology; and the chapters on these subjects do not disappoint us.

The keynote of the book is "solidarity." It shows that religion is not and never can be a merely personal matter. "No man liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself." "No man sinneth to himself and no man is saved alone. Sin is super-personal, collective, social. The Kingdom of God is not merely a society of saved persons but a saved society. The church has the possibility of fulfilling the splendid idea of actual service, fellowship and growth. Even God must be socially understood. Men have always used of Him the terms of social relationship like king and father, and they will continue to do so in our own democratic age.

The two chief social problems that are used for the interpretation of Christianity are the industrial problems and war. On both Rauschenbusch is a good Friend. He recognizes in the love of money and the love of power over men which property connotes "the exponent of gigantic evil on the upper ranges of sin. This is the most difficult field of practical redemption and the most necessitous chance of evangelism."

The book is written under the constant thought of the Great War. "The Great War has dwarfed and submerged all other issues, including our social problems. But in fact the war is the most acute and tremendous social problem of all. All whose Christianity has not been ditched by the catastrophe are demanding a Christianizing of international relations. The demand for disarmament and permanent peace, for the rights of the small nations against the imperialistic and colonizing powers, for freedom of the seas and of trade routes, for orderly settlement of grievances—these are demands for social righteousness and fraternity on the largest scale. Before the war the social Gospel dealt with social classes; to-day it is being translated into international terms. The ultimate cause of the war was the same lust for easy and unearned gain which has created the internal social evils under which every nation has suffered. The social problem and the war problem are fundamentally one problem, and the social Gospel faces both. After the war the social Gospel will 'come back' with pent-up energy and clearer knowledge."

But militarism is not a new thing. It is one of the sins that caused the crucifixion of Jesus. And Jesus Himself knew how to meet it, and in meeting it He revealed the very nature of God.

God's attitude is combined of opposition and love. God has always borne the brunt of human sin while loving us.

He has borne our sins with a resistance which never yields and yet is always patient. Within human limits Jesus acted as God acts. The non-resistance of Jesus, so far from being a strange or erratic part of His teaching, is an essential part of His conception of life and of His God-consciousness. When we explain it away or belittle it, we prove that our spirit and His do not coalesce."

LET US THINK RIGHTLY.

G. R. ROGERS.

[As an argument ad hominem, we submit the following from an Iowa subscriber, who writes: "I trust it may touch some heart to see war as I see it now, and not as I viewed it before adopting Friends' (Christians') ways."—Eds.]

The glory of war, if it has a glory, is frequently described as bleeding and dying for one's country. This picture really is not true.

A martyr does die for a cause, and the fact of his death, without any forceful resistance on his part, has a reflex action which, sooner or later, brings conviction to his destroyers. But it is not so in war. It is killing that results in victory; not in being killed. Thus in our present trouble, it is the Allies' foes that are dying for the Allies' cause, not the Allies themselves. Think of our Civil War. It was not the number of Union men who were killed and wounded that won that cause, but the number killed and wounded by the Union men that won it.

Thus in war one can really only live for the cause, for to die or be wounded means just that much victory for the enemy. One really does not lay his life on his country's altar, as we so frequently hear, but offers to lay as many of his opponents' lives as he can upon the altar of sacrifice for his country's cause.

May we think rightly on these things, and realize what war really is. Let us use every possible effort to prevent the recurrence of wars, great or small. Let us teach the Master's love, which could not raise a hand to injure, but only to heal the wound of his captor.

"Be obedient and bear your daily cross; you need it, and it is bestowed by the pure mercy of God."

*"A Theology for the Social Gospel," by Walter Rauschenbusch, New York. The Macmillan Co., 1917, pp. 279—$1.50.

THE PRAYER.

[NOTE—Our friend Samuel E. Hilles, of Cincinnati, O., has suggested that we reprint the following touching poem. It is from The Outlook. S. E. H. has their kind permission and that of the authoress, Anucha J. Barr, to reproduce it.—Eos.]

You say there's only evil in this war—
That bullets drive out Christ? If you had been
In Furnes with me that night . . . what would you say,
I wonder?

It was rain past all words,
Horror where joyous comfort used to be,
And not clean quiet death, for all day long
The great shells tore the little that remained
Like vultures on a body that still breathes.
They stopped as it grew dark. I looked about
The ghastly wickedness that once had been
The village street, and saw no other life
Except a Belgian soldier, shadowy
Among the shadows, and a little group
Of children creeping from a cellar school
And hurrying home. One older than the rest—
So little older!—mothered them along
Till all at once a stray belated shell
Whined suddenly out of the gloom, and burst
Near by. The babies wailed and clung together,
Helpless with fear. In vain the little mother Encouraged them—"But no! you mustn't cry,
That isn't brave, that isn't French!" At last
She led her frightened brood across the way
To where there stood a roadside Calvary
Bearing its sad, indomitable Christ—
Strange how the shells will spare just that! I saw
So many. . . . There they knelt, poor innocents, Hands folded and eyes closed. I stole across
And stood behind them. "We must say our prayer—
Our Father which art in heaven," she began,
And all the little sobbing voices piped,
"Hallowed be Thy Name." From down the road
The Belgian soldier had come near. I felt Him standing there beside me in the dusk.
"Thy kingdom come—"

"Thy will be done on earth
As it is in heaven." The irony of it
Cut me like steel. I barely kept an oath
Behind my teeth. If one could name this earth
In the same breath with heaven—what is hell?
Only a little child could pray like this.
"Give us this day our daily bread—" A pause.
"There was no answer. She repeated it
Urgently. Still the hush. She opened wide
Reproachful eyes at them. Their eyes were open
Also, and staring at the shadowy shapes
Of ruin all around them. Now that prayer
Had grown too hard even for little children.
"I know—I know—but we must say the prayer,"
She faltered. "Give us this day our daily bread,
And—and forgive—" she stopped.

"Our trespasses
As we forgive them who have trespassed against us."
The children turned amazed, to see who spoke
The words they could not. I too turned to him.
The soldier there beside me—and I looked Into King Albert's face . . . I have no words
To tell you what I saw . . . only I thought
That while a man's breast held a heart like that,
Christ was not—even here—so far away.

"God gives for the asking, but the blessing must be desired and sought; and every promise has its precept."

"God can teach thee more by one flash of His light, than thou canst learn in a lifetime without it."

NEWS ITEMS.

JAMAICA FRIENDS' ARMY OF PRODUCTION AND ECONOMY.

"We Serve Our Empire."

SEASIDE, Hector's River, P. O., Eleventh Month 19, 1917.

American Friends will no doubt be glad to know that Friends in Jamaica are engaged in work similar to that of the American Service Committee. Our work has been done by the method of Farm Units in America.

When the Conscription Bill was before the Legislature of Jamaica Friends sent in their protest and asked to be exempted in case universal service should become a law. This consideration has been promised to Friends to a certain extent. We in turn felt a concern to undertake specific work of a constructive nature and for this purpose our army was organized.

The army has followed two lines of service: (1) the cultivation of crops to be sent to Local Government Authorities to be used for relief work; (2) canning of fruits to be used for similar purpose.

Although the recent hurricane has had an unfavorable effect upon the work of the army we are still in possession of many acres well cultivated with sweet potatoes, which will soon be ready to be harvested. All labor on the farm has been done freely or with money contributed voluntarily.

The canning committee had just started to do extensive canning when the storm came and compelled them to cease temporarily from their work. The committee has, however, put up in cans three hundred pounds of guava jelly, fruits and sugar having been contributed freely. The jelly has been sent to our proper Government Authorities, with directions that it be sent directly to the headquarters of the English Friends' Relief Committee in France. The authorities have promised to carry out this direction for us and we trust in this way some of the Friends of our American Unit may yet have the privilege of enjoying the lovely flavored jelly which is the product of our native guava.

The committee looks forward to a harvest of several tons of sweet potatoes in the new year.

Thus, though removed from the centres of great Quaker activity, we are humbly endeavoring to maintain the high principles upheld by our faith for nearly three hundred years.

OFFICE OF EXEMPTION COMMITTEE.

Representative Meeting, 301 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

ATTENTION, FRIENDS OF DRAFT AGE!

Copied from Selective Service Regulations (form 999) concerning registrants opposed to military duty on religious grounds:

RULE XIV (pages 40 and 41)—Any registrant who is found by a Local Board to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization organized and existing May 18, 1917, and whose then existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, shall be furnished by such Local Board with a certificate (Form 1008) to that effect and to the further effect that, by the terms of section 3 of the Selective Service Law, he can only be required to serve in a capacity declared by the President to be non-combatant. He shall be classified, however, as is any other registrant; but he shall be designated upon all classifications, forms, records, certificates and other writings of Local and District Boards in which his name appears by the insertion of a cipher (0) after his name.

SECTION 102 (Extract, page 53)—Immediately upon classifying a registrant, the Local Board shall record the most deferred classification by placing a cross mark (x) in columns 8, 9, 10, 11 or 12, as the case may be, of the Classification List opposite the name of the registrant. If the registrant is found to be available for non-combatant service only, as provided in Rule XIV, the symbol zero (0) shall be entered instead of the cross mark (x).

SECTION 106 (Extract, page 55)—Immediately upon classification or reclassification of any registrant, the District Board shall enter in the proper column or columns of the Docket, by cross mark (x) or cipher (0), as the case may be, the classification as determined by the District Board.

It is important for Friends claiming exemption on religious grounds to secure Form 1008 (replacing No. 174), signed by a member of his Local Board. Copy has been sent to thee from this office.

For rules concerning exemption on account of agriculture consult S. S. R. Rules XVIII, XXI and XXI (pages 44 and 45).

In filing appeal from classification made by Local Board, registrant, or some one for him, should enter it in proper place on page 16 of said registrant's questionnaire.

If I can be of service to any of our young men in above matters, please call or address me at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. My regular days in the city are Second, Fourth and Sixth-days.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM B. HARVEY, Secretary.

FIRST MONTH 7, 1918.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL NEWS.—Woolman School opened the winter term First Month 7th with sixteen students enrolled and one other expected. Two are day students. Every room in the house is filled, including the guest room.

In place of Dr. Forbush, who was unable to give the course on "The Adolescent Age in the First-day School," we have secured the services of W. Edward Raffety, editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

Pressure work incident to war conditions prevented J. Russell Smith from giving the course on "Rural Problems." The course is to be given by Bruno Lasker, of The Survey, New York, and by other men and women who are authorities in special lines of rural work.

It is especially gratifying that five of last term's students returned this term.

A special conference of Friends is planned for the week-end of Second Month 22-24, 1918.

CHURCH AND CONSCIENCE.—Nineteen Diocesan bishops, eight suffragans, seven deans, some two hundred clergy, and a number of influential laymen have signed a memorial to the Government protesting against the present treatment of conscientious objectors, many of whom, it is stated, "from sincere conviction feel bound to refuse military service." The signatories include the bishops at Lincoln, Bath and Wells, Bristol, Chelmsford, Chichester, Ely, Exeter, Gloucester, Lichfield, Liverpool, Llandaff, Peterborough, Ripon, Southwark, Truro, Southwell, Wakefield, Salisbury and Winchester. Among the clergy are the Vicar of St. Sepulchre's, the Holborn, the Master of the Temple, C. C. B. Bardsley, Canon Horsley, Bernard Heywood, Vicar of Leeds, W. C. Hookley, Rector of Liverpool, S. G. Pouson, Vicar of Devonport, Canon Rawnsley, Wm. Temple, H. W. Webb Peepole, Probstendy of St. Paul's.

REGULATION 27c.—A resolution protesting against the latest powers which it is proposed to confer upon the censor was adopted by the Edinburgh Presbytery of the United Free Church yesterday afternoon. The resolution called for the rescinding of Regulation 27c as being an infringement of liberty of speech and a hindrance to the attainment of that enduring settlement of the war which was desired by all.

Dr. McGregor declared that the episode of the "Nation" was a condemnation of the censor. It was not safe to leave these things to the War Cabinet, which just represented one type of opinion. There would be a famine of our minds if we were forced to live on the unnutritious pabulum of the Times, the Daily Mail and the Morning Post.

The Moderator-designate of the General Assembly, Dr. Drummond, seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

The Home Secretary has agreed to receive tomorrow a deputation of Liberal and Labor members on the subject of the new Regulation referred to in pamphlets.—The two items above were forwarded by Wm. C. Allen; they were taken from the London Daily News of Twelfth Month 4th and 5th, 1917.

Co. 16, Bat. 4, 153rd Depot Brigade, Camp Dix, N. J.,
First Month 9, 1918.

DEAR "FRIEND":—

Camp Dix C. O.'s have been changed around quite extensively since the Christmas holidays. For the most part the changes have been agreeable, though the ruling now in force that takes away our pass privilege comes hardly in that class. We are so thankful for our considerate treatment, however, that we do not mourn our loss. Most of us were favored with Christmas or New Year's passes, granting four-and-a-half days' leave. Nicholson alone was denied his pass, the grounds being lack of uniform. Several of us ununiformed men did get passes, however.

Eight of our number have been transferred to the base hospital for duty. They felt that kind of work not contrary to their convictions.

Two Socialists, one three months and the other one month in the Guard House, were released. I was transferred from the Headquarters Detachment, where I spent four peaceful weeks, into the 16th Co. and now my two Socialist Friends and I are the sole occupants of one of the squad-rooms.

Across the way, Nicholson, Morse and De Hart, the latter fresh from a month in the Guard House, occupy a squad-room in the 15th Co.

We six "absolutists" have recently been assigned to the Camp Library for duty. Visiting Friends will likely find the library located next to the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, the most probable place to locate us. This library is run under civilian auspices—The American Library Association—so, by avoiding the Military Manuals, we find nothing in the work that conflicts. Preparing the books for the shelves is at present our principal duty, occupying the day after the necessary janitorial duties have been performed. Regular employment is certainly an improvement over our past endured idleness.

C. O.'s in Camp Dix extend New Year's greetings to our comrades in other camps and to our many interested Friends.

Sincerely,

WENDELL F. OLIVER.

CHARLES EVANS, writing in explanation of the cable announcing the death of Dr. Arthur Compton, gives the following details:

We now give you the following additional information. Ten men, including Arthur Compton, have been at work for nearly three weeks at the Hachette property at Sceaux-Robinson, situated a short distance outside Paris. As explained in our reports, this property has been acquired by Am. Cross for tubercular patients, and our men have been busily engaged in painting, papering, washing windows, etc., preparing the house for the service intended.

The whole group, under the care of Haldane Robinson, has been a happy party, has done excellent work, and has been highly spoken of by Red Cross men who will later manage the hospital. Last Fifth-day the men with the help of a large Red Cross truck were moving furniture to the Château, and at about 3 o'clock, after filling up the truck, started off with five men sitting on the tailboard, which was in a horizontal position. The truck was not moving rapidly, only a "few kilometres" (stated to be under 10) per hour, when the chain supporting the gate broke, and the men sitting on it were thrown to the stone-paved street. Arthur Compton was killed instantly. It is believed that his death was caused by fracture of the skull.

He died in service and will be laid in French soil, together with many brave comrades—English, French and American. The funeral is planned for Third-day next, at 3 p. m. All members of the Unit in Paris will, we believe, attend, and the offices at 53 Rue de Rivoli will be closed.

We have been greatly saddened by the loss of our cheerful, willing fellow-worker. Arthur Compton had made many friends among the group with which he crossed the ocean and among us whom he found out here.

If there is any satisfaction, it is in this, that the accident was, I believe, quite unavoidable and in no way the outcome of "skylarking" or carelessness on the part of anyone in the party. He was doing his duty and was called at his post.

Very sincerely,

CHARLES EVANS.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

Every succeeding week brings widened opportunities and increased obligations to American Friends.

NEW WORK IN ITALY.—The invasion of Italy has created the same problems that Friends have been meeting in other countries. Our field force in France heard the call of the thousands of Italian refugees, driven back into the interior, and a small body of workers (both English and American) have already gone to put at the disposal of this new field their experience in war relief work. Leah Cadbury is one of the American workers. When the devastated regions are evacuated it may be that we can add to this work of relief a work of reconstruction similar to that carried on in France.

FAMINE IN RUSSIA.—The following cable has just been received from one of our American workers in Russia:

"Serious famine started, one hundred thousand people in our districts require sum equal thirty thousand pounds sterling purchase bread Siberia, and transport here, have eabled London duplicate, expect peasants will repay part on distribution bread, can American Red Cross co-operate, can we draw on American credit in Siberia, Cable urgent reply.—ANNA HAINES."

English Friends have cabled us that they have sent $25,000 and are making a special appeal for this need. They ask us to do the same. We may not be able to send $25,000, but we hope to send something.

Our chief obligation, as it has developed, is in France, and we cannot curtail our work there for the sake of other fields. We must, however, put in the hands of the workers we have sent to Russia sufficient sums to enable them to do the work we have undertaken. If the people are starving, it is obvious that we must either meet this need or give up the work.

From persons who have just returned from Russia, we learn that the Friends' work is much more widely known than the small number of our workers would indicate. It is one of the few things tending to promote a spirit of understanding and co-operation on the part of the Russia towards the other Entente nations. The people of England and the United States have a wonderful opportunity to correct the suspicion and prejudice that has prevailed in Russia. For Friends to aid in this task is a great privilege.

We have taken up the matter with the Red Cross and hope to take it up with the State Department. We strongly hope that this need will also bring a large additional sum from Friends into our own treasury. We cannot consistently ask others to assist us in the Province where our work is located unless we do all that we can ourselves.

Since last Seventh Month our monthly expenditures have exceeded our monthly receipts, and no new obligations such as this Russian appeal can be met without largely increased support.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND:—

I am much in sympathy with the editorials in the current issue of THE FRIEND concerning a "freer expression," particularly on the part of our younger Friends. It is an admitted fact that under normal conditions in our regular meetings for worship and discipline there is a lack of initiative, or perhaps a painful hesitancy, on the part of most of our younger members to enter into vocal expression or the giving of testimony that is causing a direct loss to our Society. To conclude that these people as a whole cannot give expression to their ideas is not true, for when Yearly Meetings are held or some special occasion seems to offer an opportunity, the voice of the younger members is often heard in an encouraging and edifying manner, effectually dispelling all doubts of the real ability but emphasizing as it were this lack of expression at other times.

It seems to me the real solution of the difficulty lies, not in worrying about the gift, but in making a larger opportunity for the free expression of the gift.

I think we are too prone to seek from without our membership, or without our immediate meetings themselves, for persons of well-known ability to speak to us, instead of trying to build up within us that desire for service and expression that is lying dormant or unfruitful. I am of the feeling that this desire can be directly traceable to two undesirable things: First, selfishness, the desire on our part to hear others without actually giving any service or help ourselves; and second, a curiosity on our part and a natural desire to extend homage to those who are or have been successful in a chosen line of endeavor.

No one can meet with the attenders of our several city meetings particularly, without realizing that the potential power for service along greatly diversified lines is represented, but the unfortunate fact remains that under our present methods no effort is given towards an opportunity of getting all the membership to participate in the life of the meeting in its larger service.

In the service of the Master we may all be "little ones" in our individual thoughts and expressions, but these "little ones" were "the children," who were still learning the elements of knowledge, and who would be and by grow into "disciples." For, as the Mishnah has it: "Where there are no little ones, there are no disciples; and where no disciples, no sages; where no sages, there are no elders; where no elders, there are no prophets; and where no prophets, there does God not cause His Shekinah to rest." (From Ederstein, Vol. I, page 652.)

Respectfully thy Friend,

W. G. HEACOCK.

TRANSLATION OF CHINESE LETTER.

JOSEPH ELKINTON, Society of Friends, Philadelphia, U. S. A.:—

Dear Friend—In our Monthly Meeting at this time we have read thy letter sent to us from America, and have from it realized help and encouragement, and have also understood thy thoughtfulness for us, and that thou dost continue to remember us.

We in the Eastern and you in the Western Hemispheres are united by One Spirit, and we by this Spirit are enabled, although separated by thousands of miles, as it were, to meet one another. For this privilege we cannot but give thanks to God's love in Jesus Christ our Lord. His command to us was "love one another." As thou does so dearly love us we cannot but write a letter in reply to thee.

We remember last year, when thou wast present with us at our Monthly Meeting in the upper room of our Meeting-house, we heard thy prayer for us; with great power it came to us and made us think of the meeting of Jesus' disciples in the upper room in Jerusalem, where they were of one mind and one purpose, and how from that hour came the blessing of Pentecost, where three thousand repented and turned to the Lord.

This year many new experiences have come to us, as if the Lord would fulfil for us those things for which thou didst pray when here. For example, this year several Bible Classes have been started, and many have come to study the Scriptures and turn to the Lord.

But alas! this world war of past years is so contrary to the principles and peace teaching of our Lord. We constantly pray that He may quickly cease this slaughter of men and bloodshed to cease, that His prayer which He taught us may be fulfilled,—"Thy Kingdom come." What is His kingdom? Is it not a Kingdom of Peace, for He is the Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace. (Isa. ix. 6.)

We have a heart of hope, and will not the Lord one day accomplish this for us?

As for us in China, we also have had our battles and strife. We in Chengtu have specially experienced horrors. Between the eighteenth of Fourth Month this year and the seventh of Seventh Month we passed through two sieges, both in Chengtu. In the city alone, where the fighting took place, 19,000 and more families were burnt out of house and home. The injury to property amounted to over ten million dollars Mex. All our members, with the exception of a few, escaped injury. Chungking Monthly Meeting and members of our own Meeting and the scholars in our Schools contributed several hundred dollars to relieve the distress. The Chungking Friends' Institute collected over $10,000 for relief of distress due to the military disturbance. This is what we have seen with our own eyes, and now pass on for thy information, and we hope thou wilt report it to thy friends in Philadelphia.

We believe that although we cannot meet each of you face to face, that by the one Spirit we can realize the joy of mutual fellowship. We desire that the presence of our Lord Jesus be with you.

With respectful salutations to thee and thy friends.

From Chengtu Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends in the Republic of China.

Signed R. J. DAVIDSON, Presiding Clerk.
M. S. CHANG, Clerk.

NOTICES.

THE Thomas Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College announces a course of Lectures on Conditions after the War.

Friends' Select School, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, has offered its Lecture Room for the purpose.

The following are arranged:—

First Month 18, 1918—Dr. John Dewey (Professor of Philosophy in Columbia University)—"Education After the War."

First Month 25, 1918—Dr. John Haynes Holmes (of the Church of the Messiah, New York)—"The Message of the Church After the War."

Other Lectures may follow. Admission is free and all are invited. Lectures begin at 8 o'clock.

MEETINGS from First Month 20th to 26th:—

Miney Monthly Meeting, at Miney, Fourth-day, First Month 23rd, at 10.30 A. M.

Frankford, Fourth-day, First Month 23rd, at 7.45 P. M.

Germanatown, Fourth-day, First Month 23rd, at 8 P. M.

Philadelphia, Fourth and Arch Streets, Fifth-day, First Month 24th, at 10.30 A. M.

Haverford, Fifth-day, First Month 24th, at 7.30 P. M.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The 'Teen Age in the First-day School.'" A course given by W. Edward Raffety, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of "The Survey," New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

WISSAHICKON INN REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

W. B. WEAVER UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE 1 ESTABLISHED 1880

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUÉ and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

Hajoca Pedestal Lavatory

Simple and beautiful in design. Its plain, smooth surfaces are easy to keep clean. Equipped with the Hajoca Waste, which prevents backing up of residue from previous ablutions.

Come see our model bathrooms. Our showrooms are within easy reach of City Hall. Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES
& CADBURY CO.
1130-1144 Ridge
Ave.

(at 12th and Spring Garden Streets)

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected
FRANK C. BEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building
Established 1896. Experience 29 years; Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States
Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50
1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.40

By freight or express, i. o. b., Colara.
Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

ALFRED C. HAINES Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO
well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolleys. Address "THE FRIEND."

SMALL HOUSE WANTED IN SUBURB OF PHILAdelphia (Rural preferred); near school and Friends'
Meeting; with good train or trolley service.
HAROLD TRACY,
Care of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—ANY FRIENDS' BOOKS OR WRITings, or any reading matter pertaining to the Society of Friends, which any Friends can spare or send to help make a collection. All highly appreciated and cartage paid. Send to BERNIE C. ALLEN,
Boykins, Va.

FOR RENT—NEXT SUMMER, AT A MODERATE
price, our home in Westley, R. I.; 34 rooms, all modern conveniences; situated on the bank of a tide-water river, 20 minutes to the ocean by trolley or automobile.
HARVEY C. PERRY,
Westley, R. I.

THE NATIONAL CITY COMPANY is a bond distributing organization with correspondent offices in twenty-three investment centres.

It buys and sells Bonds, Short Term Notes and Acceptances.

It is animated by the splendid traditions of The National City Bank of New York, whose Bond Department it took over in 1916.

A selected list of securities adapted to the needs of all classes of investors will be sent upon request.

Ask for Circular PF-50

The National City Company

National City Bank Building, New York
1421 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia

Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey,
Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. PHILA.

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

Phone, Spruce 3622

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY MANUFACTURERS PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

REFERENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL PHONE: FIBERT 2666.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL PHONE SPRUCE 1646

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1871.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense

Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth
from 30c to 50c.
REDDUCES
FIRE RISK.
Guaranteed for one year.

$16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels

Paper

Paper Bags and Twine

259 South Third Street

THE following timely books recommended by the Social Order Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, are for sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

"The Practice of Christianity,"	$2.00
"The Church and the Hour,"
Vida D. Scudder,	1.00
"The Social Problem,"
C. A. Ellwood,	1.25
"The Abolition of Poverty,"
J. H. Hollander,75
"Christianizing the Social Order,"
Walter Rauschenbusch,	1.50
"The Arm of God,"
William Littleboy,75
"The Day of Our Visitation,"
William Littleboy,50
"A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich,"
John Woolman,05

GIRARD TRUST CO. BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian,
Administrator, Assignee and Receiver.
Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults.
Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 24, 1918.

No. 30.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND.

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"LORD, TEACH US TO PRAY."

"Thy Kingdom come."

In this prayer and the next

Lies every cure for weary hearts perplexed.

"Thy Will be done."

"Thy Kingdom come."

No finer climax of desire

Ere touched a soul alight with Heaven's fire.

"Thy Will be done."

"Thy Kingdom come."

If satisfied in this our supplication,

In certainty will end all expectation.—

"Thy Will be done."

L. C. W.

THE MASTER KEY.

At every hand there are heralds of a "new world order." One of them writing in THE FRIEND has said, "on one point we can all agree. The world from its remotest to its nearest boundaries is a very different abiding-place from the world we all knew three years ago" (A. L. Tierney, "Thoughts on the Social Order.") Not only politically but economically, industrially, socially the very foundations are to be shaken, nor are the religious and the educational worlds to escape. Human society, we are assured, has already toppled over and is to be rebuilt anew. The old materials are to be discarded—"and behold all things shall be new." If only we might believe it were to be some catastrophic spiritual rebirth corresponding to this Scripture picture, there would be some comfort in the prospect. To most minds perhaps the outlook is one of great apprehension. With painful toil they have brought their lives into what they have regarded as reasonably ordered ways, the adjustments they have made seem to have exhausted their capacity for adjustment, they are past middle age, perhaps, and honestly greatly disquieted by the outlook. To such there seems to be a service in proclaiming that there is a master key (a pass key) even to these impending difficulties—to go indeed a step further and to assure them that they actually may have the master key, and will probably find themselves able to move in and out of the new order even with a sense of belonging to it.

When our Lord entered upon His ministry in Galilee the world order was about as far removed from His Gospel as one could easily imagine. The most perfect military system the world had known up to that time, was dominant wherever He turned. Human slavery was accepted without protest as a necessary corollary to the military system. (Is it not always so in some form?) Luxury with its attendant vices was a devastating cancer upon the upper strata of society. Poverty in forms we could not believe, excited no sense of human or governmental responsibilities. The picture drawn by Gibbon, and by other even more reliable historians, makes one's senses reel and one's heart sick. Those who had visions of Jesus as the Messiah felt that His hand of power must at once be put upon all this human chaos, and a new order be "spoken into existence." Recall for just a moment what actually did happen.

The centurion sought a favor of healing for his servant and our Lord was then face to face with Roman militarism. It was the centurion, however, who said, "I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof." Do we do an injustice to the context by paraphrasing his explanation of this statement as follows: "The military authority I am under and bound to, belongs to another world than thine. I recognize that Thou art the source of an order in which men can not fight." Let our interpretation of this greatest instance of faith be what it may, Jesus was able to enter the soldier's life and to perform a notable miracle at his behest. The second familiar instance shows Jesus in a world farther removed from His kingdom, if possible, than the military world. He has entered into conversation with the woman at the well and the sense of propriety even of His disciples is outraged as they find him talking with a woman who is a sinner. He had at least the sympathy of knowledge of her evil. One would think that her enthusiastic call to others to "come see a man which told me all things that ever I did," indicated that He had also touched some deep springs of repentance even in her life. Similarly, the Zacchaeus instance carries our Lord into an environment with which his guiding principles were felt to be in protest. So much was this the case that "they all murmured." That He made the visit with good effect is disclosed in the Weymouth translation, "Here and now, Master, I give half my property to the poor, and if I have unjustly exacted money from any man, I pledge myself to repay to him four times the amount."

These well-known instances would seem to make it clear beyond question that the master key that fits all possible world orders is the key of the Master of Life Himself. He has given us Himself for just such a key. If we actually have Him, world orders may change, social and economic systems be carried away, but we may be preserved alive through all. Doubtless we shall not be spared suffering, new adjustments will mean that, but we shall not be set hopelessly adrift. More likely than not we shall discover that the new order more nearly approaches His order and His Kingdom than the old and we ought not to feel other than at home then.

It is, we know, the merest commonplace to remark that the great merit of a master key is to have it always at hand. Few of us actually accept Christ's Spirit in that sense. Much of our religion after all is a "dealing in futures." Even when He was with His disciples in Galilee he had been so trained to other expectations that they must needs ask Him for signs of His coming. If all professing Christians everywhere could at once realize how much He is already here, how by His Spirit he is offering us a Master key to fit locks of sin and suffering, of injustice and false ambitions, we should be all at once in the new world order, nor should we be dismayed by it.

Reconstruction of human Society is doubtless in process. It may come upon us as a great catastrophe, but the wise virgins had oil "in their vessels with their lamps." The maximum of human sacrifice and devotion will be required of multitudes of men and women if all the difficult problems of the new order are to be met. We have small faith in any or in all these efforts, save as they are directed and steadied by a Christian experience, real enough to make "changed men and changed women." A revival of real personal religion is the only cure-all for false systems and for false and failing lives.

J. H. B.

ARNOLD CHASE SCATTERGOOD.

Not often has the circle of Philadelphia Friends had its sympathies more widely drawn upon than in the death of the twenty-fifth of Twelfth Month, of Arnold Chase Scattergood. He was only nineteen years old, but the promise of his developing life seemed more manifest than in most of his years. This was not merely because he possessed an unusual combination of heredity and opportunity, nor merely because he had progressed quite steadily in the various stages of life preparation, not even because his talent and acquirement found an admirable manliness of expression. Behind these undoubted points of advantage there was evident a background of resolution that each of them singly and all of them together should make up a life of unstinted service in line with a fixed tradition, perhaps, but in the larger outline upon the inspiration of "Him who was amongst us, as one that serveth." As a very small schoolboy this trait was manifested with a maturity of feeling that was quite startling. He seemed to realize instinctively that many a gift is spoiled by the way of giving.

It has been no great time since he came to the door of an older Friend who had been very ill, with an invitation for him to take an automobile ride in the sunshine. The discovery that this was a spontaneous offering and his quiet insistence that it was he that had received the greater favor disclosed not a little of the working basis of his life. To any who knew these roots of his character it was no surprise to hear that he had decided to spend his summer vacation as a volunteer worker in one of Dr. Grenfell's hospitals amongst the fishermen of the far eastern coast. Some brief excerpts from his letters while in that service were printed in THE FRIEND. He was chagrined to learn of this publicity when he returned.

In common with most of his years he preferred to mask anything that seemed like self-sacrifice.

All of us who think of the eternal life, whether present or future, in terms of unselfish service find it brings those who have passed on most near to remember their earthly conquests in this line. The remark of J. Rendel Harris, quoted at Arnold's funeral, thus was comforting force. "The separation of death is an illusion after all."

"Wisdom is grey hairs unto youth and an unspotted life is old age."

J. H. B.

ONWARD AND UPWARD.

Then onward through sunshine, and storm, and night,
No tarrying here, my soul;
Thou must, if thou read thy chart aright,
Press steadily on to thy goal.

Let pleasures delight thee, but not detain.
Let courage in storms rise higher,
And thy Pilot will bring thee through joy and pain
To the haven of thy desire.

—MALTBIE BABCOCK.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

TWELFTH MONTH 2, 1917.

There is an outbreak of mumps among the children in the village, but so far none of our party have come down with it. We had a fine time on Thanksgiving. We took a holiday and went into Roye and had our dinner at a restaurant there and I called at the post office and got our mail.

I went into Roye later and saw almost all nationalities walking around the streets. I was on a requisitioning tour to get building material, which is paid for by the French Government, but which we find it very hard to find, but I came back with a load of lumber, glass and tar paper, and felt very successful. Then Ernest Brown, who was running the car, and I went off a couple of miles to a sand pit and loaded the truck with sand and brought that back for future brick building.

Seventh-day I spent in finishing the garbage-pit I began in the garden, two weeks ago, and I want to say that throwing earth out of a six-foot hole is some exercise. We are constantly held up for lack of materials now. For instance, we have run out of slate and we can't find that we can get nails anywhere.

We are having a cold, windy First-day, with more sunshine than usual, but I forgot to tell about our Thanksgiving dinner. We marched into Roye separately or in small groups, and as I got there early I went to the post office and fetched our mail so that when the boys arrived I could give them their letters. Then we sat down in the main dining-room of the restaurant, which the twenty-two or twenty-three of us filled, and which Madame locked up for us from one to five. We had a full French dinner, including "poulet et salade," and after it was all over Madame's daughter, Yvonne, decorated all of us with American flags and sang several French chansons to us. Then we rose and sang "America"—the "Star-Spangled Banner" being too hard—and shaking hands all around came home to our regular First-day afternoon tea, after which we adjourned to our workshop for fire and music, and where we had chocolate and pumpkin pies at nine o'clock, and so, as Pepsys says, "to bed." The best part about the day was the arrival of the mail with letters, and after that the evening—the dinner was very quiet and dignified, partly because we didn't want to raise a row in a public place or give vent to merriment which might offend a people engaged in such a struggle as the French are. But we made noise enough when we reached the seclusion of our own Maison Franois, and had a very uproarious and joyous evening.

I am sending some post cards of towns around here so you can see what there is to be done and how little a band of sixteen as we have been can accomplish in the vast total. We are being called on for all kinds of service—last night the lady who lives across the way brought her daughter in here to be bandaged, as she had broken through a window glass in shutting up for the night and cut her hands. She was very much worried, although the cuts were very slight, and turned up again this A. M. to have them gone over. Fortunately I didn't have to do it, for though Zavitz, who likes to attend to such jobs, was away, MacDowell rose to the occasion and spent a long time in fixing it up and was careful and thorough enough, I should say, to relieve any mother's mind.

TWELFTH MONTH 9, 1917.

I have been very busy the last three days cooking, as our cook has left and it came my turn. Yesterday, T. Edmund Harvey, the President of our mission in France, came to pay us a visit, and to-day a lot of men who are engaged in various kinds of work in the surrounding villages came to have a meeting with him. In the morning he and about eight other Englishmen started off to visit the first line trenches—that is only my second visit—but we went to an entirely different part, almost west of here, and as we were due back at three o'clock we didn't get across No Man's Land to the old British trenches. There were the same interminable trenches, more intricate than I had seen before, with deeper bomb-proof shelters and barbed wire entanglements almost undamaged, but we found British hand grenades and bandoliers in the German trenches, showing some fighting had gone on there—the woods between the lines were almost entirely destroyed—and the landscape was almost level, except the parapets of the trenches and redoubts. We approached them over a road paved with granite, not a natural stone found in this locality, which must have been brought in by the Germans, and a little narrow gauge railway running alongside to convey munitions up, and it was very interesting to see how closely the British gunners had located the road which was bordered by shell holes and some in it. I suppose most of those in it had been repaired as they were made.

The picture of the King of Italy was taken pointing right at me, and I can see one of our caps in the background, which may be Clark Smith or myself.

To all formal enquiries as to what I intend to do when my enlistment is up I have replied I am going home, but that is of course, not final. The sous prefet of the section named above wants our mission to take over as soon as it can be done, all that section of country—not the town itself—and to keep out all other missions or relief agencies—and the Ex-Commissioner is seriously considering whether we can undertake such a responsibility—already the British Friends are feeling the burden, so that their money or workers can hardly be increased and the American Friends for this mission do not meet the increased expenses of the keep and materials that our increased numbers bring. We need more workers, skilled masons and carpenters particularly, and they should be thorough-going conscientious objectors. Others are not happy in the work and generally prove centres of disturbance and loafing. American Friends should first of all get more money for our mission and then see about more workers. The section named above sounds very interesting to me, as we should have a big job—years to do it in. Young men might very properly give it a year after leaving college and the practical side of it and association with British Friends would do them a lot of good and open their eyes, as it has mine, to the tremendous work of a manual laborer.

By the way, I brought back from the trenches a Bosch's chair, all of six miles I guess, that we found in a bomb-proof. T. Edmund Harvey insisted on sharing the burden with me, which makes me feel such an affection for the chair that I fear I shall have to try to bring it home with me.

We have just broken off to go to our evening meeting, after which we have been sitting around listening to T. E. H. tell of his experiences with Lloyd George and other moguls, so having a very pleasant First-day evening. He has encouraged me to spend the fund for relief which has been subscribed for me, without paying too much attention to rules and regulations, and the first thing I shall do is to buy tools for fine work for an old carpenter here, all of whose outfit was stolen by the Bosches, and who is getting on so that he can hardly do building or heavy work, but who will be able to earn a decent living if he has the tools to do the finer and easier jobs, so many of which are necessary here now, after the people get established and come back.

Lavitz—one of our workers—was describing his experiences yesterday and before, when he went back to do some glazing in a house where he had helped repair the roof and other damage some time ago. The family moved in yesterday, their furniture came and they were carrying it in, the father was whistling as he tacked up the shelves, the little girl was singing and dancing all around the place, and the mother was cracking jokes and making good-natured remarks to every one—a lovely picture for him to carry in his mind as the result of some of his own work.

J. H. H.

(To be continued.)

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

(Continued from page 371.)

"When we were in New York, our friends told us of a judge whose name was Fell, that had been a prisoner there thirteen months. When he was first taken he was put in the Provost, and he, being a tender man, in close confinement, was not likely to continue long. We were informed that ten of our friends joined together to do their utmost, by treating with the officers, for his liberty in the town, who at length obtained it, by being bound in the sum of one thousand pounds for his good behaviour in the city. This judge behaved himself so well as to gain the good will of the officers, who gave him liberty to go home to his family, upon parole of honour. Our friends considering the difficulties we might meet with when out of the English lines, thought it best for me, (as the judge was yet in town), to go to him. A friend went with me, whose name is Henry Haydock. After that friend, who had long been acquainted with me, had recommended me to him, and made known to the judge my circumstances, he said he was a prisoner, and could do but little for me, but what he could he would. He informed me he had a son who was a major, that lived about Hackinsack. If I could find him, and tell him that I had seen his father, he believed he would show me kindness; and if he saw him before I did, he would speak to him concerning me. I asked him if he dare write a line to him. The judge thought it not safe. He gave me his name on a small piece of paper, and told me his son would know his hand, (which I have in my pocket).

"We went on our journey from Powles Hook, and travelled near twenty miles, when we were stopped by the guards, our bags taken off and searched. We inquired for major Fell. They told us he lived many miles from that place; and informed us of a major who lived four or five miles back, where we went without a guard. After that major examined us and searched our pocket-books, and had seen judge Fell's handwriting, which he knew, he gave us a pass to the highest officer in Elizabethtown, which I have with me. We went forward through Hackinsack, and came to Passaic river, then crossed the ferry to a little village, where we were stopped by the guard, our bags again taken off and searched thoroughly, but nothing found that was offensive. Soon after there came along the road a major in a wagon, who stopped and came to us, and in a very furious manner, asked us where we had been. I told him we had been to New York. He asked me if I did not know that there was a strict law against it. I told him I thought that law was not made for such men as we were. Then, he, in a great rage, ordered the guard to bring us down to Newark; and we were had there before a judge, a justice, and two majors. After examination, we were sent to the guard-house, where we were closely confined that night. The next morning we were sent for to the major's house, where was a justice who read to us the law, which we had not before heard; by which we understood our lives were forfeited. We were then had to the judge's house, where our guard received orders to take us to the governor's. The judge and his officers blamed us much, that we did not go to the governor's at Poughkeepsie, (in the state of New York,) in order to get a pass to go to York or Long Island. We did not know it was death by the law, until we had rode between thirty and forty miles below Poughkeepsie, and then we did not know that it was possible for a stranger to obtain a permit from the governor to go within the English lines. And concerning deceiving the colonel at the White Plains, in not telling him we were going to New York, if he asked me the question, I believe I should have told him the truth.

"When I heard it was death by the law to go to Long Island and New York, I was struck with a serious sadness, and did not know what to do. To go forward, it was death by the laws of the land,—and to go homeward, it was death by the law of the Spirit of life. But after considering the matter calmly in myself, I concluded to go forward, with a strong resolution to keep myself entirely clear of those crimes for which the law was made, and in so doing I should be innocent before God, and more excusable before my countrymen at my return. And I can assure the governor and his council, that I have not said or done any thing knowingly or intendingly, that would injure particulars, or of my countrymen in general; and let the governor and his council judge whether I am guilty of death, or further confinement. If guilty, I must endeavour to suffer patiently, according to your laws; but if the governor and council should judge me innocent, I desire a pass to go home, and liberty in it to go back to Plainfield, Rahway, Shrewsbury, Squan, Squankum, Barnegat, Egg Harbours, and Cape May, from whence I intend to go home, if the Lord permit."

It would seem as though this was all that he said; but his humility has operated to the suppression of what he further expressed to the council; viz.: that, if his visit should be judged a capital offence, which must be punished with death, he only might suffer, and his companion be permitted to go home, as his only motive was merely to accompany him in the journey. The governor and council, after hearing this simple, undisguised relation, being conscious that nothing but a sense of religious duty could have induced him to undertake such a journey, in a time of extreme difficulty and peril, freely, and with that magnanimity which ever accompanies genuine benevolence, granted the following pass, viz.:

PRINCETON, 26th May, 1778.

"COUNCIL OF SAFETY, STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

"Abel Thomas and James Thomas, inhabitants of Pennsylvania, being sent under guard to the President and Council of Safety by two magistrates of Newark, for having been into the enemy's lines in the city of New York and Long Island without passports, and suspected of designs injurious to the liberties of America: the Board, upon hearing their defence, were satisfied of their innocence, and have reason to believe, that their journey to the several places which they have visited, was undertaken on a religious account, and agreeable to their declared intention to the meeting held at Maiden creek the 25th day of March, 1778, of performing a religious visit to the meetings of Friends in part of the Jerseys and part of New York Governments. The Board therefore discharges the said Abel and James Thomas from their present confinement; and they being further desirous to visit the meetings of their friends at Plainfield, Rahway, Shrewsbury, Squan, Squankum, Barnegat, Great and Little Egg Harbour, and at the Capes, and this government being unwilling to obstruct any society in the exercise of their religion, the said Abel and James Thomas are permitted to pass to the nine places last mentioned, and then to the state of Pennsylvania.

"WILL. LIVINGSTON, President."

(To be continued.)

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

ABRAHAM'S OAK.

(Continued from page 366.)

John Deane brought a doctor from Horsham; but the country practitioner of those days knew little of the human frame, and could do nothing to restore the lost power in the lower limbs. By-and-by, he managed to sit up in a great chair which was wheeled to the broad lattice window in full view of Abraham's oak.

Bravely he bore the deprivation; the sweet strength of his character showing in his determination that no murmuring word should pass his lips to add to Nancy's heavy burdens or damp the happy spirit of his boy.

His hands had always been remarkably clever ones, and he soon began to employ them, plaiting straw for hats and baskets, knitting stockings, and even making straw skeps, not only for Nancy's, but for their neighbor's bees. His library only numbered three volumes besides his large Bible, but Friends near were glad to lend him any that they possessed, and in that first winter he patiently taught Abraham, until the little fellow could read aloud as fluently as his father.

John Prier's little son was his chief companion, for Nancy was obliged to oversee the farm, manage her dairy, and supplement the rather dull intellects of Seth and Gainer, a brother and sister whom John's mother had taken from the parish thirty years before and trained into great industry and faithfulness.

So eighteen months went by, and one fine autumn day, when Abie was reading to his father, a man's step came up the oaken stairs, and John Deane's pleasant voice greeted them both.

"Friends at Monthly Meeting told me thou wishes to see me, John."

"Aye, I do, and it is kind of thee to come so soon."

"Oh, I had a leisure afternoon, so I brought my little Mary on the pillow for a birthday treat—she is eight years old to-day. She is out under thy oak, Abie. Wilt thou go and play with her while father and I have our talk?"

"Say thy last texts to Friend Deane before thou goest, my son."

Abie stood up, put his hands behind him, and spoke clearly and distinctly:

"Owe no man anything save to love one another." "Provide things honest in the sight of all men"—and then bounded away, eager for the rare pleasure of a play-fellow.

"Those words are a legacy that I want to leave my boy," said the invalid, wistfully. "I feel I shall not be with him long, John Deane."

"Hast thou any fresh ailment, then?"

"No, but my strength steadily goes. I feel I have come to the place of this Pilgrim in this wonderful book of John Bunyan's, which Susannah Martin lent me," and he put a white, wasted finger on the passage in the open "Pilgrim's Progress"—"There came a summons that he must prepare for a change of life, for his Master was not willing that he should be so far from Him any longer."

"If my Master needs me elsewhere I am glad to go; but I naturally think of my wife and child—I want to leave them clear of debt, so I sent for thee to ask if thy offer to buy the six home oak trees stands—then I could pay off all family claims and leave Nancy with a clear freehold to pass on to Abie."

"What! Abie's oak too? What of thy plans for his education?"

John Prier smiled sadly. "That has gone the way of many earthly hopes," he said. "His mother could ill spare him to go to Brightelmstone—and will even less when she is left alone. She will teach him to follow his inward Guide, and that is better than book learning. Now, canst thou cut those oaks in the Spring?"

"Certainly I can. There is always a demand for such good timber. Only last week there was one of the King's shipbuilders in Horsham inquiring for it, but he gets none from me for ships of war, and I am sure thou wilt feel the same. But I have a friend at Shoreham who builds large hoyes for the coasting trade, and the bigger sorts of fishing craft. Many a good tree I have sold to him. And my men fill in their spare time with making dressers and chests, which sell well in Horsham. I shall be glad to pay thee a good price for those trees."

"That is weight off my mind. Nancy will, I feel sure, be able to get an honest living until Abie is old enough to take to the farm. She is a good manager, and thrifty and industrious, as thou knows."

"Indeed she is—I saw her as I rode in, busy over the cider mill."

"Ah, we turn many an honest penny with that. Squire Brown sent a whole wagon load of apples to be crushed to-day, and Seth's hands, and Nancy's wits between them manage it captially. That mill was the last thing I made before my accident, little thinking that I should never see the juice flow from it; but I am glad I finished it that Spring, for it brings in a little ready money, besides making our own cider."

Meanwhile, under the oak, the children were supremely happy. The acorns were dropping all around them, often with a thud on head or back, which brought shouts of happy laughter. A wooden Sussex trug basket was soon full to the brim.

"Now I must take it to the pit in the stackyard," said Abie.

"Let me help thee carry it," pleaded the little maiden.

"No, thank thee, Mary. I like something heavy to carry," and the sturdy little man stumped off with his load.

"Seth has dug such a big pit for the acorns this year, and I mean to fill it right up," he explained.

"What can you want so many acorns for?" asked the visitor.

"Oh, for the pigs next winter, and the sheep too. They get sweet after they have sprouted under the wet straw we put over them. When there is a long spell of snow and frost I don't know what we should do without them—and my oak grows such big acorns, twice as large as those in the back pasture. I must go there now. Will thee come too?"

"Oh, yes. Do thee pick them up every day?"

"I must get them out of the way of the cows. Last year Neighbor Bonwick's white heifer ate so many whole that she died—can't let that happen to our cows," said the little farmer, as he began to re-fill his trug under the fine tall oaks at the back of the barn.

When they came back to the house, Nancy greeted the little visitor kindly. "Take her up to thy father, Abie; he would like to see her."

Shyly, the child stood before the invalid, but he soon put her at her ease.

"Look what I am making, Mary. We were sorry for the poor old black cow pulled off her crumpled horn in a gate, but it is just come right to make buttons for the winter coat for Abie that his mother is spinning out of the black sheep's fleece." Home-made buttons! Yet so delicately cut and polished by the clever white fingers that they were not at all to be despised, and would be cherished as no shop-bought buttons could ever be. The little girl was interested, and was soon chatting gaily, the sick man's eyes resting on her rosy face and flaxen hair with pleasure.

Nancy came up with a tray, and the visitors ate with enjoyment her brown bread and honeycomb, and drank cider freshly pressed from the apples which had mellowed in the farm orchard.

Then the strong bay horse was brought to the mounting block, and Mary perched on the pillion, holding fast to a strap round her father's waist, and they jogged away along narrow lanes in the sunset.

(To be continued.)

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 365.)

BOGOTA, Colombia, Tenth Month 12, 1917.

This Bogota waiting is far more trying to me than anything that has preceded; I suppose it is necessary, but I am most anxious to proceed with work to justify, or better to realize, this undertaking. I hope soon I shall have warrant to proceed. I have done a splendid lot of good botanical collecting, and have enjoyed the friends fate has raised up in this far city, but I'm here for other, supposedly "timely" work, and want to be about it.

Last Seventh-day a small party of us, the American teachers of the Colegio Americano, also the head of the Presbyterian mission here, and myself, went for an all-day horseback ride into the mountains. The Birtchets had trouble about getting the horses, several promises failing, so it was after 9 A. M. before we left. I had joined in part because I was told it would be over the Cordillera, and I hoped to make a new cross-section to the eastern slope. This, however, was not to be, for the hacienda of the Nesas, to which we were bound, while over the first hills, was this side the hills which divide the waters. However, we had good horses, a pleasant ride, good lunch, several orchids and lilies collected, and returned at a brisk rate about the hour of 8 P. M.

First-day to dinner at the Tracys in Chapinero, Bogota's one fine suburb. The Tracys are English, and theirs is a lovely un-Colombian home. After a few hours there, conversing, and for a little while looking at some recent botanical captures from the great snow-peak of Tolima, we went for a call to some neighbors. The neighbors were the Comacho family, genuine Colombians, the father the owner of the best book-store here. Theirs is the prettiest place I have seen about Bogota, and the finest Colombian children observed. They played tennis, three of the Comacho girls in the game, and it was a good one. I was interested in the scoring, the Colombians using English words throughout—precisely ours at home. The girls, all in their early or middle teens, K. would not have known for Spanish.

Third-day we, the Birtchets and I (my part being very minor, little more than supplying the funds) prepared three quart jars full of Coruba, a passion-flower fruit much used here for flavoring, especially in ice cream. Dr. Rusby wishes it for trial as a flavor. First was the buying of the fruit in the market. Then cutting the skins—they are an oblong fruit, about 2 to 3 inches long, with a thick skin—and letting the seeds, each embedded in a mass of pulp, fall into a pan. Rusby's instructions were to halve the fruits, but one taste of the skin convinced me of the wisdom of leaving it out—only the pulp about the seeds is used. This pulp (with seeds) we boiled slightly, and sealed tightly in Mason jars. Delicious was the result, a certain raw taste of the original being happily lost. I think about appendicitis when eating Coruba, Granadilla and several other fruits here. For in these you break the skin and swallow the whole central mass of pulp, seeds and all. Granadilla is green, white-mottled, and looks like a gourd. It also is a passion-flower fruit. It has a more delicate taste than Coruba, fainter, tasting like the fragrance of violets. As a flavor for practical purposes it is doubtless too faint; Coruba I hope Rusby can introduce into the States, for it's surely worth while. It is truly surprising the number of native plants used for food here; doubtless all domesticated long ago by the Chibcha Indians.

To-day is a holiday here, Columbus Day, and Dr. Lund, his small dog Jeff (named for Gff, pronounced jeff, of Mt. Kisco) and I went for a long tramp.

More and more I'm surprised at the number of papers and journals in many lines published here. Not much in pure science, but two (or maybe three) medical journals, and quite an array of popular papers, El Comico, El Grafico, etc., etc. Whatever is said of Colombia, Bogota has the spirit of a capital city.

BOGOTA, Colombia, Eleventh Month 2, 1917.

At last the quina-bark from Villavicencio has arrived. Due the twenty-second of last month, it reached here yesterday. But I'm not inclined to blame Soto, for I can fully understand what a task it must have been to try to dry this bark at this season. It's been somewhat wet here, and I doubt not on the eastern slope of the Cordillera it's been pretty steadily rain.

From what I read, on the eastern slopes and lower on the plains, the rain lasts for about nine months and converts much of the country into lakes. It was wet when I was at Villavicencio, and then the main rains were due to come later. Here in Bogota we had a heavy downpour yesterday—our first of much moment—and it hailed till the ground was white. It was an unusual contrast, that of green grass under a layer of white. It was just after this that the 100 pounds of quina arrived, in bags on a mule, and somewhat wetted. José is under instructions to get it completely dry again, and as soon as possible I'll send it.

This past week has been memorable for an excursion to Sibate, at the southern extremity of the Bogota Sabana, a trip which yielded botanical results far beyond expectations, and also in other ways was marked by much unexpectedness.

I left Bogota—or rather we left Bogota, for I went again with my friends of the Colegio Americano (although not all my adventures were shared with them) Seventh-day morning, at 8 A. M. The train brought us to Sibate, a little group of three or four houses, the present terminus of the Ferrocarril del Sur Railroad of the South. From there we started on a brisk walk, the Birtchets for guides, by the road toward Fusagasuga over the low mountains (or really hills) to El Penon. At El Penon commences the steep descent from the cool upland to the temperate slope and valleys, and afar you can see the hot lands of the Magdalena and beyond that the snow of the Central Cordillera. It is said to be a wonderful view, and although our sight there could not penetrate over 50 feet in front of us, I fully believe it.

We left the flat open sabana and started over the hills. At first these were, as I expected, like those about Bogota, open or covered with small shrubs. But later we came to forest. Here because of the almost constant clouds formed at the junction of the warm with the cold climates, there is abundant moisture, and the forests creep up the hills to levels higher than the open lands within the mountain chain. These are the luxuriant mountain forests, such as we crossed opposite Neiva, and yield a seemingly infinite number and variety of plants. There were tree-ferns, one beautiful grove I'll remember especially, Gesneriads, large pink Tibaudius Callies of our blueberries, but far larger and in every way more striking, orchids of many sorts, etc., etc.

We had a pleasant picnic-lunch and started to walk back the six miles to the 4.45 train at Sibate. We left the cloud which capped the brink of the Cordillera Plateau, and with it the forest, then began really a race for that train. Of course we felt confident of catching it, but it did seem most disconcerting how the distances stretched out on the return trip. From the first hill from which we could see the station, we had left only a half hour, and the station looked further off than expected. From the last hill twelve minutes, and the distance through the valley at the hill's base seemed easily to have doubled itself since the morning. Then a watch, in which we had unfortunately full confidence, proved to be five minutes slow, and by that five minutes we missed the train.

(To be continued.)

MEETING IN THE INTERESTS OF NEGRO EDUCATION.

The public meeting arranged by the Cheyney Board and Staff at Witherspoon Hall on the evening of the ninth proved to be an occasion of unusual value. The audience was large, representative and highly appreciative. One of the speakers made a graceful acknowledgment of the presence of a fair proportion of colored people. A Friend writing of the occasion since, also refers to this feature and comments very favorably upon their intelligence and refinement.

The subject of the meeting was intentionally not confined to the interests of the local institution. The aim of the management at Cheyney has been to maintain an understanding that they are but a small unit in a great cause. The thought was well borne out by all three of the speakers. Leslie Hill made an impressive, dignified address. It was evident throughout that the honor of class orator when he graduated at Harvard had not come to him unearned. Although the address was made without manuscript, it has been written out and we are pleased to print it herewith.

Three days before the meeting and indeed up to the very hour announced it seemed that an accident that the principal speaker had had, would keep him at home. Upon his arrival it was quite evident that he had made an unusual effort to be present. His address was the more impressive by this visible evidence of devotion to the cause.

In anticipation of the expected disappointment it had been possible to secure Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones as an alternate. He is the author of the great U. S. Government report on Negro Education, and undoubtedly the principal authority on the subject in the country. With great amiability he was willing to take a secondary place on the program upon the arrival of Oswald Garrison Villard.

Dr. Jones plead for more teachers. The lack of qualifications of many who now conduct schools seemed almost unbelievable as he pictured them. He gave Cheyney unqualified endorsement, and told how Dr. Frissell, of Hampton, on one of his last visits to Philadelphia had spent a day at the Training School. He had been so impressed with the opportunity and need of Cheyney that the next day he called on one of the wealthy women of Philadelphia, represented the need and suggested that she should give the school a thousand a year. This she has done now for the second time.

Oswald Garrison Villard, who made the principal address, spoke with an emphasis and seriousness that were most impressive. He represented that the education of the twelve million negroes had in many places up to date been the merest farce. In one district less than thirty cents a month per child for five months represents the expenditure. In a limited Virginia circuit forty colored teachers were given the simplest examination in spelling with the dictation of forty words. Not one of the number spelled them all, and the teacher with the largest school missed every word. Eventually this is a problem for Public School systems under State control, but pioneer work at every hand still calls for the largest possible measure of personal devotion and private beneficence.

The great exodus of the past two years was referred to and its appealing nature disclosed. It has brought the colored people in great numbers to our very doors. They are asking for bread. Shall we give them a stone? It is quite impossible to reproduce the moving effect of this appeal. The great Liberator was with us again in the person of his grandson, and the challenge of his ringing words must have broken through no little prejudice and indifference even of Friends in this great cause. If we are to have a real democracy, if we are to realize actual brotherhood in our nation, many of us will have to gird ourselves anew for the battle.

J. H. B.

THE NEED OF A TRAINED NEGRO LEADERSHIP.

LESLIE FINCKSEY HILL.

If ever the mind of God had pleasure in a warring nation, it must have been at that moment when America entered the world conflict, neither for territorial gains, nor for political prestige, nor for commercial supremacy, but solely and avowedly to sustain the immemorial rights of man and to extend the boundaries of freedom.

Lovers of peace by instinct and habit, we knew that we were not prepared to face at once a resourceful and prolific nation whose best energies had been deliberately engrossed for decades by the study of war. We realized that victory for our exalted cause could be assured by us only in so far as every American citizen could be made efficient in some department of the national service. This is still our national conviction. On every hand we are momentarily called to individual and collective efficiency. Every agency of our beneficent government is strained to the same result. The world, our President says, must be safe for democracy.

I conceive, then, that we are responding to the cry of the tortured world and to the call of the highest patriotism when we gather here to take counsel about the fitness of twelve million colored American citizens for service in the cause of right and justice—about their preparedness to answer the summons of their country, or to help in some part of that vast program of restoration and healing during the pregnant years ahead.

Fifty years ago the education of the Negro appealed to the imagination. To-day the hurry of big events and the feverish issues of the hour shut him out of your view. He is swallowed up in the world ordeal. This may be inevitable. Nevertheless, it is as true in 1918 as it was in 1860 that this great dark human mass must continue to be either one-tenth of the efficiency and strength of the nation, or one-tenth of its weakness and failure. We must be either a powerful help or a fatal hindrance to the great cause for which we are marching to war.

It required only twelve humble men to spread throughout the world a new civilization. It took fewer than twelve powerful beneficiaries of that civilization in Europe to hurl it back through blood and crime to savagery again. Who then will dare to measure the capacity for good or evil of twelve million souls?

Now this world has tried and proved the values of Negro folk. In spite of the mean denials of the selfish and the fully blind, every man and woman here to-night knows the quality of your dark neighbor's heart—the humor of his goodwill, his inability to hate, his patience, his faith in God, his productive labor, his astonishing progress against a civilization organized and armed against him. You know his loyalty—so precious now in the time of crisis—cannot be diminished by all the contempt of Jim-crowism—nor by your widespread unrebuked pogroms of lynching. Upon him you know you can depend, whoever else betrays you. If there were a dozen Kaisers and a dozen Germanys, the black man's faith in this country, in God, and in the brotherhood of man would stand unshaken.

And this is he who in the plenitude of stubborn trust still appeals to an unheeding, misunderstanding white world for a man's chance—not for alms or indulgence but for the opportunity to be of service, not for special favor, but for the justice of fair play, not for that will-o-the-wisp called equality, but for the Christian privilege of co-operation in good works with all those, of whatever race or creed, who truly believe in one God and in the brotherhood of all the nations that He has made of one blood to dwell upon the face of the earth.

But we realize that this opportunity for service which we seek, this justice, this co-operation must come to us slowly only as the outgrowth of Christian character. That character in turn must be the fruit of education, and education, we know, must depend fundamentally upon teachers. We are here to-night, therefore, to make emphatic in this public way our conviction that this nation, if it truly desires an efficient citizen body, must address itself with vigor and determination to the need of providing teachers for twelve million of my people—teachers who have themselves been taught, teachers who shall be leaders in the development among us of efficiency in that co-operative service by which alone peace may come again and the future be made secure.

Twelve million of my brothers appeal to your democracy for men and women who shall be trained to build up in us bodies clean and strong, minds disciplined to clear thinking, hands skilled to all the forms of honest labor, and hearts attuned to Christian morality. Three million of our children cry every year for 6,000 of these teachers. That cry is unanswered. All our schools combined, both public and private, are furnishing less than half that number, and the Government is informing us now that more than fifty per cent. of the teachers now directing our elementary colored schools are entirely unfit for their responsibilities, simply because they have never been trained. The blind is leading the blind, National security and efficiency surely can not lie that way.

When men in these days speak to me honestly about the incompetency and the failures of my people—and heaven knows that we have mountains of these—I do not deny them. Rather I point to the cantonments that rise about us like magic day and night on the highlands and in the valleys for the training of the men of war—training without which it is inconceivable that America could ever hope to win a single battle. All this I see to be necessary and well. Then I ask where in all the land there is one thoroughly equipped, staffed and organized training camp for Negro teachers. I ask then if it can be said with any justice that we have ever been given a fair chance to learn the meaning of competency, or to serve our generation as the bitter times require. Millions of our children led by untrained teachers must in the very nature of things come not only to individual incompetency, but to social and civic calamity before which no honest man can stand surprised. To expect a people thus conditioned to face efficiently the insistent demands of this unprecedented age is just as reasonable as to expect this nation to send out thousands of untrained captains and generals with hundreds of thousands of undisciplined troops to face the practiced Germans, and then blame captain and private alike for the inevitable foreseen disaster.

I will not dwell upon that picture. Rather would we have your minds rest for a little while upon our school sitting yonder in the midst of these Pennsylvania hills like a little city that can not be hid. There, we think, is the beginning of such a training camp as the times demand. To that camp we would rally not merely the one hundred volunteers for whom reasonable provision has thus far been made, but at least two hundred of the 6,000 chosen men and women yearly required. We would, if we could, have all who hear me to-night share with us the patriotic privilege and responsibility of building up that cantonment.

For more than three-quarters of a century, Cheyney has sent out among my people trained men and women of color who have been faithful to themselves and to the ideals of American democracy. They have become distinguished public servants. They have not desired to be cheap imitations of white people. They have given dignity and significance to the title of Negro teacher. They have exemplified to thousands of Negro youth the best types of social service. They have revealed to other thousands their own God-given gifts and powers. Wherever they have found their work, they have done that work well. And often in the midst of scorn and contempt and deep provocation they have stood for self-control and good-will to the neighbor. That is what I mean by a trained leadership. That is the only sure way to make the world safe for democracy. That is the high accomplishment to which the nation and the world now call us. That is the task in which we urge you to join us.

Give to my people an adequate body of trained teachers like these, and it will give back to the nation a peace and security which it has not known for three hundred years. If we can not have these leaders, these teachers multiplied a hundred-fold, I can see for generations to come a nation still in sore distress like the house divided against itself, and held down from the fulfillment of its high mission to the world by all the weight of that ignorance, untruth, and moral blindness which, I warn you now by the authority of history, will breed thick and fast among the untrained millions of my neglected brothers.

In such a tragic case it may not avail in the great day when the spirit of Christ's democracy shall hover in judgment above our land for America to say, "Lord, Lord, have we not in Thy name proclaimed freedom for all the world? Have we not in Thy name trained thousands of captains and millions of men for the armies of peace? Have we not in Thy name fed the hungry, and succored the destitute across the seas, and in Thy name done many other wonderful works?" For the spirit of Christ's true democracy may answer: "Inasmuch as ye did it not to twelve millions of Negroes within your own borders, ye did it not to me!"

Is true Freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake
And, with leathern hearts, forget
That we owe mankind a debt?
No! true freedom is to share
All the chains our brothers wear,
And, with heart and hand, to be
Earnest to make others free!

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

FRIENDS' RELIEF WORK AT TROYES, FRANCE.

(Many letters have been published telling of reconstruction of houses in the devastated areas. Here is an equally interesting account of reconstructing life among the refugees who have not yet been able to return to their homes).

My work has become more extended in scope since last I wrote thee. As my eyes troubled me a bit, I gave up most of the indoor work and now spend most of my time out-of-doors, with the result that I am in excellent condition, no matter how long the hours. I have charge of all the deliveries of goods to émigrés and the shipping of relief materials to other équipes. There is plenty of solid muscular work here and I enjoy it immensely. It is enlivened by my co-worker, the carter. He is a very shrewd and interesting Belgian émigré and has a picturesque two-wheeled cart and a stodgy old horse. Two days each week we may be seen moving about the streets of Troyes with a load of iron beds, cupboards, tables, stoves, mattresses and the inevitable duvet, without which no French bed is complete. Gallot has a weakness for the wine that is red, and one of the women workers thinks that I should camp on his trail all of the time and thus keep him on the straight and narrow path, but I confess that I do not always obey the injunction, and Gallot and I are good friends.

Even more interesting are the monthly visits to the émigrés, for their "erséments" on goods which have been sold to them. The very fact that one is a member of the Mission is a basis of friendship, and the welcome is always most cordial. They assume that you will help them if they are in need of assistance, and they tell you their troubles and their joys with a most refreshing frankness, and also with a delightful independence and self-respect. Seldom does one meet a cringing, begging person, but often does one find most touching gratitude for the work that the English Friends have already done for them. Especially is this true of the nurse who labors for seven days a week from seven a. m. to nine or nine-thirty p. m. (and at times all the night) for them. This woman, who is the daughter of a Scottish lord, goes without sugar and without supper, that there may be more food for the émigrés. She has the strongest constitution of any person I have ever known—man or woman—and gives every bit of her strength to the émigrés and thinks nothing of it. But the émigrés think of it. When I call, inevitably the conversation will touch the "maladés" of the families and then the speaker's face will light up and she will refer to the services of our "Granny" Dunbar. "Elle est très, très gentille!" An old Frenchman who is dying of cancer told me yesterday that he was a Free Thinker, but he had come to believe in angels, because Granny had ministered to him.

Sometimes she is called out late at night and then I go with her, not that she is afraid, but that the rest of the Mission is afraid for her. As I help her fix the patient a little more comfortably, or mix the medicine, I have the feeling of living in another world—a world where people think only of others and how they may make them happy, and all the sordidness and selfishness of men fade into oblivion.

I must tell thee of the great interest in my own welfare displayed by an émigré whom I visited yesterday. She asked me the usual questions as to America, the army, etc., and then inquired as to my parentage, etc. Then she sought my opinion of French women—whether they were not the most beautiful I had ever seen, etc. To support her contention she produced pictures of various relatives, informing me of their marital condition. She looked at me with a knowing smile and allowed that I would have difficulty in returning to America unmarried when there were so many belles jeunes filles in France. Finally, she showed me a picture of her youngest daughter who was sitting opposite us. I do not know whether Madame expected me to inquire as to the dowry of her daughter, but if she did I disappointed her.

Our Mission has become a kind of school for social workers, and a new duty of mine is to show visitors our methods of visiting and of distributing relief. Dr. Devine, Homer Folks and other dignitaries of the American and British Red Cross have come to study our work and they have decided to make our method the pattern for all the American Red Cross Civilian Relief in France. To this end they are sending their workers here to study our methods. Each worker stays a week. In addition, we must train all the Mission workers. All this is very flattering to the Mission, but it makes tremendous inroads on our work. Of course, we have things systematized and each person instructs in his speciality, but even so it is a strain on our time. But indirectly this is helping émigrés in other departments of France, so we do not waste the time. A mundane consideration is that we are trying to feed eight workers on the rations allowed for six, and an average of two students a week in addition makes heavy inroads on our scanty stores. By the present outlook we shall celebrate Thanksgiving by fasting and praying (for supplies) instead of the conventional feast. After all, fasting was the original method of observing that day, was it not?

(Signed) A. CARROLL BINDER.

REPORTS FROM CHARLES EVANS.

[We are permitted to make some extracts from letters of Charles Evans to the Service Committee. Naturally many matters of detail can not be published and there is an effort to avoid reference to matters strictly of a personal nature.—Eds.]

PARIS, Twelfth Month 17, 1917.

Events have moved so rapidly that we shall pass by those matters which appear to be either closed or closing and occupy our time with the discussion of what seems at the moment important. On the third of Twelfth Month, T. E. Harvey, Wilfred Shewell, H. F. Trew and the writer left Bar-le-Duc shortly after sunrise with the Préfet of the Marne, who insisted upon my occupying his comfortable limousine with T. E. Harvey, but as it was impossible for me to fully grasp the conversation, I was able at the next stop to induce him to allow Wilfred Shewell to take my place. At a point some kilometres farther on we picked up the Sous Préfet of Verdun, Jean Grillon, whose general views of the rehabilitation of the villages to the west of Verdun are outlined in a report previously sent. We spent a most interesting day with these gentlemen. They have the affairs of their districts strongly at heart and have conceived some very able plans for meeting the difficulties of the future, always expressing their wish that the Friends' Unit should be the group to carry pressing plans into effect. These matters were discussed with the Mayor of Auzeville, who is also a man of striking energy and practical common-sense. We were taken into the centre of Verdun and stood for a minute or two in the ruined cathedral. There was an immense amount of interest in the impressions for anyone non-military or military, but the time allowed us was so brief that we felt it best to go on about the work for which we had started. We visited a large centre of farm buildings now used for military purposes, which, in the judgment of the authorities, might be the future centre for Friends' work, there being space at that point to house a large number of refugees and to provide adequate quarters for workers and staff. These buildings, of course, could only be utilized, if at all, after military affairs would permit. In this beautiful district we were taken to the top of a hill from which we were able to see over into villages part of which were in French and part in German hands. It was a quiet day on the front, but passing aeroplanes were receiving attention from anti-air craft guns. We returned in the darkness, getting back to Sermaize towards seven o'clock. The letter of the sous préfet submitted to us in connection with his proposed agreement was read at the executive meeting on the Fifth-day following, and the Secretary was told to send a reply thanking him for the opportunity and expressing our keen desire to undertake the work within the measure of our powers if the suggestion meets with the approval of the London Committee. A substantial sub-committee was appointed to make further investigations and recommendations in co-operation with the civil authorities. This, of course, is a huge program and one that would absorb a very large amount of the energy of our organization.

An invitation was extended to me to take dinner with Major Grayson M. P. Murphy on the evening of the eleventh, with the heads of other bureaus of the Civil Affairs' Department. The conversation was most interesting, the conversation about the dinner table lasting until near midnight. It appears to be the opinion of those best qualified to advise that a decreased amount of freight will be permitted to be moved for the present at least and that a greater shortage than that which exists at present will occur in the petrol supply. Incidentally, it may be of interest to you to know that the whole Red Cross allotment of this material has been reduced by fifty per cent. We are, of course, extremely careful in the use of our cars and are planning to avoid all unnecessary trips. Under these circumstances it may be advisable for us to use our skill and training in such manner as to stop the spread of disease and to perform such work as can be done without the use of heavy materials.

We very much appreciate the full reports of shipments of goods, and are pleased to state that in so far as known none of the shipments actually leaving American ports have been lost. Some shortages are noted, but certainly the larger bulk of all the material is at hand. We trust this will be gratifying to those who have labored so earnestly in this difficult task. It is likely that the candy may not arrive in time for Christmas, but will be appreciated when received. Many complaints reach this office of packages shipped to the boys which never reach them. It is nearly impossible to trace anything in Paris. We have certainly had the best results in the parcels brought over as excess baggage by individuals. We have no trouble in getting these through the customs and we suggest that this method be seriously considered for all such matters. It gives us a great deal more trouble, but we get the packages.

CORRESPONDENCE.—It will not be necessary to write separate letters for separate subjects, and one reason for not doing so is the shortage of paper at the present time, which we should all combine together to reduce as much as possible, however, if any matter calls for a separate letter there is no reason why this should not be written.

ASSIGNMENT OF WORKERS IN FRANCE.—We are preparing a new list of these assignments which will be forwarded promptly. In this connection, for military reasons, many of our permits have not been granted, and it appears useless to make further efforts to get them through until authorities view the matter on a different basis. We have consequently sent all of our men in Paris, with the exception of McClure, who is recuperating, and Walter E. Wildman, who is co-operating with Grace E. Harper in the organization of a farm for mutilés, to the Hachette property where they are fitting up a hospital for tuberculous patients. Owing to the pressure of office work, I asked Frank Hornborck and John L. Jones to assist me. They are giving me great service and will become familiar with the affairs of the office in preparation for the larger groups which we may have to meet and care for.

ARTICLES AND PICTURES FOR PUBLICATION.—It is not easy for us to get permits to take pictures in the army zone. We have been endeavoring to do so for one individual here, but, owing to circumstances which I cannot explain by letter, we are only beginning to get this. Descriptive matter is quite a problem. Lewis Gannett has written two additional articles, but, owing to the fact that he has been loaned to the Red Cross, he can devote only a portion of his time to this purpose. Illness has also prevented his work. We all know that you desire such articles, but the pressure of work makes it difficult to comply.

PURCHASES TO BE MADE IN AMERICA.—We are advised by A. Ruth Fry that it will be difficult to obtain heavy woollen underclothing from some sources previously open in London. Sleeping bags are increasingly expensive. It may be advisable, but we cannot state definitely without comparing articles and prices, that you should furnish all these matters in America. The men who have come over do not have shoes sufficiently heavy for the work. Such shoes are in fact rarely worn in America. Those needed here have soles from five-eighths to three-quarters of an inch thick, frequently reinforced by hobnails, and cost here in the neighborhood of forty to fifty francs. If the heavy shoes described cannot be purchased, men should bring farmer's shoes, used by farm hands, which contain a felt lining in a heavy rubber bottom. We believe such goods are made by the Mishawaka Rubber Company, but we do not know the location of their factory. The men also came over with merely summer underwear, expecting us to furnish winter clothing here. This is not in accordance with your printed instructions. Working gloves are another matter very hard to obtain here.

CLOTHING FOR RELIEF WORK.—I am obliged to pass this inquiry on to Sophia Fry. We are receiving some goods from the Red Cross, but could use much more. Second-hand clothing is often nearly worthless. There is a great scarcity of boots and shoes for women and children. Wooden shoes answer very well, but even these are now scarce. Will take this up later.

RED CROSS SUPPORT.—Since I wrote you about the possibility of the Red Cross cutting our budget into halves an intimation has reached us that this might not be the case. We are as yet without knowledge in the Civil Affairs' Department. This we do know, however, that we have been most heartily supported and we think that our work will not be crippled for lack of funds. If we are able to supply willing and trained labor, we have an important strategic position. We note the expression of your Committee of the desire for sacrificial service of contribution. This is a matter which we cannot attempt to direct from France, but we venture to point out that it might be a mistake to limit our work by merely using the funds contributed in our own circle, as we need quick results here, and if the Red Cross will give us money in my judgment we ought to accept all we can get of it. The size of the problems in France are not realized by those who have not visited the field.

CHARLES EVANS.

NEWS ITEMS.

REPORT OF THE EXEMPTION COMMITTEE TO THE REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.

With the progress of time, new developments arise in the military situation.

The questionnaires have been sent out from the Local Boards to men of draft age, including those who had been previously exempted.

Many of our young men have faced a situation which has not had to be met for many years by members of the Society of Friends.

From available sources of information, it appears that at present there are thirty-nine members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, men of draft age, who are in the military service of this or other Governments; twenty-two are engaged in Reconstruction or other non-combatant service in France, or elsewhere in Europe, while only ten are listed as Conscientious Objectors, and of this number eight are in three military cantonments in this country. Many of our members who have claimed exemption on religious grounds, and received certificate 1008, assigned them to nothing more than non-combatant service, have also filed claims on account of dependency, agriculture, etc. Boards granting classifications seem inclined rather to grant exemptions for one of the latter reasons than on conscientious grounds; so that the underlying principles of this rather large group of young men are not clearly shown. It should be remembered, too, that the classifications for many of our young men have not as yet been announced, and we shall be disappointed if the number of Conscientious Objectors is not considerably increased in the near future.

We have sympathy for those who feel that they cannot perform military duty, yet who are averse to going to a military camp pending the official definitions of non-combatant service. We do not want to censure, yet we are solicitous that a much larger percentage of our young men should feel impelled by Divine command to uphold our well-recognized principles against militarism; unpopular at the present time, though in the final analysis, a position which is right, and one on which we can afford to stand firm.

Our office has endeavored to the best of its ability, in season and out of season, to do what it could in assisting with answers to the questionnaire; in advising our young men as to the right course to pursue under what are sometimes trying circumstances, and in work with Local Boards in order to change classifications when, through some misunderstanding, they have not been correctly issued.

The situation of our men in camp has not been overlooked, though quarantine restrictions have somewhat hindered visitations; fewer ministers of our membership have gone to the camps than usual during the recent extremely cold weather.

The educational program for the benefit of the Conscientious Objectors in the camps, mentioned in our last report, has been approved by the authorities, and the work of organization is in progress.

From recent developments, we have been informed that the War Department wishes to secure from organizations in sympathy with men who are conscientiously opposed to militarism, their suggestions in regard to what should be embraced in the term "Non-combatant Service." A letter was addressed to the Secretary of War as follows:

FIRST MONTH 8, 1918.

TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR, NEWTON D. BAKER, Washington, D. C.
ESTEEMED FRIEND:—

This Yearly Meeting desires an opportunity to consider the memorandum which we understand the War Department is preparing, relative to conscientious objectors.

As we understand the Department is willing to submit its views in the matter to those especially interested, and is desirous to learn what propositions they have to offer in the premises, we ask as a religious body which for over two hundred and fifty years has consistently opposed militarism on religious grounds, that we should be fully advised of the procedure before finally closed.

If necessary, our small specially appointed committee on drafted men would consider the matter confidentially.

We make this request by mail rather than trouble the Secretary with a personal interview which would require more of his valuable time.

With kindly appreciation for the sympathy shown by thee towards the conscientious objectors, [Signed] Wm. B. HARVEY, Clerk.

In response to the above, a courteous reply was received from the Chief Clerk of the War Department, as follows:

JANUARY 10, 1918.

DEAR MR. HARVEY:—

The Secretary has received your letter of the 8th, and is looking forward to the benefit of the advice and counsel of representative members of the Society of Friends with reference to the permanent policy to be adopted as to men called into the service who have conscientious objections to war.

[Signed] Faithfully yours, F. P. KEPPEL.

As a result of this correspondence the subjoined letter was sent to the Secretary of War having met the approval of the Representative Meeting.

TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR, NEWTON D. BAKER, Washington, D. C.
ESTEEMED FRIEND:—

We acknowledge with gratitude the opportunity granted us to suggest forms of non-combatant service for drafted men whose conscientious convictions forbid their participation in war.

For those whose consciences permit them to accept alternative services, we suggest the following:

- A—Agriculture.
- B—Reclamation work. Forestry or other departments.
- C—Post office; carriers, or office work according to physical or mental aptitude.
- D—Education.
- E—Hospital Service (non-military).
- F—Reconstruction work in France or other devastated areas under the Civil Arm of the American Red Cross.

All the above to be placed under the Civil Department of the Federal Government, and we would suggest the assignment to such service should be entrusted to a Commission to be appointed by the President, composed of men of broad and understanding sympathies.

If desired, we are ready to suggest one or more men of ability for this important work who will serve without remuneration.

Please accept this expression of our cordial appreciation of thy efforts to secure for the Conscientious Objectors, service which they can render.

We are sincerely thy friends,

By direction of the Representative Meeting of Friends,
WILLIAM B. HARVEY, Clerk.

It was felt that, in recognition of the importance of the President's address to Congress on the 8th inst. that some word from our Religious Society should be sent to him, and that promptness of action was essential: the exemption committee assumed the responsibility of forwarding by wire as a night letter the following communication:

FIRST MONTH 11, 1918.

TO WOODROW WILSON, President of the United States:

The Society of Friends of Philadelphia expresses its sense of obligation to President Woodrow Wilson for his address to Congress on the 8th inst. Without expressing judgment of the specific re-adjustments growing out of the present war, we feel that the general program of democracy laid down in the address will, if adopted by the nations, lead to a settled and ordered world peace.

"Open covenants of peace, free navigation of the seas, the removal of economic barriers and the establishment of equality of international trade conditions, adequate guarantee for the reduction of national armaments, free open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims" based on the rights of the peoples concerned, even though they be weak and defenseless—these are golden links in a chain of peace that most ultimately unite all nations in a bond of true brotherhood and humanity.

We hope that through thy continued efforts the day may speedily arise when nations as well as individuals may live in the virtue of that spirit that does away with the occasion of all war.

On behalf of the Representative Meeting of Friends,

ISAAC SHARPLESS, ALEXANDER C. WOOD,
EDWARD G. RHOADS, M. D., Wm. B. HARVEY, Clerk.

An appreciative reply was duly received as follows:

WHITE HOUSE, Washington, January 12, 1918.

DEAR SIR:—

The President asks me to convey to you and to everyone concerned an expression of his warm thanks for your kind telegram of the eleventh of January, and an assurance that he deeply appreciates your generous words of approbation. Sincerely yours, RUDOLPH FOISTER.

Executive Clerk.

The Representative Meeting adopted this action as its own.

NOTICES.

THE Thomas Wistar Brown Graduate School of Haverford College announces a course of Lectures on Conditions after the War.

Friends' Lecture School, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, has offered its Lecture Room for the purpose.

The following are arranged:—

First Month 25, 1918—Dr. John Haynes Holmes (of the Church of the Messiah, New York)—"The Message of the Church After the War."

Other Lectures may follow. Admission is free and all are invited. Lectures begin at 8 o'clock.

MEETINGS from First Month 27th to Second Month 2nd:—

Gwynedd Monthly Meeting, at Norristown, First-day, First Month 27th, at 10.30 A. M.

Chester, at Media, Second-day, First Month 28th, at 7.30 P. M.

Concord, at Concordville, Third-day, First Month 29th, at 9.30 A. M.

Woodbury, Third-day, First Month 29th, at 8 P. M.

Abington, at Abington, Fourth-day, First Month 30th, at 10.15 A. M.

Birmingham, at West Chester, Fourth-day, First Month 30th, at 10 A. M.

Salem, Fourth-day, First Month 30th, at 10 A. M.

Goshen, at Malvern, Fifth-day, First Month 31st, at 10 A. M.

Lansdowne, Fifth-day, First Month 31st, at 7.15 P. M.

DIED.—Eleventh Month 30, 1917, at his home, near Ackworth, Iowa, WILLIAM A. MOFFITT, in the eighty-first year of his age; a member of Bear Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa.

FOUNDED 1865.

THE PROVIDENT
LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY
OF PHILADELPHIA

Have you thought of the need of additional Life Insurance to cover Inheritance Taxes?

Write for Information

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER

S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.
COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: 1 LOCUST 241
2 RACE 661

WISSAHICKON INN
REDLANDS,
CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM
PARK PLACE
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
1714 SANSOM STREET

Engraving and Printing
FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY
Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting Cards. Die Stamped Writing Paper
TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET
PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUÉ and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The 'Teen Age in the First-day School.'" A course given by W. Edward Rafferty, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of "The Survey," New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Solicited

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1859. BELL PHONE.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building
Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

A COMPLETE LINE
OF
NURSERY STOCK

FRUIT TREES,
ORNAMENTAL TREES,
SHRUBS,
SMALL FRUITS,
ROSES,
CLEMATIS,
HEDGE PLANTS.

The Rakestraw-Pyle Company
KENNETT SQUARE, PA.

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States
Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50
1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL PHONE ESTABLISHED 1880

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

FOR RENT IN SMALL ADULT FAMILY—TWO well-furnished rooms on second floor to one or two persons employed during the day. House with porch is pleasantly located near 11th St. and Lehigh Ave.; convenient to trains and trolley.

Address "B"—Office of "THE FRIEND."
SMALL HOUSE WANTED IN SUBURB OF PHILADELPHIA (Rural preferred); near School and Friends' Meeting; with good train or trolley service.

Care of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—ANY FRIENDS' BOOKS OR WRITINGS, or any reading matter pertaining to The Society of Friends, which any Friends can spare or send to help make a collection of. Highly appreciated and exchange paid.
Send to JEREMIAH C. ALLEN,
Boykins, Va.

FOR RENT—NEXT SUMMER AT A MODERATE price, our home in Westbury, B. I.; 14 rooms, all modern conveniences; situated on the bank of a tide-water river, 20 minutes to the ocean by trolley or automobile.
HARVEY C. PERRY,
Westbury, R. I.

TANNATE
ROUND
BELTING

Has The Grip That Stops the Slip

It is tough.

It saves break-downs.

It reduces repairs, idle wages and overhead charges.

Its grip and flexibility favor easy drives and save take-ups.

Sizes $\frac{1}{8}$ " to $\frac{3}{4}$ " in diameter.

The larger sizes made in two or more plies securely joined.

Prove its advantages by a parcel post order.

J. E. RHOADS & SONS

PHILADELPHIA: 12 N. THIRD ST.
NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.
BALTIMORE AGENCY: 37 S. CHARLES ST
FACTORY and TANNERY: WILMINGTON, DEL.

Assoc. M. Am. Soc. C. E.

Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. :: PHILA.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

We recommend the use of
RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2048X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

Five Opportunities in
Public Utility Bonds

Public Utilities stand third in the coal priority order of the Fuel Administrator

PUBLIC UTILITIES are a powerful factor, both directly and indirectly, in the prosecution of the war.

Their efficiency and prosperity are indispensable to communities at all times. They are the arteries which feed our every-day development.

There are five public utility bond issues of unusual attractiveness, yielding from 6.00% to 6.83%, to which we invite your special attention.

Send for Circular PF-51

The National City
Company

National City Bank Bldg., New York
1421 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

"THE DAY OF OUR VISITATION."

The Swarthmore Lecture for 1917. By William Littlejohn
Cloth, 55 Cents, Postpaid; Paper, 30 Cents, Prepaid.
Lecture, delivered at Devonshire House, Bishopsgate, on May 24th, at the opening of the Friends' Yearly Meeting.

"THE QUEST FOR TRUTH."

By Silvanus P. Thompson, F. R. S.

This book, by the late Silvanus P. Thompson, was first published as the Swarthmore Lecture of 1915. It quickly ran out of print, and in response to many requests a New Edition has been prepared.

FOR SALE BY

Friends' Book and Tract Committee
144 East Twentieth Street - NEW YORK CITY

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS,
1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.

Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 31, 1918.

No. 31.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVID H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 DAVID H. FORSYTHE,
 MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"Christ has set limits to the authority even of democracies over conscience, and democracies ignore those limits at the cost of liberty and of Christian faith. I conceive I serve both my country and democracy when I display an active sympathy with conscientious objectors, and so deny the pernicious doctrine of the absolute moral supremacy of the State."

—Herbert G. Wood, Warden of Woodbrooke.

WEAK THINGS vs. STRONG.

There are those who find themselves in some mental difficulty because the Scriptures of the Old Testament evidently represent God as a participant in battles and the ally of "the chosen people" in military undertakings. We have been told by an accurate historical authority that a member of the Society of Friends many years ago lost her right of membership because she stoutly maintained that this was a misunderstanding of Scripture, that the chosen people believed that they were guided in war, but that a careful analysis of the record would show that they did not have indubitable evidence of it. Undoubtedly narrow nationalistic conceptions of religion and of God colored much ancient narrative, but one does not have to go the lengths of condemning the records as unreliable or the actors in it as deceived to perceive that a spiritual element was the dominant one, and that even in the confusion of those disordered times God had chosen "things that the world regards as destitute of influence, in order to put its powerful things to shame." (Weymouth 1 Cor. i. 27) Thus something much more than physical force was revealed when the walls of Jericho fell down, when the Assyrian was laid low, when the Egyptians were lost in the midst of the sea. The record in these cases and in many others is undoubtedly one of God's working. He works in the same way still, and what is best of all He waits patiently upon us till our faith can grow to see Him thus work. Do we help or hinder this growth?

The question of weak things against the strong thus opens almost bewildering vistas (bewildering certainly to the natural sense) into the realm of imminent realities. One does not have to seek for them in Hebrew history. The battles of our daily lives are fought out on this plain. We win if we win at all, not because we are strong, but because He gives us of His strength. The strength of our lives is rejected—our wealth, our intellectual ability, our position, all succumb before the tenderness of loving understanding sympathy which is born "from above."

The times call upon us to make one very practical application of this great spiritual law. We are bowed, all of us, under the weight of the world's unutterable woe. What part in resolving this can our weak aspirations have? Do our prayers avail at all? Shall we make the effort day by day and times without number in the night season to find access to the Throne of Grace for our feeble petitions? Can we believe God has chosen even our weak offerings to confound the mighty? We have no hesitation in urging the conviction that this great miracle waits in measure upon our lack of faith. So we welcome the following articles. They have come to hand as a somewhat remarkable confirmation of the exercise of the moment.

J. H. B.

"THE NEED OF THE GOSPEL."

[In line with the most earnest Christian thought of the present time are the following paragraphs from the pen of Frederick Lynch. If for the term, "a new Gospel," we read "a new preaching of the good old gospel," we shall be reiterating the claim of the early Friends in regard to their ministry, and shall probably not be misconstruing the words of our author. Likewise the "enlarged and widened Gospel" doubtless means an enlarged understanding of the gospel and a wider application of its principles.—EDS.]

We think that if there is any one thing the great war is teaching us, it is the utter insufficiency of these things* to hold men's passions in leash, or to establish that brotherhood for which the weary world waits. They not only lack power to establish that kingdom of righteousness, justice and beauty which Jesus longed for, but they have failed even to make the world a decent or safe place in which to live. There is only one thing big enough to work these miracles and transform the world, and that is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is time to give that Gospel a real chance. These other things having failed, let us now give this Gospel a trial. But it must be a larger Gospel than we have hitherto preached. The world will be a new world after this war is over, and we must give it a new Gospel. Men will need the Gospel they have always heard—the Fatherhood of God, Christ's revelation of that Fatherhood, the grace of God for every soul, the forgiveness of sin through Christ, and Christ the way of approach of the soul to God. But with all this there must be more.

*[The first part of the chapter from which this selection is made reviews briefly the progress of science, education, culture and economic reform within the past fifty years,—showing each to have been put forward by its particular "prophets" as the remedy for all ills, and each in turn to have been a failure so far as moral transformation is concerned.]

There must be emphasis now on the teachings of Jesus. Christ must not only be believed in, but we must believe Him. Not only must we trust in Him for individual redemption, but we must live toward men as He lived. Not only must we accept Him as our individual Saviour, but we must believe that the Sermon on the Mount was given to be a law unto the Christian. Not only must we accept His Gospel on the soul's relationship to God, but also on man's relationship to man.

The so-called "hard sayings" of Jesus must be much more emphasized in the preaching of the future. Either Jesus meant what He said when He taught "Love your enemies," "Forgive the enemy," "By this shall all men know ye are my disciples, that ye have love one toward another," and meant them for the only law of life, or He did not. But they are the core of His Gospel, and if we are to call ourselves Christians we must preach them and practise them.

Finally, the Gospel must be so widened as to include nations as well as individuals. We have preached "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not hate," "Thou shalt not settle thy disputes by brute force," "Thou shalt love thy neighbor," "He is greatest among you who serves others," for the law of the Christian. We have never preached it as the law of the nation. Hereafter it should be preached from every pulpit with the same emphasis that the Gospel for individual relationships receives.

The world needs the Gospel if it is to be saved—this new, enlarged Gospel. Happy that young man who, having caught this prophetic vision, is called upon to be its preacher.—From The Challenge: The Church and the New World Order.

"READY."

[One of our regular correspondents has made the following contribution, which seems to us most timely. She asks that her name shall be withheld.—Eds.]

Our generals say: "One million, five hundred thousand young men for France in 1918." Ready! In every way "fit." Passing all necessary tests. Quietly willing to give all, even to the end, to wipe out a fearful wrong and terrible warfare. Is there no more that can be done? No other effective power to invoke in the assurance that help will be given? In the last century during the Civil War, President Lincoln, in the third year of this struggle, when a dark cloud overhung the country and victory seemed almost doubtful, turned, in his perplexity over the threatened dismemberment of the land, a parting of a mighty nation and the bondage of four million souls, to the best source of aid that he knew. He issued the following proclamation:—

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, the Senate of the United States, devoutly recognizing the supreme authority and just government of Almighty God in all the affairs of men and nations, has by a resolution requested the President to designate and set apart a day for National prayer and humiliation, and

Whereas, it is the duty of men as well as nations to own their dependence upon the over-ruling power of God, to confess their sins and transgressions in humble sorrow, yet with assured hope that genuine repentance will lead to mercy and pardon, and to recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history, that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord.

And inasmuch as we know that by His Divine law, nations, like individuals, are subjected to punishments and chastisements, in this world, may we not justly fear that the awful calamity of Civil War which now desolates the land, is but a punishment inflicted upon us for our presumptuous sins, to the needful end of our national reformation, as a whole people?

We have been the recipients of the choicest bounties of Heaven, we have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity, we have grown in numbers, wealth, and power, as no other nation has ever grown. But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved in peace, and multiplied, and enriched, and strengthened us, and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us.

It behooves us, then, to humble ourselves before the offended Power, to confess our National sins, and to pray for clemency and forgiveness. All this being done in sincerity and truth, let us then humbly rest in the hope authorized by the Divine teachings, that the united cry of the nation will be heard on High, and answered with blessings, no less than pardon, for our National sins, and the restoration of our now divided and suffering country to its former happy condition of unity and peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Washington, March 30, 1863.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

He emphatically believed "in the forgiveness of sins." Yet he knew forgiveness is no light matter, but one necessitating the whole strength of the mighty people on whom he called. May we quote from a well-known Scotch speaker, his suggestions as to Christ's view on this point? When a paralytic was brought to Jesus for healing, the first thing He said was, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee." His enemies, watching, said, "Precisely, He cannot cure and just says, 'Cheer up.' That is a cheap thing to say." Jesus, knowing what was passing in their minds, said, "Do you think it is easy to forgive a man his sins? Easy to forgive Sin? It was as if He could not get their point of view.—"If you suppose," he added, "that it is easier to say, 'Thy sins are forgiven,' than, for example, to help that man in his disease—He turned to the man and said, 'Will you take up that bed, please, and just go out of the room.' The man lifted the little mattress, and walked out in health and strength." Physical healing seemed nothing compared to the cleansing of the soul. Will we, as a nation, prostrate ourselves before God, imploring forgiveness and the removal of the curse lying upon us? Believing, as Lincoln did? Much is said about the sacrifice of life, ensuring men forgiveness of sins and future Peace, and who can say it may not? Others feel differently. All are pondering, as these words from a soldier returning to the trenches, show:—"You may take it from me, we men have been doing more thinking about God up there, in the last six months, than we did before in all our lives." A brief poem from The Spectator expresses the rest. The words are put into the lips of a soldier—the verse is entitled "Christ in Flanders." He speaks first of home life, perhaps.

"We had forgotten You, or very nearly.

You did not seem to touch us very nearly—

Of course we thought about You now and then,
Especially in any time of trouble—

We knew that You were good in time of trouble,
But we are very ordinary Men.

This hideous warfare seems to make things clearer,
We never thought about You much in England—

But now that we are far away from England
We have no doubts—we know that You are here."

Then, and I think he felt that that he could offer was still inadequate, he adds this prayer:

"And so we ask for courage, strength, and pardon—

Especially I think we ask for pardon—

And that You'll stand beside us to the last."

*Perry J. Stackhouse, in "The Sword of Christ and the World War."

EDUCATION AFTER THE WAR.

WILLIAM V. DENNIS.

That education will receive a new impetus, as one of the results of the present world war, was the conclusion of Professor John Dewey, of Columbia University, which he voiced in a lecture at Friends' Select School on the 18th inst. He finds ample basis for his hope in the history of modern Europe. Germany, after the Napoleonic wars, set about very extensive reforms in education, laying the foundations of the comprehensive system which to-day extends to all of her people. In 1870, the French, though defeated, and asserting that the German schoolmaster had been the cause of their defeat, undertook the re-adjustment of their educational scheme, which widened the scope and greatly increased the effectiveness of education in France. England, the only one of the important nations in which similar effects of great wars are not immediately apparent, has, nevertheless, been positively influenced though in less degree. The slow progress of educational reform in England has been due to the fear that the various religious interests would be adversely affected. It is very significant, however, that in the face of almost overwhelming financial burdens occasioned by the war, the educational budget for 1918 is by many millions greater than any previous budget.

All of these educational movements in the various countries had nationalistic aims; the purpose of each was to make the nation strong, in order successfully to combat other nations. The very narrow national aim of Germany, in all phases of education, is a striking case in point. The explanation of this trend in education is found in the fact that we have been living in an intensely nationalistic period, which began with the passing of feudalism and continued to the present. As a fundamental part of merely national policy there developed the negative ideas of actual or potential hostility to neighbor nations. In America, we have been more free than others from this negative aspect, partly because of our isolation, partly because, untroubled by the problems confronting the European nations, we have been afforded opportunity for the growth of a broader conception.

The new movement in education following the present war, Dr. Dewey confidently hopes, will aim to develop the international mind. The first justification for this hope lies in the closer co-operation between groups of nations which has already been accomplished; for the first time in its history, the world has become socially and politically round. Diverse interests and remote peoples are to-day leagued together. Much of this co-operation will remain. Again, the highest intellectuality of all nations is combined to aid in the prosecution of this war. Leaders in all branches of science are bending their energies toward the purposes of destruction. But after the war, these great minds will, of necessity, be directed toward more positive uses; otherwise man will remain a slave to the gigantic machinery he has created. The science of machines has gone far ahead of our organization and science of humane ideas. The new education will seek to make the most of human nature, as for two centuries we have made the most of physical nature.

We must socialize our education. The old scheme of recitation in the class-room was on a very unsocial basis; it was individualistic. The pupils neither gave to nor received from one another anything of value. The teaching of history and geography, for example, must be modified in spirit and in method, to show the interdependence of peoples, and the closeness of the ties that actually exist to bind them together. We Americans are already, to a great extent, an international people, an inter-racial people. The various elements of our population, coming from countries where they were either actual or potential enemies, have learned what it is to live at peace with one another. Our new teaching must add all of the facts and ideas that have to do with the reorganization of the world for peace. It must show how, through time, larger and larger units have replaced the smaller, and that now we can build up a still greater union of peoples.

JOHN BRIGHT AT FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.

Reminiscences of John Bright's days at Penketh School in 1821-22, when he was ten years old, appear in print for the first time in the Penketh School Magazine, autumn term, in course of the fifth article by J. Spence Hodgson on the rise of Penketh Preparative Meeting. The recollections of three of his schools—Penketh, Ackworth and York—were written by John Bright in 1879 for the benefit of his children. He lodged with a neighboring farmer, John Davies, "a very kind man, rather stout in figure, and a good specimen of a farmer. His wife, too, was kind, and we had a very comfortable home. Behind the house was a good garden, an orchard, and a vineyard, where grapes were abundant. Beyond the garden were corn-fields."

"We had Scripture reading in the family," wrote John Bright, "and I remember how I found a place for some of the New Testament narratives, on or about the premises of our kind friend and host. Among them I particularly remember the vineyard mentioned in Luke, which I pictured as just like our vineyard, also I fancied I could see the discontented brother of the Prodigal Son, in the fifteenth chapter, returning home from the field down the short lane which led from the house to the neighboring cornfield. These imaginations of my boyhood have remained with me ever since." John Bright spoke of his enjoyment of fishing in a brook near by: "Not with rod, line, and nets; but we diverted the stream just above a pool frequented by the small trout, and then we ladled the water from the pool and took the fishes, 'the little quivering things,' we found in it." An illustration of John Davies' farmhouse, and a portrait of the schoolmaster, Joseph Edmondson ("not well qualified for his office") appear as frontispiece.—From The Friend (London).

ENGLISH TEACHERS WHO ARE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS TO WAR.*

Lord Charnwood (Liberal) moved that the extension in any way of the indulgence now shown to conscientious objectors would be unjustifiable unless accompanied by their deportation from this country for so long as they refused to obey its laws and that no person who had applied for exemption (conditional or total) from military service on the ground of conscientious objection ought to be permitted to teach in any school or college supported or assisted by public funds. He invited the House to say plainly that the indulgence now given to men who would not fight for their country went as far as policy or justice would allow. He objected to concessions being made to objectors because of their superior education. It was a measure of justice and protection due to the children that we should prevent these men from teaching in schools.

The Marquis of Crewe (Liberal) did not think the term "indulgence" could appropriately be applied to our treatment of conscientious objectors. They were not receiving anything that could be called indulgence either from the state or their own acquaintances, and they were likely to remain thoroughly unpopular for the remainder of their lives. With regard to the "rather unusual remedy of deportation," that was a practice unknown to British law. The resolution in so far as it related to teachers was far too widely drawn, and he did not think any local authority in the country would accept it. It would be impossible to dismiss some conscientious objectors, Quakers and others, who had done good work, some of it military work. There were many people whose views unfitted them to teach the rights and duties of citizenship, but who could teach multiplication tables without corrupting the minds of the children. He hoped that local authorities would take the view that while there were a number of people who ought not to be included in the teaching profession, there were others whom it would be impossible without unfairness to dismiss from the service.

*Report of a session of the House of Lords from the Manchester Guardian.

Lord Ribblesdale (Liberal) found it was difficult to enter into the mind of the conscientious objector, but he thought the government would have very great difficulty in carrying out the recent decision to disfranchise conscientious objectors. Viewing the matter in its larger aspect, he declared that he would be very sorry if by a side wind of this sort anything was done to spoil the record of this country, which gave every latitude to free opinion. We allowed people to hold peculiar opinions which might be very unpopular, but for the sake of the very small fraction of people in question it would be a great mistake to spoil the record we now hold.

Lord Parmoor (Unionist) said the only form of deportation he knew of was that applied to people engaged in the "white slave traffic." A man who applied for exemption on the ground of conscience was only doing what the law said he had a right to do.

Lord Courtney of Penwith (Liberal) repudiated totally any suggestion that in this matter he was influenced by motives of personal relationship with those who had suffered. It was true he was connected with one of the sufferers who himself accepted and submitted, and in fact the difficulty in liberating him felt by those in control of this business was that he would not be liberated except on conditions which applied to the liberation of others. It was to be regretted this question had been reopened, but he wished to make plain what he thought the mover of the resolution had not understood. In one of his great speeches in the country John Bright quoted the couplet of the Puritan poet—

There is on earth a yet auguster thing,
Veiled though it be, than Parliament or King.

That thing was the conscience of man. In the days of George Wither they spoke of "Parliament and King" as some people now spoke of the state as supreme in every action and thought of the citizen.

"I thank God," said Lord Courtney, "there are citizens who refuse that kind of servitude." It had been said in the House of Commons, "We are Christians before and above being citizens." We also were human beings before and beyond being citizens, and even those who did not appeal to the doctrine of Christ might still appeal to sanctions that removed them from the scope of the condemnation of the noble lord. It was now universally recognized that the state had no right whatever to control the religious opinion of the individual, or the expression of that opinion. That was an illustration of the weakness of the noble lord's remedy, and also an illustration bearing upon what was now universally acknowledged to be a sphere of action over which the state, with all its authority, had no control.

He himself was not one who recognized the possibility of doing away with all war, and was not of the creed of the conscientious objector. He could tolerate many things. But he did at least apprehend the position of those martyrs—for they were no less—who first in one domain of thought and then in another, went on extending the liberty of the human soul, and leading up to a higher development and a higher civilization than we petty wanderers on the plain ever thought of. It was not pusillanimity of soul, not desire to avoid trouble, not love of ease that stirred the best of these men. The motive which stirred them was a belief that war, like slavery, was an evil to be abolished, and must be abolished, if we were to redeem humanity from a frightful curse; and they would have nothing to do with the organization that upheld and enforced war. They were as courageous as the men in the trenches—he was speaking of the sincere men.

The government admitted by the exceptions made in the Act that there were sincere men holding these opinions. It had been recognized for generations in different countries. It was necessary, he submitted, in order to deal with the problem intelligently and successfully, to try to understand the frame of mind and the belief of the men whom the noble lord had characterized in language which he would live to think was very ill-chosen.

Lord Gainford (Liberal) said that any attempt by the state at interference with the liberty of thought, political or religious, of teachers and to prevent individuals from qualifying for the post of elementary schoolmaster would bring up against the government the organized teachers of the country. Resolutions such as this were more likely to attract sympathy than opposition to conscientious objectors.

Lord Sandhurst (Lord Chamberlain), speaking on behalf of the government, said that there was no power to deport British subjects, and he was not sure whether they would find any other country willing to receive these people. Besides, there was the difficulty of shipping, so that the proposal as to deportation was not practicable. As to the second part of the resolution, there was no body of men who had shown themselves more ready to assist the country than the vast body of teachers. Teachers who objected to actual fighting had filled posts in the front-line ambulances or had volunteered for mine-sweeping and he hoped the resolution would be withdrawn.

Lord Lambourne (Unionist) declared that, excluding Quakers, out of every hundred so-called objectors fifty were cowards, thirty were cranks and twenty were honest men.

The Earl of Derby (Secretary for War) assured the House that the promise given recently by the Leader of the House (Earl Curzon) to discuss with the Home Secretary and himself the conditions under which certain conscientious objectors were suffering in health, with the object of seeing if some relaxation of prison rules could be made, would be carried out, and the result would be announced to the House.

The resolution was withdrawn. The House rose at 6.20.
—Reprinted from "School and Society" of First Month 12th, at the suggestion of ISAAC SHARPLESS.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

New times demand new measures and new men;
The world advances and in time outgrows
The laws that in our father's day were best;
And, doubtless, after us some purer scheme
Will be shaped out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.

—J. R. LOWELL.

THE PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.—It is surprising how many people are now asking what has really happened at Washington regarding the prohibition of the liquor traffic. Of course, the citizens of Maine and Kansas, and twenty-six or more other States that long ago ceased to sneer or get angry at mention of the word prohibition, will need no instruction on this point. They took the word into the family and learned to love it. But in States like Pennsylvania and New Jersey, where a great many people have refused to recognize its meaning and value, prohibition may still need an explanation and endorsement.

Let us be prepared to introduce it with grace and propriety. Ever since the rise of the Prohibition Party in the eighties, the number of people in America who believe that the suppression of the liquor traffic would be a blessing to the nation has increased steadily. For a time they seemed disposed to unite in one political party, but later effected an organization that has been very successful by being omni-partisan. As State after State has outlawed the liquor traffic in its own borders and the Federal Government has yielded slowly to the pressure of a growing sentiment sustained by justice, the demand has become more and more pronounced for a uniform law for the whole country.

Accordingly, appeals have been made to Congress to enact prohibition by statute or else to submit to the States a proposition to amend the Federal Constitution in such a manner as to satisfy this demand. The latter policy has been followed, and both Houses of Congress have now concurred in submitting to the States for acceptance or rejection an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Resolution, as it is called, proposes the following:—

Article —. Section 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

And further:—

Section 3. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Before this proposition could go to the States individually for action it must, in accordance with the law governing such matters, receive the support of two-thirds of the members of both branches of Congress. In this case the Senate was the first to act upon the Resolution. It was passed early in Eighth Month last by a vote of 65 to 20, which was eight more than actually required.

The House did not vote on the Resolution until the seventeenth of last month, when 282 were recorded as favoring the measure and 128 against. This was eight more than the necessary two-thirds. This being not the enactment of a law, but merely the submission of a proposal, the signature of the President of the United States is not required. The amendment is now before the States, a majority in the Legislature, being the condition essential to its endorsement. Seven years are allowed for the final decision. If, at the expiration of that time or prior thereto three-fourths of the States or more (the number of States at present is forty-eight) shall have approved the amendment it will become a part of the Constitution of the United States and will be binding upon all the States alike. The Legislatures of Mississippi, Virginia and Kentucky already have adopted the measure, and other States will do likewise as their Legislatures come in session. Some States may reject the bill at first, and later elect a Legislature that is favorable and reverse the previous decision. This may work either way, but the tendency is steadily forward and not backward. We have good reason to expect that the President to be elected in 1924 will represent the united sentiment of America in completing the work of suppressing the liquor traffic in our country. If Pennsylvania and New Jersey were ready we might have a saloonless nation in 1920. Reader, there is work to do. Find thy part, and rest not until it has been done.

THE VOTE IN CONGRESS was interesting in many particulars. It was evenly balanced between Democrats and Republicans. Twenty-one States voted solidly for it, both the Senators and all the Representatives in each.

Twenty-four States recorded no vote against it. Thirty-six States gave it a majority. The vote was neither partisan nor sectional. It was neither bought nor coerced. It was, in so far at least as the expression of the affirmative is concerned, the voice of honest conviction with the welfare of the whole nation at heart.

THE QUESTION OF COMPENSATION.—The great outcry of the liquor men is now that prohibition is "confiscation without compensation," and that, because the Government accepts revenue from liquor, the owners should be compensated if the business is destroyed. But license is partial prohibition, in that it prohibits the great bulk of the people from selling liquor, and thus logically concedes the right of entire prohibition. The sale of diseased meat is prohibited without compensation; intoxicating liquors are poisoned drinks, by the testimony of science and experience. They have little value as food or medicine, and are to be classed as habit-forming drugs. No private property right is superior to the right of the community to protect itself. The United States Supreme Court has declared, "There is no inherent right in the citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail; it is not a privilege of a citizen of the State or of a citizen of the United States."

The progress of science and invention, as well as moral progress, has destroyed some lines of business and outlawed others, without compensation.

The advent of railroads destroyed coach lines, without compensation. Some years ago the United States prohibited the importation of rags from Egypt for fear of cholera infection. Lotteries were formerly authorized by law, but were outlawed State by State. They netted their managers millions of dollars, but were finally outlawed, without compensation. Their last refuge was in Louisiana, where the State got $40,000 a year for license.

Slaves representing many millions of dollars were set free as a war measure, without compensation.

For the protection of the people the worse than waste of grain and other food in the making of liquors should be prohibited.—DUNCAN C. MILNER.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

ABRAHAM'S OAK.

(Continued from page 389.)

"Hast thou had a happy time, my little one?"

"Oh, yes, father. Thank thee so much for bringing me. I like Abie Prier to play with—only it was not play—it was real work, picking up the acorns for the winter. And isn't it grand to have a big oak of his own? The acorns are twice as large as those in the meadow. Abie has a young oak tree as tall as himself from an acorn from it which he planted in the garden when he was a little boy."

"When he was little! What is he now, then?" said the father, laughing.

"He is ten and a half," said eight-year-old Mary, impressively.

"I am glad to hear that he has a sapling, for, Mary, these are the last acorns that fine oak will grow. Friend Prier is obliged to sell it, and it will be cut down in the Spring."

"Oh, poor Abie! He will be so sorry. Why must they sell it, father?"

"There is some money owing to his sisters and brother that the honest man must pay. I think he is right, but they will miss the oak."

"I shall miss it when we go there. Abie has a swing on it, and has made a little farmyard round the roots—oh, it does seem too bad that the oak must be killed"—and the little voice became quite doleful.

"Well, we will keep it to make furniture of. How would thee like a nice box for thy clothes, with 'M. D.' in brass nails?" said the father, cheerily.

"Oh, I should like that! Mother said I shall have a box, with a lock and key, when I am twelve, for my very own."

"Well, that is about the time the oak timber will be seasoned for use. It is a long while for a little maiden to wait, but we won't forget that thy box is to be made from the planks of Abraham's oak."

They jogged on in silence for a mile or more, and then the little voice from behind the broad back began diffidently.

"Father, dear, it is Abie's oak, not mine. Ought not he to have the box instead of me? When he is a man he would like to see it, and to remember what a fine oak he used to have."

"Well, well, perhaps we shall manage to spare planks for two boxes when the time comes," said John Deane, indulgently, as he turned his horse's head towards the Carfax, as the central square of Horsham is still called, and where yet may be seen the stocks and bull ring—relics of the bad old times of cruelty to man and beast, against which John Deane and other Friends protested in vain.

It was a blow to Abraham when he was told that his oak must be felled, but he was a sage little man, and quite understood his father's explanations that his uncle and aunts must have their patrimony.

His Uncle Edward, visiting them from Dorking at the right season, took pains to move the sapling very carefully from the garden, where already it unduly shaded Nancy's herb bed. It was planted in the paddock near the mother tree, and strongly fenced to protect it from cattle, and the interest of watching the growth of the young oak was some consolation for the loss of the old.

It was but natural that when John Deane's men came to fell the trees that Nancy should keep her boy safely by his father's bedside. The invalid noted the six crashes, as the great trees fell, and when the price was paid, which settled all family claims, and quite a nice sum remained for Nancy, he felt he had no more care left in this world. When the Fifth Month came he peacefully passed away, and the weary frame was laid in the green graveyard at Ilfeld Meeting-house. Thither, after her busy week's work, Nancy loved to go on First-days, riding on a pillion behind her little son, whose legs were short for grey Dobbin's broad back.

Seated in the grey stone-built Meeting-house, and surrounded by other simple, devout souls, she found true consolation in her loneliness, and much neighborly kindness from the group of Friends who had appreciated John Prier's sterling character.

After meeting she would always slip into the graveyard, while Abie brought out the horse and waited for her by the stone mounting block.

One day she was followed by Susannah Martin, the motherly minister, to whom all Ilfeld Meeting turned for help in times of need. She laid her hand on the bowed shoulders of the young widow. "Thy dear one is not here, Nancy," she said, tenderly, "not here, but risen, as was said of his Divine Master. Thou must think of him as satisfied, having awaked with His likeness."

"I do, I do, Friend Martin," sobbed Nancy; "but I do miss him so. He was so wise-like, and up to the last would give me counsel about every little thing. Then there is Abie—he is such a bright lad, and I such a poor scholar. I am afraid he will forget what his father taught him."

"Dost thou encourage him to keep up his reading?"

"Oh, yes. He reads a chapter in the Bible to me and the servants every night after supper, and more on First-days. But often 'tis all about battles and slaughter, and last night about 'wheels full of eyes,' that neither I, nor Seth and Gainer could make head or tail of."

Susannah Martin smiled—she had little grandsons of her own. "I must put some marks in Friend Abraham's Bible," she said. "Meanwhile, tell him to read to thee in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. They tell what we poor mortals are ever needing to hear."

During this chat Abie was sitting on the horse block enjoying the weekly treat which never failed to come out of Susannah Martin's basket—an apple turnover, a couple of big pears grown against the walls of Hunts Green, or ficed cakes—and who made such ficed cakes as Friend Martin?—pounded and rolled into quite ethereal lightness and flakiness! Old Benedictus Martin was always ready to wait when his wife had some concern to comfort the sorrowful, and he amused himself with the staid, old-fashioned remarks of the child as to the state of the crops and farming prospects.

When Nancy returned, he began, "Thy son tells me thou wants to get rid of those two brindled steers. I am sending some to Reigate fair on Third-day. Shall I send thine with them?"

"Oh, thank thee; but they are that wild, having been in the lonely forest pasture, that I hardly know how Seth would get them along the high road—like March hares, he says they are."

"Then send that red heifer, Judy, that I saw Abie riding on, for company—she is quiet enough. Abie, thee could help drive the beasts, have thy dinner with us, and ride her home with Seth, though I can't say I envy thee thy nag!" So the matter was settled, and the two pairs of Friends left the Meeting-house in opposite directions.

Years passed by, and one bright autumn day, Abraham, now a tall, strong lad of fifteen, walked into the Carfax at Horsham leading grey Dobbin with well-piled panniers of farm produce. He stopped at the side door of the substantial brick house which stood in front of John Deane's timber yard.

The mistress came out with a kind welcome. "We were particularly wanting to see thee, Abie. Can thee come back to dinner, when Mary will be home from school?"

"Thank thee—yes. I have brought the russet apples and mushroom catchup thee ordered, and here is a little crock of honey, which my mother sent for Mary."

"Did her hives yield well this year?"

"Yes, very well. I have two big crocks of honey in the panniers, which the apothecary ordered, and two sheepskins below, to steady them, which I must take to the tanner's, and I am to get some salt, and a few other things. Then I will come back and put Dobbin up here."

(To be concluded.)

"EMILIE."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

OLAF BAKER.

It was the 9.25 to town. As the train thundered west I looked out at the flying patchwork of the Essex fields—corn, pasture, potatoes, potatoes, pasture, corn. Here and there some ancient church tower or group of gables would lift itself among the trees. We were running through the country of the East Saxons, a country whose sons had made it memorable under the fiery preaching of John Ball. Even now, the boys who had come out from among its elm trees and rolling pasture lands were over there in France, making it memorable again.

As the train gathered speed, and the patchwork became more indefinite I turned again to my reading. It was the reprint of an address delivered to the inmates of a Prisoners of War Camp by a member of the Society of Friends.

"Yes, there are more things in Heaven and Earth than are dreamt of by European State Philosophy, and these unseen powers which have not hitherto been put to the test, may yet mould the thought and life of the nations. There is a vast conflict to be waged in Europe, the need for which is intensified by the War, against disease, and poverty, against ignorance, against hostile social conditions, against all that cramps the life of men and hinders their rising to the full stature of their manhood and womanhood. Gentlemen, this is a conflict we must all wage together. Together we must find the way to build a new and better order of life in this shattered continent."

I glanced at my fellow-passengers. Three out of the five were reading newspapers. The head-lines of the man's next to me read: "Livelihood in Flanders." Whatever the "livelihood" was, his painfully pathetic countenance reflected none of it. Of the two who were not reading, one was a weedy-looking youth who employed his time staring vacantly out of the window. The other in a corner seat further from mine, was a soldier. Taking them altogether they did not inspire one with a feeling that they would provide effectual assistance in the building of that "new and better order of life in this shattered continent."

I returned to my reading.

"In this service and to this end, I venture to think that the Quaker Faith can supply the necessary ideal and inspiration. And so there may arise from the present ruins a City of God in which beauty, devotion, holiness, enthusiasm, love, shall have an abiding inheritance!"

"I beg your pardon, sir, are you reading German?"

The voice was the soldier's in the corner seat. If a bomb had dropped through the roof, the occupants of the carriage could have hardly been more astonished. Moreover, as the print of my pamphlet was set in English type, and not big at that, he must have had the eyes of a lynx.

My fellow-passengers looked up from their papers, regarding me suspiciously. I gathered myself together, expecting a storm; then told the soldier quietly that I was reading German.

"I wish you'd translate wot's on this card, then," he said. "I got it off a dead German on the Somme."

"I don't read German very well," I said, while he searched through his pocketbook for the card. "I'm trying to read a translation."

He handed me a post-card written in so small and crabbed a handwriting that it was impossible for one not extensively acquainted with the language to decipher it. All I could make out was the post-mark and the writer's signature. "Emilie." I told him so.

"There's some writing in print on the back," he said.

I turned the card over, and found a tinted picture of a girl writing a letter, while to the left, as in a vision, was a "Boche," fully accoutred, his rifle in his hand. Across the card ran the words:—

"I think of my distant loved One, if she is good and true to me."

Raising my voice above the roar of the train, I read the little verse out slowly and distinctly. There was a slight pause as I handed the card back. I made no comment; nor did my fellow-passengers. It was the soldier who said, whilst he gazed at the picture which had suddenly acquired an added significance:

"We're all human, after all."

He put the sentimental little card, with its illegible handwriting, back in his pocketbook and proceeded to talk generally about the war.

I returned to my pamphlet and my wrestling with the polysyllabic German substantives. But the thought of that distant Emilie with the dead lover was not polysyllabic. It would not leave me alone.

When the train stopped at Liverpool Street, and the carriage had emptied itself, I followed the soldier and expressed my regret that I had not been able to decipher the card.

"But I was so glad you said that about us all being human," I said.

"They've got to do wot they're told, same as we've," he said. "They can't 'elp it."

Then we said good-bye.

"And so there may arise a City of God in which beauty, devotion, holiness, heroism, enthusiasm, love, shall have an abiding inheritance!"

And since there are more things in Heaven and Earth than are dreamt of by European State Philosophy, is it not possible that Emilie, waiting in some far-away German town for an answer that never comes, may, all unconsciously to herself, have brought a little stone?

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

(Continued from page 387.)

TWELFTH MONTH 11, 1917.

I received the package of caramels and enjoy them very much, especially as our sugar ration is 500 grammes (about one pound) per month, and jam and syrup together only two pounds a week. Until lately we ate up all our jam and syrup for two months in one, and we were a whole month with only an allowance of two teaspoonful a day of sugar and no other sweets except dried figs and raisins. We have but just received our next month's supply of jam and syrup and it has done all of us a lot of good.

Yesterday I went out to glaze some windows for our cook's house. She was not cooking for us then, but has turned up to-day and we hope will work steadily for us for the winter. All the glass was gone and she had taken down the frames. All French windows are casement, opening inward. She had patched up a window with German wire glass and a small single sash, probably German. Well, of course, the first thing I did was to put in the glass, then I tore down her patchwork and hung the sash, but alas! they wouldn't shut—they had been in the weather too long and had warped so they interfered with each other. It was too much like cabinet work for me and I had to call for help, and we were two hours planning and fitting to get them shut. Most of the time we were surrounded by children, counting in English, German and French, and discussing the Xmas party Fred Murray is engineering on some funds given him by a New York lady.

To-day I went back and put up the cook's patchwork window in another room which is not so important to them. After that I have spent the rest of the day—five hours in all—glazing the sash in a soldier's house, which is at present entirely deserted, but whenever he gets leave he comes home to patch it up as he wants his wife to live in it as soon as possible. It is not badly damaged, but needs a good deal of plastering and glazing. Glazing is rather ticklish work, as the glass furnished by the Government is very thin and brittle and is not cut to exact measure but generally is just enough too large to make it necessary to trim the wood as you can hardly cut a thin strip off the glass. Then you dull your chisel on concealed nails. Also the old frames are warped and out of line, which we don't take into account when we measure them. This soldier's house is a poor man's house, the wall being one layer of brick plastered on the inside with mud and straw with a thin coat of lime plaster over that. He is trying to get two rooms in order and let the rest go for the present and I was able to get in six panes of glass before I had to quit at four-thirty on account of darkness. There is only one to do still, however, and I shall probably get it done to-morrow morning.

It was very amusing in walking home from this job to see the strength of French traditions—the Rouze family, about whose home-coming I wrote before, have put up the most horrible looking shanties on the road side of their property, shutting out the view of their house, which was very pretty, so as to make a court-yard for their animals and manure where their front yard ought to be. We have been having a series of visits from the owner of the property we inhabit. When I went around with him he traced for me various outbuildings, now totally gone, and ejaculated, "cbameaux, cochons" a few times, but took his losses and our occupancy philosophically. The next day he was back with some ideas. In the first place, adjoining his orchard is another orchard, both, of course, totally destroyed. The second it appears is the property of a woman now deceased, he says, without relations, and he wants us to cut our firewood from her trees and leave his alone. Then if we will manure his asparagus bed we can have the asparagus.

It has been a bitter day to-day, about forty-five or fifty degrees and damp, with a high wind and very hard to keep warm. Last week we had three days of freezing weather, down to twenty at least, but crisp and clear and delightful in every way. I have had a bath (sponge) every morning in spite of the weather and ice on our water-barrel. I now get up by candlelight, as we are entirely out of kerosene and can't find any around here at all.

Furniture is badly needed by everyone, as well as blankets and clothing, but there is, I think, very little actual destitution in the village. Everyone receives an allowance from the Government—it is only one franc (twenty cents) a day, or thereabouts, but it keeps them from starvation.

I am really very happy with lots of work and not a whole lot of responsibility and we have very good and bountiful food. We buy meat about three times a week, which means that we generally have meat about once a day, which, with vegetables and puddings, makes pretty bountiful food.

TWELFTH MONTH 16, 1917.

I find our washerwoman is absolutely destitute; she owns a stove and is living in one room with two little girls. She has the furniture of a woman prisoner who is in Germany. The room is about ten by fifteen. The stove and the clothes they stand in are all they have, except a small pension as a soldier's widow. They seem well nourished and the mother is a hardworking, honest woman. I have undertaken to provide her with an outfit after talking her case over with the Maire, and last night after she had washed the dishes I had her in my room and with the help of a dictionary we drew up a list of what she ought to have. Thee should have seen the delight of her little girl at the thought of having a separate bed. The three of them are sleeping in one bed now. I have given the list back to her for further suggestions, but it will cost at war prices at least 500 fr. She was very hopeful about the future and hopes to get a decent house to live in. At present, as she owns no house or land, we can't do anything for her in the way of more commodious shelter. I had a very interesting talk with the Maire last night, and his wife showed me pictures of their two sons lost in the war. I tried to tell them the differences between America and France in some particulars—such as steam heat, two or three-story houses and cold winters, and the wife was very curious about American cooking. She would like an American cook book in French. I wonder if the American government publishes such a thing. I think I have heard of one in connection with corn meal. We are making progress with our repairs, although our numbers are being constantly depleted by drafts to other équipes, and the authorities will not issue new carnets for the Americans in Paris at present.

(To be continued.)

J. H. H.

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES

(Continued from page 388.)

Some time after his return home, his mind was drawn in the love of the gospel to several places in Pennsylvania, and two of the adjoining states, which being spread before the Monthly Meeting at Exeter, they granted a certificate, dated Eleventh Month, 1770, leaving him at liberty to perform a religious visit to the meetings of Friends in parts of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. And also in 1781, with the unity of the Monthly Meeting, and having Amos Lee for his companion, he visited meetings in Virginia and Carolina, passing through very great difficulties, as the country was most infested by a lawless, murderous banditti, who, for the sake of plunder, frequently shot down innocent people as they were riding along the roads. When at Camden, in South Carolina, they were taken up as prisoners by the American army. Being kept with the soldiery several days they at length obtained a discharge, as appears by the following extract of a narrative which he sent to his friends, viz.:

"To Friends of Exeter Monthly meeting, Berks County, Pennsylvania,

"DEAR FRIENDS,—I believe it my duty to give you a short account of the reason of my long stay from my family and friends, and why I did not return with my companion, and the reason why my companion left me; as also to give you to understand, that I am afflicted, but not forsaken. When we came to a meeting at Pedee, in the south part of North Carolina, a large American army passed by us into South Carolina, and encamped in the road to a little meeting, not far from Camden. I thought I saw clearly, that it was best for us to follow them, and we gave ourselves up, as prisoners, to the captain of the provost guard. The officers gathered about us. Our horses were taken from us, but our saddles and saddle-bags we had with us in our confinement. Our papers were soon demanded, and read over, and we were closely examined: some of our papers were sent to the head general. They gave us to expect we should have a pass to go home, if we would promise to go; but I could not make such a promise, being bound in spirit to do my endeavours to visit Friends in South Carolina, if not in Georgia. In the time of our confinement, we had the company of several officers, one at a time. They behaved civilly, but were full of talk and foolish imaginations concerning us. Let me never forget my Master's kindness in a time of need: I had talk enough for them all, which they could not gainsay or condemn. At length they concluded, yea, one of them told me, that I was a crafty fellow, chosen by our yearly meeting in Pennsylvania to survey the southern states, to the disadvantage of our country, and for the advancement of the British troops, or words to that effect. We were often pressed to promise to go home, which I as often punctually refused; giving them such reasons for it which they could not answer.

"We gave ourselves up to the captain on sixth-day in the afternoon, and on first-day morning following, about an hour or two before day, there was a great stir in the camp, the officers riding to and fro, ordering the soldiers to make haste and parade ready to march. When our captain had got his men in order, with many prisoners, he honoured us so much as to rank us next to him, and so he marched on with his naked sword in his hand, and we following him. We marched near twenty miles, and then encamped. When we first set out, I was thoughtful how we should get along, for several reasons, if they marched far. We had eaten sparingly the day before, and then had but a little more than one biscuit and a little piece of meat between us both, and had our bags and great coats to carry; and what made it seem more trying, the sand was deep and slavish, and my boots stiff and heavy. The thoughts of these things, for a time, seemed grievous. I began to inquire for my [Divine] Master, and when I found him, I conversed with him as though he was present, and told him as though he knew it not, that I had left my dear wife and all that I had that was near and dear to me for the love I had for Him, and did entreat, that he would not leave me now in a time of trial; and he was pleased to hear me, and with an encouraging language, conveyed to my understanding these words, 'Fear not, my servant, I will be with thee.' The praise of all be given to Him, for he is worthy: he did fulfil his promise to my admiration.

"We marched fast. I ate but little more than half a biscuit that day, and yet could not perceive myself hungry or weary. I found freedom to be cheerful in conversation with the captain and with his men. The officers passing and repassing, generally took notice of us. Some of them asked how we were. I answered as I felt, with as much cheerfulness as I could. We were now encamped in the wilderness under guard, but had liberty to walk out, one at a time. I went out that afternoon, from tent to tent, amongst the officers, making known to them our circumstance, where we desired to go, and what our business was. One of them promised to let us go in the morning. I returned to my companion, laid down by him, but could not sleep, although I had not slept much for several nights. Remarkable it appeared to me, that I should be well and hearty and lively without much food or sleep. My dear friends, search for the reason. I believe it to be the Lord's doings, and it is marvellous in my view."

(To be continued.)

NEWS ITEMS.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING COMES IN REGULAR COURSE ON Third-day, Second Month 5th. The meeting for worship at 10.30 is followed by a luncheon period, after which the business session convenes at 1.30.

The Meeting of Ministers and Elders is at 2.30 on Second-day, the 4th.

The Friend (London) of Twelfth Month 21st has the following welcome announcement:

Stephen Hobhouse has been released from Exeter C. P., where he was serving his third sentence of two years' hard labor. He is at present staying with his wife at Mortchoe, Devon.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTE.—The skating pond, made by the flooding of the playground, which has been such a source of pleasure for some years past, was in use last week. It is expected that it will continue to afford opportunity for enjoyment and exercise as long as the cold weather lasts.

The Cheyney Board was greatly heartened at its meeting on the 15th by a gift of $10,000, subject to a $300 annuity during the life of the donor. The Board decided to arrange for a Summer School this year. This was an act of faith in the present financial situation, but it is hoped Friends and others will support the movement without diminishing their regular subscriptions.

A LITTLE of the activity of Ackworth School is indicated by the following excerpt from notes in The Friend (London):

The girls' debating society enjoyed some good evenings; impromptu speaking brought out some latent talent; one night the society condemned competition among nations. The boys' debating society decided against vivisection, against novel reading, and against a classical education; by a narrow majority they justified reprisals.

As a weekly paper The Friend (London) completed its first quarter of a century a year ago; but as a Quaker organ it is this week (Twelfth Month 28th) three-quarters of a century old. Its first issue, edited by Charles Tylor, was dated First Month, 1843; its last monthly issue, edited by Joseph S. Sewell, was dated Twelfth Month, 1891; and its first weekly issue (Henry Stanley Newman, editor) came out at the beginning of 1892. In the seventy-five years it has been successively in the hands of nine editors.

OUR English Friends have appointed Maeburn Tatham to succeed Leslie Maxwell as officer commanding the Ambulance Unit at Dunkirk. The following statistics will be of interest:

There are now (Twelfth Month 15th) approximately 335 men in the Dunkirk district, 93 on the ambulance convoys and 186 on the ambulance trains, making a total of 614 men in France. There are 232 in the ambulance section in England and 396 in the general service section. The total number of men now in the Unit is 1,242, and from its establishment there have been upwards of 1,650 men in its ranks.

We copy the following note from The Friend (London):

Two books of special interest to Friends were published at the end of last week. L. Violet Hodgkin's "Book of Quaker Saints" (T. N. Foulis), a bulky volume of 548 pages, with a few of Cayley-Robinson's soft and charming sketches illustrating the stories, is one. In the present days of paper difficulties, from the point of view of bulk and production only, not to speak of the quality of the matter, this is a remarkable six-shillings' worth. "E. Richard Cross," compiled by Marion Wilkinson (J. M. Dent & Sons), contains a biographical sketch of much interest, appreciations by three of his friends—a University professor, a well-known writer and social economist, and a Friend schoolmaster, and some of his literary papers and addresses, and religious and political addresses. This is a book which must not be missed by Friends (5s. net)

The following conclusion of a letter in The Friend (London) will be useful to some of our readers:

The question of Birthright Membership is too large to enter upon here. I have never been convinced that its abolition would not, on the whole, do more harm than good, although I think that the harm of any change would be lessened if the children of both members and associates were entered as "Associates." I should like to ask anyone who is considering the matter of Birthright Membership to read carefully an article on "Membership in the Society of Friends" by John Stephenson Rowntree, which appeared in the Friends' Quarterly Examiner of Fourth Month, 1872, an article which might very usefully be reprinted now.

Yours sincerely,

W. S. ROWNTREE.

ENDCLIFFE, Granville Road, Scarborough, Twelfth Month 15, 1917.

A CONCRETE illustration of the truth that women Friends of both Philadelphia Yearly Meetings are deeply interested in the problems related to sewing for foreign relief was given at the Young Friends' Association Second-day morning, First Month 14th.

Sixty women Friends representing widely scattered localities, met together to discuss the perplexing details which must arise when we make thousands of garments for people whose surroundings and customs differ completely from our own.

The conference was called at the request of Anne Garrett Walton and Mary H. Whitson, who direct all the sewing work for their respective Yearly Meetings.

Nearly every woman present at the conference represented some different section of both of the Philadelphia Yearly Meetings which is engaged in sewing for foreign relief. They carried back to their various communities greatly increased interest and enthusiasm for the whole work.

A. G. W.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING FIRST MONTH 12, 1918.

Reported Last Week.....	8279,182.13
From 22 Meetings.....	11,232.69
From 40 Individuals.....	1,761.21
	8292,176.03

ARMENIAN AND SYRIAN RELIEF.

Reported Last Week.....	$ 924.96
From 24 Meetings.....	714.74
From 2 Individuals.....	33.15
	$1,672.85
CHAS. F. JENKINS,
Treasurer.

ELLA NEWLIN sends the following:

The enclosed letter is from a C. O., at Camp Dodge. He does not wear the uniform. They have never tried to compel him to conform to the regulations. A party of Friends were there a few weeks ago. The weather was changing to colder and we did not think best to try to find the others that evening. They said there were some Mennonites who did not wear the uniform but were taking care of the horses.

Two boys, members of "Friends' Church," went with the company recently from this locality to the Coast Guard Camp on an island in Puget Sound. They have received quite rigid treatment. They took positions as C. O.'s and the officers had not known about them. Some of the relatives who lived at Seattle went to see them just as they were about to be sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. They succeeded in averting it at that time. CAMP DODGE, January 7, 1918.

Mrs. ELLA NEWLIN:—

I thank you for your interest and will gladly answer your questions. There are no more boys here than there were.

I am still situated at Y. M. C. A.; therefore they or we are not segregated.

I am treated well and am given many liberties. Hoping this will answer your query,

I am very truly,

CLARENCE FISCHS.

At a meeting of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, held on Eleventh Month 1st, at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, some earnest words were spoken in behalf of the Armenian and Syrian war victims.

In consequence a Committee was appointed for the purpose of asking donations for the cause of Armenian and Syrian relief.

A large number of letters were sent out by this Committee to members and friends of the Fellowship and to Friends' meetings.

There has been a generous response to this appeal, gifts having come from many parts of our country, from places even as far away as California and Canada. Some individuals and some meetings have expressed the intention of contributing certain sums monthly to the cause.

The donations received up to the present time amount to $8,779.03, of which the sum of $521 was specially contributed for Daniel Oliver's Relief Work. This has been sent to him, through the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, while the rest has gone to the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief in New York.

The Committee wishes to express sincere appreciation and thanks to each and every contributor.

ELEANOR CADBURY,
ELIZABETH W. COLLINS,
RACHEL C. EVANS,

ANNA COPE EVANS,
LUCY BIDDLE LEWIS,
EMILY OLIVER.

GIFFORD PINCHOT ON "THE FARMER AFTER THE WAR."—Gifford Pinchot, former Chief Forester of the United States, lectured at Friends' Select School in the Haverford Graduate School course on "Conditions After the War," on Sixth-day evening, the 11th inst.

He showed how farmers as a class had failed to be appreciated in times past, and insisted that no skilled labor had been so under-paid as farm labor. He believed that one of the by-products of the present war will be a wholesome respect for the farmer and an increased understanding and appreciation of the conditions under which he works and of the value of his work to the community.

Gifford Pinchot thinks that farmers will organize and co-operate not only with one another, but with labor organizations. A beginning in this direction has just been made by a mutual agreement between the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor and the State Grange. Heretofore, farming has been the most poorly organized business in the country. With the introduction of tractors instead of animal power, more thorough-going business methods, which will include scientific planning and management, such as have been applied successfully to other "big business," and more direct relations between producers and consumers, the farmer will come into his own.

THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL is still able to maintain its per capita at less than twenty-five cents a day. This in view of high prices is little less than phenomenal. We have believed our readers would be interested in the following accounts for Twelfth Month. The figures justify the statement of Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones that not one cent is wasted at Cheyney.—[EBS.]

CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL, Cheyney, Penna.,
First Month 10, 1918.

BOARDING DEPARTMENT STATEMENT FOR MONTH ENDING TWELFTH MONTH 31, 1917.

Total number fed, 2773; average number per day, 89; cost of raw food supplies, $563.37; average cost per day, $18.17; cost per capita, $ 2.04.

Overhead charges for month, $116.31; overhead charges for day, $3.75; per capita per day, $ 0.42; per capita per day (total), $ 2.46.

ANALYSIS OF OVERHEAD EXPENSES.

Salaries and Wages	$ 80.00
Cleaning Supplies	2.69
Carfare	2.25
Telephone	20
Light	70
Coal	17.15
Ice	4.32
	$116.31

ANALYSIS OF RAW FOOD.

Groceries	$234.71
Meat	215.52
Farm Products (Dairy)	71.23
Dock and Christmas Expenses	21.94
Fish	18.05
Freight	1.92
	$563.37

MEAT.

Bradley Meat Market Co.	$ 86.88
Farm—Pork, 476 lbs.	114.24
Farm—Poultry, 48 lbs., at $ 3.00.	14.40
	$215.52

FARM PRODUCTS.

18½ Quarts Cream	$ 9.25
600 Quarts Whole Milk	42.00
528 Quarts skimmed milk	18.48
30 quarts buttermilk	1.50
	$ 71.23

DOCK AND CHRISTMAS EXPENSES.

Twelfth Month 6th.	$ 6.90
Twelfth Month 15th	10.22
Twelfth Month 21st	4.82
	$ 21.94

Groceries: Butter, 61 lbs., $23.05; butterine, 30 lbs., $6.53; baking powder, 5 lbs., $1.00; dried lima beans, 6 lbs., 96 cents; cheese, 16 lbs., $3.30; canned corn, 10 lbs., $1.60; beans, navy, half bushel, $1.50; coffee, 22 lbs., $3.71; cocoa, 3 lbs., 66 cents; corn flakes, 22 boxes, $2.09; corn starch, 4 boxes, 30 cents; crackers, 3 lbs., 33 cents; cod fish, 5 lb., 78 cents; cucumbr, 6 boxes, 24 cents; Eggs (water glass), 26, 65 cents; eggs (fresh), 10 dozen and 11, $6.55; white flour, 434 lbs., $56.80; Graham flour, 84 lbs., $4.28; rye flour, 114 lbs., $4.37; ketchup, ¾ gal., 94 cents; gelatine, 1½ lbs., $1.60; ginger snaps, 5 lbs., $1.00; hominy grits, 18 lbs., $1.08; hominy, 25 lbs., $1.50; hard (compound), 54 lbs., $12.42; corn meal, 251 lbs., $12.55; molasses, 6½ gals., $3.50; pepper and spices, 50 cents; macaroni, 19½ lbs., $2.15; oatmeal, 90 lbs., $4.37; Wesson oil, ¾ gal., $1.58; dried peaches, 17½ dozen, $2.19; canned peas, 4, 53 cents; peanut butter, 3½ dozen, 74 cents; split peas, 3 lbs., 34 cents; puffed wheat, 2 boxes, 23 cents; petticoats, 6 boxes, 32 cents; prunes, 43¾ lbs., $5.03; white potatoes, 13 bushels, $19.50; rice, 33¾ lbs., $3.21; raisins, 4 packages, 50 cents; string beans, 4 cans, 54 cents; brown sugar, 66 lbs., $5.28; sardines, 1 can, 7 cents; pumpkin, 6 cans, 72 cents; salt, ¼ bushel, 75 cents; baking soda, 2 lbs., 12 cents; granulated sugar, 112 lbs., $9.52; tuna fish, 39 cans, $6.50; tea, 3½ lbs., $1.23; tapioca, 4½ lbs., 57 cents; vinegar, 1 quart, 5 cents; vanilla, ¾ pint, 85 cents; yeast, 60 cents; home canned fruit and vegetables, $1.00. Total, $234.71.

The following is an editorial note in the New York Evening Post:

The report just published in England by the Religious Society of Friends concerning assistance given alien enemies proves that not all the bonds of humanity have been severed by the war. For three years the Society has been devoting its best energies to caring for the wives and children of interned Germans and Austrians, and to looking after the interned Germans and Austrians themselves. Over 5,000 cases have been cared for among the families of these unfortunate men. Country homes at the seaside have been opened for the children threatened by under-nourishment with tuberculosis, clothes have been supplied the women, extra food has been given, a rest home was established where food and entertainment and good cheer were provided these temporary pariahs, many of whom were actually English-born and German only by marriage of parentage. At the camps, where some fifty thousand civilians were interned, a regular complex organization had to be inaugurated for the delivery of parcels sent from Germany through Switzerland, and for the occupation of the interned, who were encouraged to engage in the manufacture of a large stock of hand-made articles. These then found a market, first in this country and later in Sweden. Assured that the English civilians at Ruhleben, near Berlin, were receiving, on their part, similar merciful treatment, the Society of Friends has in this manner, for three years, kept alight the fires of humanity in the face of all obstacles, and hopes to continue to do so until the war's end.

NOTICE.

MEETINGS from Second Month 3rd to 9th:—
Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, at Fourth and Arch Streets, Third-day Second Month 5th, at 10.30 A. M.
Abington Quarterly Meeting, at Germantown, Fifth-day, Second Month 7th, at 3.30 P. M.
Kennett Monthly Meeting, at Kennett Square, Third-day, Second Month 5th, at 10 A. M.
Cherterfield, at Trenton, Third-day, Second Month 5th, at 10 A. M.
Chester, N. J., at Moorstown, Third-day, Second Month 5th, at 7.30 P. M.
Bradford, at Coatesville, Fourth-day, Second Month 6th, at 10 A. M.
New Garden, at Westgrove, Fourth-day, Second Month 6th, at 10 A. M.
Upper Springfield, at Mansfield, Fourth-day, Second Month 6th, at 10 A. M.
Haddonfield, Fourth-day, Second Month 6th, at 7.30 P. M.
Wilmington, Fifth-day, Second Month 7th, at 7.30 P. M.
Uwelan, at Downingtown, Fifth-day, Second Month 7th, at 10.30 A. M.
London Grove, Fifth-day, Second Month 7th, at 10 A. M.
Falls, at Falsington, Fifth-day, Second Month 7th, at 10 A. M.
Evesham, at Mt. Laurel, Fifth-day, Second Month 7th, at 10 A. M.
Upper Evesham, at Medford, Seventh-day, Second Month 9th, at 10 A. M.

DIED.—First Month 10, 1918, at the home of her son, Stephen B. Naylor, near Barnesville, O., RABEEL NAYLOR, SR., widow of Lewis Naylor, aged within three days of ninety-seven years; a member of Still-water Monthly Meeting.

at her residence, 51 E. Seventh Street, Salem, Ohio, First Month 18, 1918, SARAH P. COOPER, in her eighty-fourth year; a member of Salem Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The Teen Age in the First-day School," A course given by W. Edward Rafferty, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of "The Survey," New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

WISSAHICKON INN REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.

Open Throughout the Year.

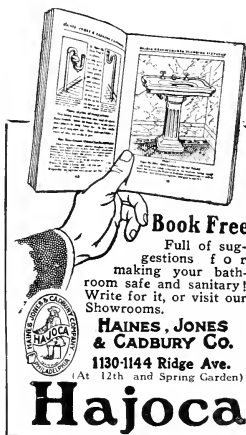

NATHAN L. JONES.

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

Book Free
Full of suggestions for making your bathroom safe and sanitary! Write for it, or visit our Showrooms.

HAINES, JONES & CADBURY CO.
1130-1144 Ridge Ave.
(At 12th and Spring Garden)

Hajoca

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Raynes W. Kelsey.
Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER
550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.
Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only.

Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1848. BELL PHONE

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years! Medical 13

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. PHILA.

"THE DAY OF OUR VISITATION."

The Swarthmore Lecture for 1917. By William Littlehew. Cloth, 55 Cents. Postpaid. Paper, 30 Cents. Prepaid. Lecture delivered at Devonshire House, Bishopsgate, on Fifth Month 22nd, at the opening of the Friends' Yearly Meeting.

"THE QUEST FOR TRUTH."

By Silvanus P. Thompson, F. R. S. Cloth, 55 Cents. Postpaid. This book, by the late Silvanus P. Thompson, was first published as the Swarthmore Lecture of 1915. It quickly ran out of print, and in response to many requests a New Edition has been prepared.

FOR SALE BY

Friends' Book and Tract Committee
144 East Twentieth Street NEW YORK CITY

ASNC. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell Phone—Lombard 1412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. PHILA.

Genealogist

Elizabeth R. Satterthwaite
22 S. Stockton St., Trenton, N. J.

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50
1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40
by freight or express, f. o. b., Colora.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mimeographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Type-writing, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FOR RENT—NEXT SUMMER, AT A MODERATE

price, our home in Westley, R. I., 14 rooms, all modern conveniences; situated on the bank of a tide-water river, 20 minutes to the ocean by trolley or automobile.
HARVEY C. FENY,
Westley, R. I.

WANTED—A COMPANIONABLE YOUNG WOMAN to assist with children, where other help is kept Address "G,"

"THE FRIEND," 207 Walnut Place.

WANTED—BY A YOUNG LADY, FOND OF ELderly people and children, a position to care for either from 2 until 4 o'clock each day; has nursed in a Friend's family for three years.

Address "G.,"
1524 West Atlantic Street, Toga, Phila.

A MOTHER, WITH ADDRESS, AGED NINE, DEsires a home for the winter in a quiet family of Friends.

References. Address M. E. B.,
Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—IMMEDIATELY—FOR SERVICE IN

France, four men experienced in operating wood-working machinery. We have a special cable request to urgent men. We will pay salaries, if necessary, out of special fund available. Send inquiries or applications to American Friends' Service Committee, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Five Opportunities in Public Utility Bonds

Public Utilities stand third in the coal priority order of the Fuel Administrator

PUBLIC UTILITIES are a powerful factor, both directly and indirectly, in the prosecution of the war.

Their efficiency and prosperity are indispensable to communities at all times. They are the arteries which feed our every-day development.

There are five public utility bond issues of unusual attractiveness, yielding from 6.00% to 6.83%, to which we invite your special attention.

Send for Circular PF-153

The National City Company

National City Bank Bldg., New York
1421 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

Let Me Help You

W. J. MacWatters

In Selecting Your RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental
ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton
"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.
1220 Market Street

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO. BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton

TELEPHONES

Ball—Spruce 17-81 -- -- Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Boring 204X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -- -- PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE

SPRUCE 1848

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1571.

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense
Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth
from 30c to 50c.
REDUCES
FIRE RISK.
Guaranteed for one year.

$16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels

Paper

Paper Bags and Twine

259 South Third Street

GIRARD TRUST CO. BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian,
Administrator, Assignee and Receiver.
Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults.
Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager
Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

'Phone, Spruce 3032

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIRST-DAY, SECOND MONTH 7, 1918.

No. 32.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

THE NINTH HOUR.

"Truly this man was the Son of God."

After the shameful trial in the hall,
The mocking and the scourging, and the pain
Of Peter's words, to Herod, and again
To Pilate's judgment-seat, the royal pall;
The cross itself, the vinegar and gall;
The thieves close by, discipleship proved vain,
The scoffing crowd, His mother's tears like rain,
There came one moment, bitterest of all,
Yet in that cry, when flesh and spirit failed,
Last effort of the awful way He trod,
Which shook the earth, nor left the temple veiled.
In that exceeding great and bitter cry
Was conquest. The centurion standing by Said, Truly this man was the Son of God.

—From "A Brief Pilgrimage in the Holy Land," CAROLINE HAZARD, by Kind Consent of the Author.

SPIRITUAL RECONSTRUCTION.

Besides the self-denying work of rebuilding the waste places in the stricken war zone there remains the more difficult task of the spiritual reconstruction of modern society in the world after the war.

The apostles felt themselves chosen for such a work in their day. Paul gives a lurid picture of the non-Christian life in Romans 1. We may think his indictment of society was too severe. But in comparison with the writings of his contemporaries who satirized the vices of their day, Paul's language was really modest and restrained. And if we can hardly bear to read some of his sentences it only shows what a difference Christianity—or rather, Christ—has made in the world. Paul's world needed to be spiritually reconstructed. He knew the remedy for the world's malady, and felt himself a debtor to Jew and Gentile alike until he had imparted his secret to them for their healing and reconstruction on Divine lines.

From time to time have occurred mighty movements of the Divine Spirit which have resulted in a more or less profound spiritual reconstruction of their particular age. In medieval times the work of Francis of Assisi had such an effect in Italy. So had the work of Martin Luther in Germany, and of George Fox, and, a century later, of John Wesley, in the life of England. Indeed it has been asserted confidently that but for the rise of Quakerism in the seventeenth century, and the evangelical revival of the eighteenth, England would have shared the fate of France, when the bloody terror of revolution broke out in that fair land.

What a religious awakening can do for society and national life is illustrated in the history of the principality of Wales. The middle of the eighteenth century found the Welsh people morally, intellectually and economically at their lowest. A sweeping revival of spiritual life from end to end furnished the needed inspiration which raised the people out of their slough of despond, which quickened every pulse of national life, elevating, purifying, energizing every department of human interest.

These visitations are evidences of the spiritual presence of Christ in the world. They are waves of Divine influence proceeding from Him who claims every man for His Kingdom and the whole of every man.

Only a fresh wave of power "from the presence of the Lord" can arrest the fatal backward drift of the period through which the world is now passing. The war has not caused the drift. The war is the symptom of the malady which was there before it began, and the sheathing of the sword, however desirable, will not in itself remove it.

The work of spiritual reconstruction can only be undertaken by a people who really know Christ, who are sure of Him and of their message. Such can alone speak with authority and not as the scribes. The keen edge of "the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God" is not blunted by them because of a lurking doubt of its trustworthiness.

The Christian Church must approach this pressing problem of world-wide spiritual reconstruction with courage, but in a spirit of deep penitence. Nature, we know, reveals her secrets to the meek alone. Humility of mind has ever been the key that has opened the door leading to some fresh discovery in the kingdom of science. So also is the Kingdom of God. When we have brought our best thought to bear on the complex question of the way out of the present agony and have honestly wrestled with the difficulties that confront us, we shall have to come back and sit down at the feet of Him from whose lips the apostles got their message, and from whose example they learned their methods, for the spiritual reconstruction of the world they lived in. And we shall find our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is still abreast of the times, the root of human righteousness, the new basis for human society and the new conscience for human conduct.

MAX I. REICH.

"No victory that we gain is worth anything to the victories we have yet to gain."

A NEW YEAR MESSAGE TO THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

HENRY T. HODGKIN.

We are set in the midst of a world of men and women whose chief and deepest need is a living fellowship with their Heavenly Father. That fellowship once established, the way is open for fellowship between man and man, and between nation and nation. Out of such an experience we may be brought into the one kind of human society which will endure, because it is founded according to the mind of Christ, and in harmony with His supreme purpose. Reconstruction, international settlement, inter-racial reconciliation—all these are vain terms, holding up mere dreams of future well-being, unless men's hearts are possessed by the love of God, self-seeking and all private-mindedness being driven forth by the passion of an all-absorbing love to God and to our fellow-men. No negation of evil will save us to-day. Only the cleansing streams of Divine love and power can carry us forward to realize a new and better world. Love must be in us no passing emotion, but a dynamic and creative force. This it may become, not by the will of man, but as we are born of the Spirit.

Between the world so sorely in need of this new creation and the Source of all creative power, stand the men and women in whom this power shall be incarnated. The living God clothed in human flesh and using human speech made known His will and His way to men in Galilee nineteen hundred years ago. In Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, He brought into a hopeless world a new and living hope. The Kingdom of God became a realizable possibility. It was indeed at hand.

To-day the same loving Father seeks men and women to carry on the work. Christ Jesus moves amongst us by His ever-present Spirit, seeking to come into the hearts of all men, and to bring them into fellowship with their Father. He calls us, as individuals and as a Society, to follow Him, to be His partners in the world-embracing enterprise.

Home and Foreign Missions are mere terms. There is but one enterprise in the world worthy of the whole manhood and womanhood of the children of God. To make Christ known, to lift Him up before men, to lead men's hearts into that living fellowship with their Father which is possible through Christ, to establish His rule on earth—this is the one task in which, whether at home or abroad, whether workers for peace or missions or social reform, we are all called to co-operate. Now is the time to bend every energy in the great endeavor.

How, then, shall we enter into this service? There is but one way. We are called by all the voices of bitterness and despair and sorrow that fill the air in these sad days, we are called by all the cries of aspiration and longing for a better world that may still be heard even amidst the din of battle, we are called by the voiceless yearnings of those who sit in darkness to enter upon that one way. We are called into the faithful and whole-hearted following of Jesus Christ. He leads the great adventure. He asks not for wisdom or riches or influence, but simply for the whole, full heart of utter trust and absolute loyalty. Abandoning ourselves to Him, led by His Spirit, constrained by His love, we shall find our place in the building of the City of God, of which He is the architect, and in which He is both the foundation and the cornerstone.

For each one who thus follows there is work of absorbing interest, of untold significance, because the one otherwise aimless and futile life is fitted into a glorious design, and takes on a meaning and value not proportioned to its own small capabilities, but determined by the grandeur of the whole Divine plan. The Society of Friends is being called, nay even impelled, not by some outward stimulus, but by a deep inward impulse, into the world-service. Its message is not with words of men's wisdom: it is simply to set forth Christ and Him crucified.

Let every one of us see to it that we are linked in this common effort. Only in Christ can we be so linked. The Apostle Paul counted all things less than he might be found in Christ. The Master, stripped even of His clothes, turning His back on all worldly power and pleasure, trod for us alone the path of uttermost sacrifice. If we are to know the saving power of His cross, we must be sharers of it. "If any man would follow Me, let him take up his cross daily."

No easy way opens up to us, and yet it is the way of joy. No light task is before us, yet the burden will be borne in fellowship with the best of friends. To win the world for Christ seems wildly impossible, yet with God all things are possible. We need, as a Society, to stand together, for apart, and criticizing one another, we must surely fail. We need to stand together in fearless loyalty to our great Head, filled with the missionary spirit, possessed by the passion of Divine love, proclaiming by life and lip the Everlasting Gospel of redeeming grace.—The Friend (London).

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS.*

In preparing a historical sketch of any movement a writer has the choice between two methods of treatment—the more philosophical one which will view the undertaking in the large and show the development of underlying principles; and that which devotes most attention to detail and the labors and accomplishments of particular individuals.

Our friend Rayner W. Kelsey, in his welcome study, in which he traces the interest of Friends in the Indians, has in some measure combined both of these methods. Beginning in 1655 he describes some of the missionary visits of Friends close to the Atlantic seaboard in early colonial times, and follows the vicissitudes of the laborers and of their labor down to the present time, closing with a brief sketch of the mission conducted by the California Yearly Meeting in northern Alaska, where along Kotzebue Sound there are over 75 Esquimaux members with Friends, in four Monthly Meetings, some of them located about the Arctic Circle.

A goodly amount of space is naturally devoted to the dealings with the Indians by the Colonies where Friends were more or less fully in control. This chapter entitled "The Quaker Peace" satisfactorily sets forth both the methods and the results of the endeavors of Penn and others to treat fairly with the aborigines. These experiences, leading up as they did to the "Peace Policy" of President Grant, are skillfully developed. It will probably be a novel thought to most younger Friends that for a decade or more, about 1870 to 1880, the Indians in the State of Kansas and the western sections of Oklahoma were under the official care of Friends as a denomination. The nearly forty pages devoted to this subject are perhaps the most interesting in the book.

Another chapter is devoted to Tunessassa, and still others to the work of Friends elsewhere; in the East, in various parts of the middle West, and in Oklahoma. A place is also given to the labors of some particular institutions and individuals. As these were included it would appear as though references should have been made to The Emlen Institution for the Benefit of Children of African and Indian Descent, and to the work of our Friend, John B. Garrett, who was a member of the commission appointed about 1806, by President Johnson to remove the Osage Tribe of Indians from Kansas. This commission selected for these Indians their present reservation in northern Oklahoma, which later discoveries have proved to be among the richest oil fields in the world.

An admirable index completes the book. This, together with frequent notes giving references to original sources and authorities, and detailed bibliographies, adds much to the usefulness of the work. There are several interesting illustrations.

GEORGE VAUX, JR.

PUBLICATIONS OF INTEREST TO FRIENDS.

The interests of the world situation and the changing relationships of life incident to it, have absorbed so much of the space in our paper, that there has been an accumulation of literature on our tables. Some brief notices may serve to direct the attention to efforts that mostly will be recognized as collateral to the larger movements. Indeed, little seems written now that does not in some way refer to a disintegrating or to an integrating world order.

*Friends and the Indians, 1655-1917, by Rayner W. Kelsey, pp. ix-291. 1917. Philadelphia: The Associated Executive Committee on Indian Affairs.

"THE MEXICAN PROBLEM," by C. W. BARRON, WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY TALCOTT WILLIAMS.

This is an attractive little volume of 136 pages, published by Houghton, Mifflin Co., at St. Talcott Williams describes it as "A clear and wise economic picture of Mexico, beyond any other that I have read." The final chapter has the title, "Watchman! What of the night?" It says, "What troubles Doheny ['lord of oil in the Southwest'] is how these good people of Mexico, speaking one hundred and fifty tongues, can be merged into a nation, with soul life, prosperity, and family and national happiness." Some of the efforts of two years ago to contribute to this end, have been at least temporarily suspended. It is most desirable, however, that our sensitiveness to the need should be maintained and this little book is a valuable contribution to that end.

"THE ARM OF GOD," a compilation by E. and R. Dankerley, published abroad by Oliphant's, and on sale at Friends' Book Store, Philadelphia, and at the Book and Tract Committee's room on Twentieth Street, New York, price 75 cents.

To those who profess to believe the Christian stand for Peace ("Christ's Conquering Peace") is entirely unpractical the records of this handy pocket volume present food for reflection. It shows the workableness of these principles. The war logic (?) that those who insist upon the authority of spiritual weapons in the warfare of life, would thereby invite Germans to slay defenceless children and outrage mothers and wives, cannot, however, be put down by such records as this. When the simplest principle of the syllogism is violated as by these taunting arguments, dealt out to peace workers, nothing but the records of facts stand. This little volume is a veritable armory of such facts. The book might properly be styled, "Spiritual vs. Carnal Weapons." The Germans seem not to have been more disconcerted by anything than by some of these spiritual weapons in Russia. Simeon Strunsky has shown this in his inimitable way in the New York Evening Post.

"THE TRACK OF THE STORM,"—Tales of the Marne, the Meuse and the Aube, by Margaret Brackenbury Crook, Published by Headley Bros., and on sale by Friends' Book and Tract Committee, Twentieth Street, New York City.

The fifteen stories of this volume of 111 pages, both in matter and style, are most appealing. With everything else in the war-zone changed, human nature—especially French human nature—persists. The author is able to give most vivid pictures, at the same time that she shows the very great need and the very great skill of the relief workers in ministering to the need. Friends will want to read the book and pass it on to others.

"I APPEAL UNTO CAESAR."—This little shilling volume has been widely reviewed. It is from the pen of Margaret Hobhouse (the mother of Stephen Hobhouse), and is a severe arraignment of the British Government in its dealing with C. O.'s. What gives it particular force is the fact that the author is not herself sympathetic with the C. O. position. There are signs since the book appeared that the appeal has been heeded in part. This at least is true, the British nation and the world have been forced to see how easily a military dispensation can light the torch of persecution and fill the jails with genuine martyrs. This is ever a dear price for a nation to pay for liberty of conscience. Will our own country fall over this precipice?

"THE STORY OF A BRAVE WOMAN AND OTHER STORIES FROM NORWAY," by Elsie Bastin. This is received from the author and can be had from the Friends' Bookshop, London. It is a small paper bound book of 123 pages, in the clear-cut printing that makes the press of John Bellows so justly famous. The vivid pictures of life on the coast of Norway within the Arctic Circle and the devoted service of J. J. Armistead and the workers with him on the mission boat Red Cross are so presented as to carry readers quite beyond the point of interest. They will certainly want to co-operate in so good a work.

"THE UNITED STATES Versus PRINGLE." the Record of a Quaker Conscience, Peace Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. This is a reprint of an article in the Atlantic Monthly. Some of our readers may remember that it appeared in THE FRIEND by consent of the Atlantic. Its appearance in this form signals the entry of the Peace Committee upon the important service of publishing a line of such literature, so that our own members will be well armed with concrete illustrations of how a faithful testimony in the past has given Friends a reputation for something very different from slackers. One might say that it has seemed in the past and in the present quite impossible to hold a peace testimony honestly and not win the respect of those who are consistent militarists.

"THE NEW WORLD."—With aptly chosen title we have from The Fellowship Press, 118 E. Twenty-eighth Street, New York City, at $1 a year, a new monthly. It is not issued "as an official organ of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, but as a medium for the free discussion of questions relative to the interpretation of Christianity to our age and its application for the reconstruction of Society." After a careful reading of all the articles in No. 1, we have no hesitation in recording the judgment that this aim has been very strikingly accomplished. The old truths—the most hackneyed of them—are marshalled for the uses of the new order. "The ultimate remedy for the troubles of mankind" is put down in Bertrand Russell's phrase as "A change of heart." "With Christianity, it is always sunrise somewhere in the world. And this little paper appears in order simply and unaffectedly to reason with the Christians of America that they seek by prayer, by open-eyed thought and by a new measure of self-dedication, to hasten the new healing sunrise of Christianity upon a shattered and war-weary world." Our hearts throb in sympathy with these aims and we hail the effort as one of multiplying signs that the new day is dawning.

ARMENIAN RELIEF.

[Because Friends are so much interested in this subject we venture to make the following quotation from a special correspondent of the Boston Evening Transcript.—Eds.]

Erivan, the Caucasus—This city has two present claims to distinction, for it is at once the nearest large town to Mt. Ararat, and it is also the centre of the relief work for the Armenian refugees in the Caucasus, who number about a quarter of a million. An ancient city, Erivan is now predominantly Armenian, and it was here that the recent all-Armenian congress to consider the future of the race was held. America's representatives in the work of relief have their headquarters here, and from this centre radiates an organized ministry for a stricken people that is one of the notable achievements of this world war. It will have religious and political consequences beyond anything imagined by the people of the west, who sought only to save the lives of myriads of sufferers.

UNDER THE SHADOW OF MT. ARARAT.—There are no starving Armenians in Erivan. Yet this is the centre of the community that fled from Turkey under the spur of the persecutions of the Turk. The reason is that the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, of which Cleveland H. Dodge, Metropolitan Building, New York, is treasurer, has established here a system of organized relief, including industrial work on an extensive scale, that has meant literally life, as well as rehabilitation, to this section of the refugees, who number altogether about a quarter of a million in the Caucasus.

Perhaps that industrial work will make the best start for the story. Instead of direct relief, in the form of food or money, the committee, with an eye to the future of the people, has distributed labor, except in the case of children and helpless women. Since clothing, as well as food, has to be provided the refugees, the committee has begun at the beginning, and distributed cotton and wool among the women to be cleaned, carded and spun—except that the cotton is first carded, after the ancient bowstring fashion, by men. The wool is given out as it comes from the sheeps' backs. This is returned by the women in the form of yarn, for the spinning of which they are paid. Thousands of pairs of socks have also been knitted by the women.

Because the Armenians are skilled artisans, they have been set to making knockdown hand looms, and upon the machines thus built, trained weavers are set to making cloth out of yarn spun by the women. This cloth is used for under-clothing, in the case of the cotton goods, and for outer garments when made of wool. A fine quality of homespun is produced, which could be sold in the Russian markets at a profit. Instead, all the clothing thus produced is used for the refugees. Last winter fifteen thousand persons were clothed, and this year an additional ten thousand orphans will be clad in the most comfortable garments ever they have known. Of course, all the tailoring is done by Armenian refugees.

This is the sight that old Ararat now looks down upon: A little company of American Board missionaries, at present lent to the relief committee, creating anew amid unusual conditions, an entire industrial organization that will provide, without pauperizing, for the needs of a homeless and utterly destitute people.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

ABRAHAM'S OAK.

(Concluded from page 402.)

The hard-working farm lad felt it quite a holiday as he led his quiet horse through the streets, for it was market day, and Horsham had awakened from its normal sleepy quiet.

The dinner at the Deanes was also a treat, for Ann Deane's great pudding was of beef, which seldom came on a farmhouse table, and Mary chattered gaily with her old play-fellow, telling him she had something very particular to show him presently. She made a mysterious journey into the best parlor, and then came back to lead him there, followed by her amused parents. On the table stood a beautiful new clothes box, of polished oak, with a handsome lock of engraved brass, and "M. D." in brass-headed nails.

"What a nice box, Mary. Did thy father have it made for thee?"

"Yes—and, Abie, it was made out of thy own oak!"

The color came into Abraham's brown cheeks. "Is it really? How nice for thee to have something made of the dear old tree!"

"Ah, but that is not all I have to show thee," and a covering was whisked off a second box of the same size and shape, with the inscription, "A. P., 1732," deeply cut into the solid oak below the lock.

"There, Abie! That is for thy very own! Father had his best carpenter make them for us."

The boy stood speechless with surprise and pleasure. A gift was almost unknown to him, and the nice box made from his beloved oak was a treasure indeed. His thanks might be stammering, but John Deane could see how heartfelt they were. "It was Mary's thought," he said. "Five years ago, when I promised the little maid a box, she said thee ought to have it, so it ended in old Jacob making two. They are only just finished. I was intending to send it next time the timber wagon goes thy way."

"I think it would go on the top of the panniers," said Abie, eagerly. "I've got a tidy bit of cord with me, and Dobbin walks very steadily. I do want mother to see it. She will thank thee herself for thy kindness next Monthly Meeting, and Mary, too, for thinking of it."

So the box was safely tied above the panniers, and borne off in triumph to the lonely farm to hold the boy's few treasures.

But some years later the boxes came together again, when

"M. D." became "M. P.," and Abraham took home his play-fellow to fill the place of his mother, who had died the year before.

The marriages of Friends were still only half acknowledged as legal, so it was needful that the greatest possible publicity should be used, and the ancient certificate says that Abraham Prier and Mary Deane, "having publicly declared their intention of taking each other in marriage before several meetings of the people called Quakers, in Horsham, and in Ryegate, Capole, and Dorking, according to the good order used among them, whose proceedings therein, after a deliberate consideration thereof (with regard to the righteous law of God, and example of His people recorded in the Scriptures of truth, were allowed by the said Meetings, they appearing clear of all others, and having also the consent of parents and relations concerned," were married in Reigate Meeting-house on "the seventh day of the 10th month called December, 1747."

The declaration of bridegroom and bride differs somewhat from the present form. "In the fear of God, and the presence of this assembly, whom I desire to be my witnesses," again hinting at the necessity of publicity for the sake of the five children afterwards born to them, whose names, John, William, Ann, Sarah, and Hannah, are written on the margin of the certificate.

Abraham, honest yeoman though he was, apparently never learned to write, for his name is signed with a cross, while "Mary Deane" is neatly written below.

Two oaken boxes, firm and good as ever, the old marriage certificate, and a single silver tablespoon of quaint shape, with "A. M. P." in plain Roman letters deeply cut on the handle—these are not much to conjure up a vision of the homely lives of the writer's great-great-grandparents, but it has been a pleasant task, and it is with the hope that this sketch of early Quaker life in Sussex may interest other readers that I venture to send it to the F. Q. E.

SADDLESCOMBE, HASSECKS, SUSSEX.

MAUDE ROBINSON.

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

(Continued from page 404.)

"The next morning I went to seek the officer who had promised to give us our liberty, and after some time found him, and put him in mind of his promise. He seemed to quibble, and put it off. I thought he intended to weary me out, that so I would promise to go home. I went to the head officer, and made my complaint, and he, in a friendly way, told me that we should be soon released. Soon after, that officer who had promised us a permit, called me to his tent, and wrote a pass for us; and when he had read it to me, my spirit was raised with zeal for my Master's honour, and so I told him, that I was not to fear or be frightened by men when in my Master's cause. Must we indeed go right home without a guard? Nay, send a guard with us for the safety of thy country. Yes, we have concluded to go homeward about one hundred and fifty miles, to a settlement of Friends about New Garden, and when we have visited them, if I find my mind easy to return home to my wife and children, I shall be glad. But if I find my Master hath any more service for me in this part of the country, I desire to be enabled to return to South Carolina, if not to Georgia, visiting my friends; and if I should return through this army, when thou seest me ride on, then remember what I tell thee now.

"Officer.—If you return here again, you may expect severity."
Answer.—I do not fear what your army can do to me, for I know that you can have no power over this body, except you receive it from above or some good end. He then looked me full in the face, and perhaps saw the tears begin to run down my cheeks. He gave me his hand, and wished me a good journey, got on his horse, and rode off.

"Our horses were given to us; we parted with our captain (of the horset) as with a friend, and with a raised voice bid his men farewell, and wished them a better way of living, which they returned, with gladness for our release. We had about sixty miles to a Friend's house at Pedee, from whence we came. I thought our being amongst them was no disgrace to our Society. O how good it is for us to live near the Truth! Walking in the light, we should be at no loss to know what to do, or where to go, or how to behave ourselves before men for the glory of God, and for the safety and peace of our souls. I have been much preserved in such a state since I left you; I am unworthy of such great kindness. The thoughts of the many days, weeks and months, which, in time past, I have spent in the unnecessary cares of this world, do at times grieve me; that, and the sense I have of the state of the churches, is the greatest affliction which I meet with. I find hard work amongst Friends in these southern provinces, but have been helped by my kind Master, to proclaim his great name, although in a clumsy and uncustomary way: I generally feel relief to my burdened, troubled soul.

"I am in a few days intending to set out for South Carolina again, not knowing what may befall me there. My greatest concern is that I might be [obedient] to my Master. I cannot see the end of my journey, nor the road home so clearly as usual. It may be you may see my face no more; and if it be so, I entreat you, in that love which I feel for you, that you show kindness to my dear wife, and watch over my children for good. The reason of my beloved companion leaving me—I first proposed it to his consideration for your sakes, lest you might be uneasy; and after considering and looking at it, found freedom so to do. It is no small cross for me to part with him: we have travelled together in love as brethren in tribulation. My love to you all, my friends and neighbours.

"ABEL THOMAS.

"NEW GARDEN, North Carolina, Fifth Month 6, 1781."

(To be continued.)

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 390.)

Then there was much consulting about what to do, and to decide this we adjourned from the road and group of interested natives to the parlor of Sibate's hotel. The Birchets felt that they must return to Bogota that night, and that at first was the prevailing feeling of all six of us. So one of the party ordered six horses, and returned with the information that for these we must pay $2.00 apiece, and $1.50 each to send them back by train.

I had been wondering more and more what reason I had for haste to Bogota, and why it was not sensible (as well as much cheaper) to stay over night in Sibate, and spend another day in those fine forests. Then one of the ladies who had not ridden a horse for some years and not at all a la Colombia, developed considerable apprehension as to the result of a ride of twenty miles, after a tiring walk, rather a severe initiation I confess. Another lady, needless to say, was all enthusiasm for the horseback ride, and we finally effected a compromise, three, one man and two ladies to go on, and three, the same proportion as to sex, to stay.

That was decided between five and six o'clock; it was after eight o'clock before the three horses were ready, and had there been six who knows when preparations had ended. Then we saw the three happily off, on good horses, and at least one of them sure of a glorious time. We learned later that they reached Bogota about midnight, the only accident being a fortunately not severe "header" over his horse's head by the one man of the party.

The next morning, First-day, I saw the two ladies on the 7 A. M. train for Bogota. One of them felt, I think, as I should have, that to go to Bogota in the morning was wasting a fine opportunity in the country, but as she said it would never do for a missionary to go off for a trip on the Sabbath, and also in Colombia, where women travel so little unless she could have persuaded her companion to stay, it would have been against etiquette to have gone off with a gentleman.

Doubtless the little traveling by single ladies explains the unexpected developments the evening before when at the hotel I had asked for rooms for two "senoras" and for myself.

They coolly assumed that one of the "senoras" was of course my wife, and arranged accommodations so. Without actually explaining, it would have been difficult to have gotten a different result, for had I specified one "senora" and one "senorita" it had looked much more certainly so.

I was glad no one stayed—unless it had been the Birchets, who are the best walkers—for I wanted to go some distance to a high precipitous but wooded mountain we had seen the day before. This I reached. On the way were open fields, where the pansy has established itself as if native, and near the base of the cliff were quantities upon quantities of ripe red strawberries. These are small and compared to ours dry, but when dead-ripe are delicious. (Colombia has solved the problem of an ever-bearing strawberry, by simply having a season uniform the year round.)

In the woods at the base of the cliffs was one plant, the most brilliant, or perhaps gorgeous is the word, I have yet seen here. This is a large-flowered scarlet crimson begonia. Here where they are native I have become converted to these plants as ornaments, as I have never been in conservatories. Whites, reds and a yellow, a great variety, I have seen.

There was cloud much of the day about this forest, but fortunately I avoided actual fog. I did, however, get wet by rain.

One other plant I must mention, one we had all admired the day before, and of which I now obtained a photograph, a bushy Calceolaria, slipper-flower, with fine clusters of golden flowers. Being a Scrophulariaceae I was especially pleased.

That afternoon I made sure to return to the station early, but on the way one disconcerting thought occurred to me. I had forgotten to inquire about First-day trains. I had no reason to suppose them different from week-days; should they be different likely later (so I reasoned), to give Bogota people longer in the country, and especially at Tequendama, reached over this route. Still to be safe I reached the station forty minutes early, but the First-day train was yet earlier, having left forty-five minutes early, at 4.50 p. m., five minutes before my arrival. What throws the blame hopelessly upon me is that all the time, and quite forgotten, I had in my pocket-book a schedule of that road. At first I was exceedingly tried, but later botanical events made me exceedingly glad I missed it.

Of course I was committed to another night at Sibate, and nothing to change to all dry clothing in Bogota. The hotel at Sibate is the best I've yet seen in the country here, but I'd not call it good at home. A poorly aired room, a bed with clean linen, but which the examination of the previous night had proved to be inhabited by fleas, are not inviting to early retiring. The fare was ordinary. This night I had no one to talk to, and without books or the desire to early repose, the evening proved tedious. I went for a walk on the muddy road, listened to the chorus of frogs, and wished I'd caught the train.

This must be said for Sibate Inn: relatively it was clean and good, and the prices could be brought low. When the evening before we asked about rates for the night they said $1.75 apiece, over night and two meals; we debated possibilities of return further, quite forgetting this item, when the landlady appeared to say $6.00 apiece. Next morning the girl, who seemed to have this business in charge, presented me a paper, $2.20, for the three of us. Of course I protested, whereupon she turned the sheet over and there was written $1.95, which I paid. There are not three sides to a sheet of paper or I think she would have come down to $1.80, the $6.00 rate suggested. For my solitary night she presented me a paper $1.00; I protested; she turned it over and there was written $1.75. Preparedness!

(To be continued.)

EVERY DEED

That comes to thee in God's allotted time
Is just the greatest deed that thine could be,
Since God's high will appointeth it to thee.

—ANNA TEMPLE.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

(Continued from page 404.)

TWELFTH MONTH 18, 1917.

I have been covering glassless windows with oiled linen, so people can more or less hermetically seal their rooms and sleep in comfort and bad air. It is surprising how many different forms a window frame can take and how many different tricks you have to try to get the linen fairly and decently tight and weather-proof, but it seems fairly strong and stands up under strains that I should think would break it all to bits.

The same applies to many roofs that I have climbed over—why they have stood up so long nobody knows, and the question of repairing them is almost impossible of solution. They can be patched up in a fashion, and I suppose that is what the people are used to; if the rain does not fall in the bed-room they seem fairly satisfied, but it does go against the grain to spend days patching something you know ought to be torn down and built over again.

The more I see of the Maire the more I am inclined to trust him and rely on his advice; he doesn't seem to play any favorites, and he rejoices with the people that we help, although he does want us to do some work for him. His house is in good condition, but his barn wants repairing; we, of course, have to devote ourselves to houses until we get the roofs tight and every one in the Commune at least in a dry and fairly tight house.

TWELFTH MONTH 25, 1917.

Last week was about as cold as any weather we have in Philadelphia. It snowed at least a foot on the 16th, and began to freeze hard, and it didn't melt a bit until last night, but the thaw has set in now and the snow is going rapidly. We were asked to make a snow plough by the Maire, and after two days' hard work, a very good plough was made and put into operation; the Maire sent three horses harnessed tandem, and two men to drive them, and followed the plough all around the village on foot.

I joined them on the last stretch and mentioned our Christmas party to the Maire and said we wanted a Christmas tree. These are very scarce—the only one we could find is in the garden next door and is, I think, a yew tree and is very beautiful; he and I went back to look at it, and he did not dare to give me permission to cut it, but took us all around to M. Jacquelin, who is taking care of the property for the owner—a civilian prisoner in Germany; there we ran into a regular afternoon tea party of old women who were sitting around the stove, discussing what women talk about, and the Maire broached our business to M. Jacquelin. She promised to take it up with her husband, who was away from home, but we never heard from him, and so used some cedar tree branches which we fastened up together to make some sort of a tree.

I went around to every house in the village and asked tout le monde to come to the party. It was very amusing to see the change from suspicion or surprise to cordiality in the people when they heard what I had come for. The party was a huge success. It was called at two o'clock and the school children were all there ahead of time, but the school-mistress would not let them into the assembly-room, but locked them up in one of the other rooms.

Fay Murray had bought a whole lot of things with the money we had, and every one of the children had a number of presents, dolls, boats, knives, balls, scissors, sweaters, mittens and stockings. Before they were distributed the children sang songs for us and recited pieces, and one girl of fifteen read a very pretty speech of thanks and the Maire did also. Then we had Parnell do some conjuring tricks, which astonished the natives—the Maire's jaw is still dislocated, I believe. Then the presents were distributed, but were not opened for fear of loss and the party was over.

I believe that this party is the best moral boost that we have been able to give the inhabitants. It woke one family up that we have not been able to interest in anything. They dressed up and enjoyed themselves so perhaps they will begin to show some ambition and interest in our efforts to help them.

On the 23rd we were invited to help celebrate the first Christmas in Roze. I went in with some of the others and met Charles Evans by chance on his way to visit us.

TWELFTH MONTH 30, 1917.

I have gotten over the little attack I had and I was able to carve the turkeys with great enjoyment and enjoy the Christmas dinner to the full. We had a very big and complete dinner—soup, turkey, with chestnut stuffing, mashed potatoes, boiled onions, string beans, fruit salad, pumpkin pie and plum pudding. Next day I was up and working and hung a most refractory door on a barn and put a lock on it. The weather has at last let up and this morning is just above freezing and cloudy.

Yesterday, MacDowell and I walked through the snow and sunshine to Nesle in search of kerosene, some four or five miles, and didn't find any. We called on Dr. Baldwin at his baby hospital and came home again, tired with slipping on the hard snow, and I, at least, soaked with perspiration. When I got home I found a package from the Germantown Hospital, for which I have written a note of acknowledgment to the nurses and doctors.

It is very pleasant to be remembered and encouraged in this way. We have had a very quiet time during the cold weather and holidays, but I hope we can soon get down to business and do some work. We have been confined to inside jobs ever since the snow came. If we can fix up the roofs and windows the people can generally get along very comfortably. I bought some coal for us the other day at nine francs the 100 kilos (200 pounds).

PARIS, First Month 2, 1918.

I left Gruny on the 31st to come here and have a tooth filled—the war bread pulled it out. I had it done this morning at the Red Cross Hospital at Neuilly. I had to come by way of Ham; this meant a twelve or thirteen-mile walk through snow or slush, unless I should be fortunate enough to get a lift, so I left at nine o'clock and was soon in a fine state of perspiration; for the first five miles to Nesle I was not passed by a single thing.

I knew Dr. Baldwin was intending to send some people to Paris that day, so I stopped at his hospital to see if I was in time to get a lift. Just as I entered, another Red Cross man was going in and we opened Dr. B.'s office door to his great indignation, for he hustled us out of the hospital full tilt with the information that they were isolated. We were inside about forty-five seconds, American efficiency; when he got us on the porch he told us that one of his nurses had diphtheria and that there was no moving to Paris that day. The Red Cross man then spoke up and said they had a five-ton truck there to tow another truck back to Ham and they had plenty of room for me. So I wandered down to where the two trucks were standing and found no one. I looked around and located a restaurant, where Cross and Pye-Smith had spent the tail-end of Sixth-day night when they were late on account of snow on the line. It seemed well to eat when I had a chance, so I went in and found three Red Cross men putting on their coats, so I asked them if they were the crew of the car and they said yes; then I asked for a ride and they were very cordial and asked whether I was ready. I said I wanted a cup of coffee and was told there was lots of time—so I sat down to some coffee, that was chocolate when it arrived, and an omelette and jam. I complimented the mistress on her kindness in taking in mes camarades the other night and put on my coats and went out and found them ready to start, so I climbed in with the driver of the first and we were off around narrow streets and corners that I thought the five-ton truck could not negotiate. We were soon out in the country and rolling through the French roads at a great rate. Suddenly, on the white snow alongside the road, I saw a scarlet streamer; I asked what it was and the driver pulled up with an exclamation and jumped off to collect it. It seems it was a message dropped from a German aeronaut to one of their spies—the message was gone, but the paper parachute and the dry cell and incandescent lamp were all there. It was the first time we had run up against one of these things. Of course, the driver collared it, but I am not going in for souvenirs, so I did not mind. Then we went on again and they landed me in Ham so that I reached the equipé while they were at lunch. I drank some coffee and then Ernest Brown took me down to the sentry, where we made friends with him and some soldiers who were also wanting a lift and when a car came along bound for Noyon we were put in it and we bumped off again; it seemed a wonder to me that I held together. But they delivered me at the gare at Noyon in time for me to have a fine hour in the cathedral, which is a very old and beautiful building, and I was very glad that I had an opportunity to see it.

Then I met an American ambulance driver just out of a hospital for gas, going to Paris on permission. We had a delightful dinner and came down second class with a crowd of jolly permissionnaires, one of whom suggested that France needed soldiers more than men to repair houses, but I did not explain to him my position or that my convictions were growing stronger every day and I don't want to have anything to do with that business [of war] in any way I can prevent.

We arrived here on time and I got to the hotel at 10.30 and went to bed. A most restful New Year's Day followed, in the house all day, with most congenial company, while the snow was falling and turning to mud outside.

This A. M. I trotted out to the hospital and had my teeth filled.

Our work is very much interrupted by the bad weather, but we shall soon have winter breaking up I expect. Everybody in Paris is very cheerful and hopeful about the work, and the repair and social work in Verdun is looming up, and if it brings the whole mission together it certainly sounds attractive to me, but the winters here do not appeal to me a bit. If that work could be started next summer and I could go down there for three or six months, I should like to do so, for workers and hands are the most useful gift we can give France at present.

J. H. H.

(To be continued.)

NEWS ITEMS.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

150 ADDITIONAL MEN WANTED IMMEDIATELY FOR SERVICE IN FRANCE.

A few weeks ago there came to us from the American Red Cross in France a call for 300 men at the rate of 25 a week. Toward this call we have selected over 100 men. We expect to select a few others from applications already on file. We need, however, a large number of new applications to provide at least 150 men fitted for the work we are doing.

This call means that our dreams of the past few months have come true. It means that the American Red Cross has decided to give Friends the largest place in the beginnings of reconstruction. When one considers all the possibilities which this call opens up, it seems clear there has been no greater single opportunity in the whole history of the Society of Friends.

Do you ask what 300 men can accomplish in the face of such a gigantic need? Read the answer in this record of English Friends:

"With an average number of 90 workers, English Friends during their first thirty months in France, helped 309 villages, 11,431 families, 35,200 persons; distributed 33,759 articles of clothing and household supplies and farming implements and seeds to the value of 126,750 francs."

The opportunity gets its chief significance, however, from the fact that these 300, together with the 316 English and American Friends now in France, may lay the foundation for the greater reconstruction to follow. They are to acquire knowledge of a task for which there is no existing precedent or standard. They are to work out the plans that will become the patterns for the future work of a vastly larger scope. It is one thing to merely send over 300 or 500 men to grapple with an undertaking that requires thousands of men; it is a different thing when these few hundred men have the largest place in the beginnings of the work which the thousands must finish.

YOUNG FRIENDS OF DRAFT AGE!—Is not this your call to service? Should not some also who are below or above draft age find in this work a call of duty that outweighs other obligations. In this appeal for men we repeat the suggestion which we earnestly advanced in our first call last Sixth Month—namely, that all applicants consider carefully the demands of other possible fields of service. For many, the most important, although, perhaps, most difficult, tasks may be the usual ones here at home. The one great thing that has made the Friends' work in France such a success is the compelling sense of duty under which the workers have done their work.

In assisting Friends to decide what is the path of duty we give the following brief outline of the nature of the work that is calling for the service of American Friends. You know all about your other obligations; it is our function to tell you something of this great work that some Friends somewhere should feel called to do.

ARE YOU A CARPENTER?—Have you had some experience with carpenter's tools? In France there are a million people and more whose homes exist only in memory. You can help restore the physical basis around which some of these homes can be built again. Some of these 300 men will be engaged in the manufacture of the sections for the portable houses to be erected on the ruined sites of the former homes. Men with planing-mill experience are most valuable for this work, but other experience in working with wood may be sufficient.

Others will be engaged in erecting these houses in the destroyed villages in the war zone.

The service is wider, however, than this physical reconstruction. Have you read the letters from our men in France, telling of the smiles that gradually came back to saddened faces of old men and women, of the spirit of play that returned to children, as a result of the contagious good spirits of our workers? The Christmas entertainment described in Parvin Russell's letter, printed in THE FRIEND, was itself worth sending over this group of twenty who have been reconstructing Gruny.

A considerable number of men will be used in erecting temporary civilian hospitals of the demountable type.

A group of five of our first Unit were sent out by the Red Cross to erect a group of hospital buildings. They completed in five days a job that was expected to take two weeks, and their work was highly commended in one of the Red Cross Bulletins in France.

Another group of our men completely remodeled an old chateau into a modern hospital. Almost all hospitals have been taken over by the army and a civil population in unusual need of hospital care is dependent for health, and in many cases for life itself, upon such work as this.

ARE YOU A MECHANIC?—Have you experience of any kind in working with machinery? The call we have from France asks for a large number of such men. Some will be used in our factories for making sections of portable houses. Others will be used for repair work at our agricultural centers and in the villages we are reconstructing.

A vast amount of machinery of all kinds is standing idle in France for lack of any available men to make necessary repairs.

ARE YOU A FARMER?—There are thousands of acres of good land in France that are being claimed by an increasing growth of weeds because of lack of labor. Friends now maintain three agricultural centres from which farm machinery is loaned or rented, and other centres are to be manned by the farmers who answer this call for 300 men.

Every acre restored to cultivation in France is worth several acres here, owing to the resulting saving of the expense of shipping food from this country.

More is at stake than the increase of the food supply—important as this is. In order to restore the life of the French villages more is necessary than the building of houses; the people must be given an occupation. The farmers of France do not live on their land, but gather together in small villages. It is thus necessary to start again the agricultural life of a community in order that the refugees may return to their destroyed homes.

DO YOU SPEAK FRENCH?—Hundreds of thousands of refugees are crowded together under sadly congested conditions in the cities and towns just back of the war-zone. Persons who can speak their language and thus learn their wants are needed to assist in relieving conditions that are one of the most serious menaces to the future of France.

ARE YOU ONE OF THE MANY WHO HAS NO SPECIAL TRAINING IN THE WORK ABOVE DESCRIBED?—Some of the most valuable members of our first Unit are business or professional men who had no technical training in any of the artisan or social work we are doing. The conditions are so different from anything previously known that all of the men, however, technically trained, must learn much of the work on the field. Men without past training, but able to adapt themselves to new conditions and work, may be very valuable.

EXEMPTION FOR MEN IN THIS WORK.—The War Department has not yet issued a general ruling exempting Friends of draft age for this work. We have been able to secure exemption from the various Exemption Boards for all the members of the first Unit who were in the first draft. We hope to have the same success with a large number of men in the second draft, although we also hope that by that time a general ruling from Washington will make such an effort unnecessary.

We have decided to continue sending men subject to the risk of having to bring them back if drafted later. This risk is all ours, since we pay all expenses and the men, if they have to return, are in no worse position than if they had not gone. They may be in a much better position, since we may be able to secure exemption for those already in France. There is practically no chance of securing exemption from Exemption Boards for men who have not entered the work before the time of the second draft. Many men now in military camps could be in France if they had volunteered for our work earlier. Information we have had from a number of sources recently indicates that the risk mentioned above is not great, but we wish all possible applicants thoroughly to understand the situation.

For application blanks write to this Committee at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. We shall also be glad to furnish any additional information. All persons should feel free to take up with us any personal problems that raise difficulties in connection with entering this service; we may be able to assist in the solution of them.

THREE WOMEN WANTED FOR EARLIEST POSSIBLE SAILING.—We have an urgent call from France for one nurse and two women for social work. (A previous experience for this social work is not so important, and all Friends who speak French are urged to apply.)

VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

[The suspension of business on Second-days makes it quite impossible to include items of news the week they are received. We print the following in spite of the fact that conditions may be totally changed when read.—Eds.]

There is an evident intention on the part of the commander, General Nicholson, and the higher officers at Camp Meade, to treat our young men detained there, in accordance with the instructions of the Secretary of War, which provides that punishment shall not be meted out for failure to obey military orders.

As long as the "C. O." groups are in direct charge of subordinate officers, just so long is ill treatment to be expected.

Information reached Philadelphia by wire late on the twenty-second ult., that there was trouble at Camp Meade. Plans were promptly made for an early start next morning to the camp. Paul J. Furnas and Wm. B. Harvey were met in Baltimore by interested Friends, who accompanied them to the Cantonment. Putting it briefly, a Friend, for refusing certain service which, for conscientious reasons he felt he could not perform, was told to defend himself with his fists. This he did not do, but was then ordered to be knocked down. The deed was repeated. Though much aggrieved, the Friend did not want the officer who was responsible for this gross treatment to be punished, and requested that the incident should not be reported. The offense was repeated after a few days with more serious consequences, and a comrade abused for showing sympathy for the injured man. As a result the whole group of conscientious objectors in the camp, nearly 150 in number, refused to perform any kitchen duty; not only that, they had not for days taken their meals at the Army Mess Barracks—depending on what they might buy at the Canteen, or from such individual supplies as they might happen to possess.

A kindly disposed captain from Headquarters, which department was visited on entering camp, went with the visitors, and gave assurance that he would take steps to straighten matters out.

Announcement of the official definition for non-combatant service would relieve a tension which exists not only at Camp Meade, but in many other places, as well as with not a few of us whose sympathies go out for the testimony bearers who must bear the brunt of attacks.

WM. B. HARVEY.

First Month 26, 1918.

JOSEPH H. HAINES, whose letters have been appearing in our paper, writes to inquire whether Friends have copies of "Baedeker's Paris," which they could contribute to the Friends' Unit. Such may be sent to 20 S. Twelfth Street.

[The following is printed at the request of officials of the Young Women's Christian Association.—Eds.]

The absurd story, widely circulated in the daily press, that three thousand girls had been hired by the Young Women's Christian Association to dance with soldiers at Camp Lewis, Washington State, under ministerial chaperons, is denied in every particular by the National Board and by the local association officials in Seattle. The news agency which sent out the story subsequently sent out a denial.

NEWS OF BARNESVILLE FRIENDS.—As usual, the New Year season was made a time of reunion by Ohio Friends (Conservative) when they gathered at the Boarding School at Barnesville and enjoyed a time of conferences and meetings together. Their Boarding School has this year an enrollment of some seventy pupils. Carroll Brown, of Westtown, while in attendance at the Barnesville group meeting, gave a splendid address to the Student Government Associations.

Wilmer J. Young, of Iowa, now a teacher at Westtown, gave a very strong and appealing message First-day evening, Twelfth Month 30, on "Individuality and Leadership."

At the educational meeting Carroll Brown gave a good address on "Teachers and What They Should Be." All the primary school teachers of the Yearly Meeting were present as well as nearly two hundred other Friends.

The Yearly Meeting through its Meeting for Sufferings is taking active steps toward looking after their young members in relation to the draft situation. A special committee has been appointed to counsel with and assist the young men, those appointed being Charles Livezey, of Barnesville, and Elisha B. Steer, of Salem. They have visited Camp Sherman several times and have been of real service to the young men in many ways. Special Committees have been appointed in the Particular Meetings which really constitute the Yearly Meeting Service Committee corresponding to such committees in other Yearly Meetings.

Francis R. Taylor, of Philadelphia, addressed several groups and meetings of Friends in Ohio recently on Reconstruction Work in France. His addresses were very much appreciated and made us feel much better acquainted with the American Friends' Service Committee and its task. Women's War Relief Clubs have already been organized and are working in practically every meeting in the Yearly Meeting.—From the American Friend.

WESTTOWN NOTES.—The boys and girls are enjoying the winter sports. The ice coating on the ground has made coasting and even skating possible almost everywhere. The ball field has been almost completely covered with smooth ice and has furnished good skating at the noon-hour. Some boys have been having fine sport with an ice sail, both on the lake and on the campus. Several times the surface of the ice on the lake has been roughened or covered with snow. The latter difficulty has been overcome by the snow plows. The former is corrected by an ice plane that really works. Former Westontonians will remember the years of fruitless effort to plane the ice. The plane we now have works on the same principle as an ordinary wood plane and is very successful.

For about a week we have been seriously handicapped by a low-water supply. Water is furnished from driven wells, located in the valley of Chester Creek, whence it is pumped to the School by a pump in the Old Mill. When the supply from this source proves inadequate, water is forced from the driven well north of the engine-house by an air lift pump. About a week ago the supply from the valley suddenly ceased. The pump was thoroughly overhauled, but the difficulty was not overcome. Examination of the pipe from the wells to the pump disclosed a broken flange in the pipe. This was corrected, the pump was started, but the water did not rise in the tanks. All the time the air-lift pump was working night and day, but it was unable to raise the water in the tanks, beyond a supply for the barest necessities. On Fourth-day of last week a large leak was located north of the building, in an underground pipe. On account of the heavy frost the water failed for a long time to come to the surface. Nearly our whole supply was thus drained away. This pipe was mended in the late afternoon of that day and since that time no difficulty has been experienced. The work has been a strain on Dean and Joseph Stanton and their men. With the ground frozen and with the severe cold they have worked at a great disadvantage.

The last Visiting Committee were at the School a week or two ago. We particularly enjoyed this visit. The Committee included two former superintendents, a former matron, and one former member of the faculty. The students as well as the teachers enjoy the contact with these older Friends, even though it may seem to some of them that their influence here is negligible.

On First Month 13th, Paul J. Furnas, Field Secretary of the American Friends' Service Committee, spoke to the School in a joint collection. He secured the closest attention from all with his recital of some of the evidences of faithfulness to Christian standards that many young Friends are giving in the camps. His statement of the probable needs of the future and its call to dedicated service was particularly convincing.

Our meetings since vacation have been much helped by the services of visiting Friends. While we do not wish in any sense to depend solely upon this service, it often brings a freshness of vision which is helpful. We were impressed particularly by the words of Mansaka Nakamura, spoken in Japanese, and translated by Gilbert Bowles.

The first half year at Westtown ended on First Month 26th. At the time of writing it is impossible to give an accurate statement of the scholarship record. But there is a strong belief that it has been better than for some years.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

MAISON DE LA VIGNE VERTE, GRUNY, SOMME, FRANCE.

Twelfth Month 30, 1917.

To begin with, the little school here had to be discontinued when the Germans took possession in 1914, and since they almost demolished it when leaving last Spring, one of our first steps was to rebuild the large holes in the brick walls, put on a good slate roof and replace the broken windows and doors. As a result, school was started again this fall in one small room, the teacher using a table for herself having neither books nor blackboard, very few pencils or other equipment—not even a separate chair for herself, and the children, ranging from about five to twelve years, all together and seated on plain benches with no back supports (except as they might lean against the wall) and with nothing to write on except several old flat-top tables. To add to the difficulties of equipment and environment, they may imagine what a proposition it was to handle the older children who had experienced nothing more than a desultory sort of home discipline for three years. Practically none of the older children could read, and progress was of course exceedingly slow. But with time, a much larger room was put in shape, accommodating a number of nice new desks of graded sizes, the walls had been whitewashed to improve the light, and about two weeks before Christmas the school moved into the new room. It was almost pathetic that in the necessary haste of preparing for them, we could only put up a long board with a number of nails in it as a coat-rack, but of course it is the essential usefulness that counts and not appearances, now. There is a consignment of new books arrived, and other equipment, putting the school on a working basis once more, and all as a precedent for our Christmas party!

Four of the fellows in our group here had received a considerable sum of money from some friends in New York, to provide a real Christmas for the children of the village. Plans had been arranged well in advance, and one of the boys had gone to Paris to obtain the necessary gifts, useful and entertaining. The room had been well decorated with pine sprigs and cedar and a good-sized tree had been very attractively trimmed with colored paper and little stars, etc. The day before Christmas we all gathered, and the village turned out in unanimous response to the house-to-house invitation that had been extended. Not only interest brought them but a large degree of pride, for it had been arranged with the teacher to have a number of recitations and songs by the boys and girls, and who can deny that each fond parent was hoping that her boy or girl would do especial justice to the occasion (and of course to the family)? There was no question as to punctuality, for the eagerness of excited youngsters was but slightly concealed by the dignity of their parents' added years, and sharp on the hour there were about thirty-five children and fifty men and women ready for the opening music of our three-piece improvised orchestra. How those childish faces overflowed with anticipation! The bright clean dresses and neatly-combed hair were indeed evidences of an unusual occasion, but most convincing was the aroma of laundry soap which had been applied with peasant thoroughness, and I don't believe that even the youngest had been spared!

There were about eight recitations by the children, and although we couldn't catch all the meaning of their words, there was the universal confidence of one, the timidity of another, the forgetfulness of a third, all submerged by the triumph of the tiniest, who spoke the praises of her "petit doigt," holding her chubby little finger isolated with difficulty from the others, out before her as an illustration. Perhaps I have emphasized too much the interest of the French children, for there was never a more fascinated audience than the young Friends who bordered the room, including Charles Evans and several others from a neighboring quai at Ham. Much as we enjoyed the performances of the children, however, it was none other than the Mayor who afforded us the most genuine amusement of the day. One of our men, Farnell, was performing a number of tricks, among which was the feature of apparently swallowing a dozen needles and a yard of thread, separately, and then drawing the thread out with the needles, all dangling from it, neatly threaded. There was not a face but was blank with amazement and wonder, but the Mayor, with all dignity forsaken, leaned forward with mouth wide open and with tongue describing the most comical movements as the needles, one after another, issued from Farnell's lips. That picture will only die with memory itself.

When the moment came for the distribution of the gifts, thirty-five boys and girls were transported into a state of anxious ecstasy, for, although the bundles had been carefully prepared and each one labeled with a name, who could tell but that one name might have been lost or one bundle misplaced? So the little hearts thumped and the fears grew, as one after another, the names were called, and the packages beneath the tree became fewer and fewer, but how the waiting faces lit up at the sound of their respective names, and how the little forms forsook their places with the alacrity of corn in the popper when all the fears of a possible disappointment dissolved in an armful of wonders!

Then with the sincerity of a real appreciation, a young girl read an expression of gratefulness written by an elderly man, the father of the teacher; a much younger girl read another similar expression, as coming from the school, and finally, with shaking hand and earnest voice, the Mayor stood up in the midst of his people to give his word of gratitude in the name of the Commune. Those few moments more than justified every sacrifice that Friends have made to insure the effectiveness of this work, and in the course of time many of you may have the opportunity of reading these appreciations. The stimulus of the day will live long for those of us who experienced it, but I doubt if the memory of Christmas returned again after three years will fade any sooner in the lives of the girls who went to sleep that night, hugging their new dolls, or the boys who could hardly wait till morning to wear their new sweaters.

That is the story of Christmas in Gruny. I hope it is not too lengthy, but at the same time I would give a great deal if you could picture in some way what it has meant to the village and to us.

PARVIN M. RUSSELL.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING FIRST MONTH 26, 1918:

Received from 13 Individuals	$1,734.75
Received from 25 Meetings	4,163.42
Armenian and Syrian Relief	79.42

$5,977.59

CHARLES F. JENKINS,

Treasurer.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following letter was addressed to the Editor of THE FRIEND. It is probable the writer had knowledge of our publication from English Friends who visit the military prison. The letter passed the censor and was forwarded by the British Government without postage. [Eds.]

CAMP III, COMPOUND 5, HIT VI, KNOCKLOE CAMP,
ISLE OF MAN, ENGLAND, Twelfth Month 29, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND:—Having been interned here as a P. O. W. for nearly three-and-a-half years I take the liberty of asking you to do me a favor. Could you give me the address of a true Christian Friend, who may be so kind to help me in the following matter: I kept a large mission-house for the poor and homeless (Black Cross Mission; Schwarzes Kreuz) in Breslau, Germany, for some years, and also a smaller one in London, where poor men and women, regardless of confession and nationality, received help, food, clothing and every possible help entirely free of charge. The expenses were covered by the sale of a mission paper edited by myself. The German edition reached 200,000 copies a month; the English one about 100,000 a month. Loving the Lord and all my poor fellow creatures from the bottom of my heart and strongly opposed against war and militarism, etc., on Scriptural foundations, I have not been connected with any church or society. Through my writings and preachings on these principles, my way back to Germany is blocked by court martial proceedings. Some dear Christians holding the same opinions have been shot and many others heavily punished by long internments. I see no way to settle again neither in England nor in Germany after the war. I intend to emigrate to America or anywhere else, as soon as I get released. My opinion is, if the Lord will, to find some work in the States agreeable for a Christian of thirty-nine, married, no children. But having lost through this terrible war everything, I need the help of a Christian friend over there, who is willing to secure a passage for me and my dear wife from London to the States, for which, of course, I shall D. V. repay in due time, and who would be so kind to take charge of us when landing if there are any difficulties by immigration. Hoping to hear from you at your earliest, I remain, yours in His ever blessed Spirit and Love,

MISSIONARY WILLIAM DETTLEICH.

P. O. W., 15725.

THE WARHOUSE, 22 NEW STREET SQUARE,
LONDON, E. C. 4, Twelfth Month 21, 1917.

WM. T. ELKINTON, 121 S. THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

DEAR FRIEND:—I am very glad to report that the five cases and two barrels ex. S. S. Mackinaw, have arrived safely. We have not yet unpacked them and will not be able to do so until the New Year. How we wish that that New Year might bring to us peace. I was ever so glad to see some of the things that President Wilson said in his speech, and we are very thankful for Lord Lansdowne's timely letter. I feel sometimes rather at sea with regard to the different policies that seem put forward by the statesmen of the differing countries. I believe that President Wilson and Lord Lansdowne and H. Asquith, mean much the same in principle; they may have different ideas as to the carrying out of those principles, and they are a great advance on some of the things we are told we are fighting for. But to-day I am feeling rather depressed because I understand now that we are supposed to be seeking for a military victory. Surely that is not true, surely those young men who enlisted at the beginning of the war had no such idea in their minds; they enlisted for the right, for the suppression of tyranny, for the protection of small nations. If we could get those results by negotiation, which will have to be resorted to in the end, why not begin to palaver now. We seem to be missing even the moral state of savages. Who can think of sending more men to the awfulness of the trenches and the slaughter and maiming for a military victory! It seems to me beyond words to contemplate. Folk-talk of never trusting the Germans again. It may be difficult, but have they ever tried trusting anyone who has done them a great injury. It is not easy, I know, but by the grace of God it can be done. And it is the only way. I am so convinced of this, and we know so desperately the horrors of war. Why we who are not in it have relations who are maimed and killed till one's heart is wrung. We have those we love who are in prison, and we know that they suffer, though we know that they are standing for the right in a way that seems the only one in such times. And what will be the gain of a military victory; to us women it means less, it means food shortage, it means the suffering of the children and of our men, and we know that there are other methods available. It seems to me too awful to play with human lives to gain such a thing as that. I suppose it is because we think that we must be in a position to dictate to those we call enemies what shall be done in the future—Dictate! Does God dictate in His moral world? We know that He does not, that He will only win by love, and His patience is beyond words, and His trust is such that He leaves us to choose good or evil, though He tries to get us to choose the good. Have you read Bahindra Nath Tagore's essay on soul consciousness? It is very excellent, and I delight to find unity with the spirit of the East, which is a part of the universal spirit of God. We may differ in many things, but in some we understand each other and are in unity. He says that in the realm of nature God's laws are unmovable; they work by cause and effect and they cannot be altered. But when we come to the world of the spirit we find a different rule; God stands on one side and waits till love wins. He will never force Himself on any soul, He must be the invited guest. If this is true to life, and I believe it is eternally true, we must see that we are on the wrong methods if we aim for military victory, and I dread the consequences of any such aim.

I believe that it is for nations as well as individuals to pray God to search us and know us. It is not an easy prayer to make truthfully, for His light will, and does show up some terrible things within, but to be honest with ourselves is necessary and we find it very difficult. That is what makes me so sad, because one feels that we say all sorts of things and they are really self-deception. We try to make it look right in the eyes of others, and underneath we are really aiming at something else. To me to aim at a "military victory" is so far away from anything that was said as to war aims at the beginning, I cannot understand it, it is to aim at power to dictate and we were supposed to be fighting against the will to dominate and dictate. Well, the world is a queer place, and it is not easy to live in it, but how we long that all such ideas should be got rid of, and that we see that only by conference and discussion can any settlement be arrived at. It nearly makes me weep when I see men going to the front. It is about the most terrible sight we have. Perhaps a raid and the wounded is as bad, but I have generally been sheltered during one of these and otherwise have run home between the barrage fire. It is all too desperate for words, and somehow I have just had to talk to you because I feel that we must never lower our aims, whether it is in the work of relief or any other part of our life, and it grieves one if the nation is going to lower its aims to gain something we do not want.

Pardon my long ramble, but I feel rather dreadful about such a thing, it horrifies and frightens me.

ETHEL M. ASHBY.

NOTICES.

MEETINGS for Worship regularly held at Mansfield, N. J., both on First and Fifth-days, at ten o'clock, will now be held until further notice at the home of John B. Comfort, in Columbus. Monthly Meetings will be held as heretofore at the Meeting-house.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:—

- Barton—Religions of the World.
- Canfield—Understood Betsy.
- Graham—William Penn.
- Grubb—What is Quakerism?
- Jastrow—Civilization of Babylonia and Assyria.
- Keith—Chronicles of Pennsylvania.
- Kennedy—Pan-Angles.
- Law—Power of Mental Demand.
- Littleboy—Day of Our Visitation.
- Sikhovskiy—In Far Northeast Siberia.

LINDA A. MOORE,
Librarian.

MEETINGS from Second Month 10th to 16th:—

- Concord Quarterly Meeting, at Media, Third-day, Second Month 12th, at 10.30 A. M.
- Calm Quarterly Meeting, at Coatesville, Sixth-day, Second Month 15th, at 10 A. M.
- Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Western District, Twelfth below Market, Fourth-day, Second Month 13th, at 5 P. M. Business session at 7 P. M.
- Burlington, Fifth-day, Second Month 14th, at 10.30 A. M.

DIED.—At Wilkes-Barre, Pa., First Month 4, 1918, LOUISA W. HEACOCK, daughter of the late Samuel and Susan Heacock, of Benton, Pa., in the fifty-seventh year of her age; a member of Greenwood Particular and Muncy Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pa.

—, First Month 5, 1918, at his home in Moorestown, N. J., AMOS E. KAUGIN, in the eightieth year of his age; a member and Elder of Chester, N. J., Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at Lansdowne, Pa., First Month 18, 1917, HENRY MENDENHALL, in the ninety-fourth year of his age; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting.

—, at the residence of her son-in-law, Henry H. Goddard, Vineland, N. J., First Month 20, 1918, MARY L. ROBBINS, of Winthrop Centre, Maine, in the eighty-sixth year of her age.

—, at her home, near Millville, Pa., First Month 24, 1918, C. LOUISE BRACKMAN, daughter of the late Henry and Dorothy Brackman.

WM. H. PYLE'S SONS, PRINTERS,
NO. 422 WALNUT STREET, PHILA., PA.

FOUNDED 1865.

THE PROVIDENT
LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY
OF PHILADELPHIA

Have you thought of the need of additional Life Insurance to cover Inheritance Taxes?

Write for Information

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.
COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: LOCUST 243
RACK 661

WISSAHICKON INN
REDLANDS,
CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley. At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent rooms for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address

A. B. JOHNSON.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
3714 SANSON STREET

Engraving and Printing
FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY
Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting Cards. Die Stamped Writing Paper
TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years Medical 13

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The 'Teen Age in the First-day School.'" A course given by W. Edward Raffety, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of 'The Survey,' New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDBERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Solicited

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA

Starts open until 10:30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only

Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE

WANTED—IMMEDIATELY—FOR SERVICE in France. (Earliest Possible Sailing) for one more experienced in operating wood-working machinery. We have a special cable request to supply urgent need. One Nurse, Two Women for Social Work. A prerequisite for this social work is a speaking knowledge of French. Past experience in social work is not so important, and all Friends who speak French are urged to apply. Send inquiries or applications to American Friends' Service Committee, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

"THE DAY OF OUR VISITATION."

The Swarthmore Lecture for 1917. By William Littleboy, Cloth, 55 Cents. Postage, Paper, 30 Cents. Friends' Lecture delivered at Devonshire House, Bishopgate, on Fifth Month 22nd, at the opening of the Friends' Yearly Meeting.

"THE QUEST FOR TRUTH."

By Silvanus P. Thompson, F. R. S. Cloth, 55 Cents. Postage, Paper, 30 Cents. Friends' Lecture published as the Swarthmore Lecture of 1915. It quickly ran out of print, and in response to many requests a New Edition has been prepared.

FOR SALE BY

Friends' Book and Tract Committee
144 East Twentieth Street NEW YORK CITY

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.

Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street PHILADELPHIA, PA.

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

ASSOC. M. AM. SOC. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. : : PHILA.

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

Genealogist Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 S. Stockton St., Trenton, I. I.

WANTED—PERSON TO DO TYPEWRITING, in country, on Friends' History.

Address ANNA M. P. DE COE, N. J.

WANTED—BY A PERSON OF REFINEMENT, education, and large experience—a position to care for an aged person or an aged couple and their home, or to care for motherless children and their home.

Address S. S. "THE FRIEND," 207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—A COMPANIONABLE YOUNG WOMAN to assist with children, where other help is kept.

Address "THE FRIEND," 207 Walnut Place.

WANTED—BY A YOUNG LADY, FOND OF elderly people and children, a position to care for either, from 2 until 4 o'clock each day; has nursed in a Friends' family for three years.

Address "C" Atlantic Street, Toga, Pa.

A MOTHER, WITH DAUGHTER, AGED NINE, DE-sires a home for the winter in a quiet family of Friends. References. Address M. E. K., Office of "THE FRIEND."

A 60 inch three-ply
RHODS
DRIVING BELT

J. E. RHODS AND SONS

PHILADELPHIA NEW YORK CHICAGO

THE OSCEOLA

ORLANDO, FLA.

Opens First Month First, 1918

JOSHUA W. HURLEY, Manager

Friends' Meeting at Hotel.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN

JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of

RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

GERMANTOWN
FRIENDS' SCHOOL

will need for the academic year 1918-1919 an assistant secretary, familiar with bookkeeping and general office work, who will have some duties in supervising study rooms; and also an assistant in the Primary Department.

For this last position a teacher of some experience is needed. The duties will include assisting in the third year work; supervising writing; helping on the playground; and if possible conducting simple classes in sloyd and other hand work, and coaching irregular pupils.

Application should be made to

STANLEY R. YARNALL, Principal
Germantown Friends' School
Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton

TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-51 . . . Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St.

Philadelphia.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE

SPRUCE 1848

Five Opportunities in
Public Utility Bonds

Public Utilities stand third in the coal priority order of the Fuel Administrator

PUBLIC UTILITIES are a powerful factor, both directly and indirectly, in the prosecution of the war.

Their efficiency and prosperity are indispensable to communities at all times. They are the arteries which feed our every-day development.

There are five public utility bond issues of unusual attractiveness, yielding from 6.00% to 6.85%, to which we invite your special attention.

Send for Circular PF-153

The National City
Company

National City Bank Bldg., New York
1421 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

A COMPLETE LINE
OF

NURSERY STOCK

FRUIT TREES,
ORNAMENTAL TREES,
SHRUBS,
SMALL FRUITS,
ROSES,
CLEMATIS,
HEDGE PLANTS.

The Rakestraw-Pyle Company
KENNETT SQUARE, PA.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, SECOND MONTH 14, 1918.

No. 33.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"An alarming weakness among Christians is that we are producing Christian activities faster than we are producing Christian experiences and Christian faith; that the discipline of our souls and the deepening of our acquaintance with God are not proving sufficiently thorough to enable us to meet the unprecedented expansion of opportunity and responsibility of our generation."—John R. Mott.

NEWNESS.

Newness may very properly be put down as a specific mark of the spiritual life. The Scripture warrant for this is in the familiar text, "old things are passed away; behold they are become new." Weymouth's translation reads, "the old state of things has passed away; a new state of things has come into existence." (2 Corinthians v: 17.) Perhaps the crux of the text is in the fact that it is the "old things" that "are become new." The poet Whittier has a beautiful verse, often quoted, in which this process of transformation is very feelingly expressed:

"The world sits at the feet of Christ,
Unknowing, blind and unconsol'd,
It yet shall touch His garment's fold,
And feel the heavenly Alchemist Transform its very dust to gold."

—The Over-Heart.

The spiritual process as wrought by the Gospel exalts the heroism of the commonplace. The lives of most of us are made up of very ordinary material. Our ways are humdrum, our tasks obscure. We plod on in dull routine and dream of far away experiences much more worthy of our high destiny. And all the while we miss the miracle of the Gospel experience. It actually takes the very "dust of life" and transforms it into gold.

An American historian made himself famous by a study of the frontier in American life. He showed how a noble spirit of adventure, sometimes alas, a sordid spirit as well, had drawn our people into new territory, had girded them for new struggles with forbidding conditions until our whole area from the Atlantic to the Pacific had become settled. He turned to the annals of Congress to find that a hundred years of legislation had dealt mainly with frontier problems. All the evidence he could summon from any source made it plain that the frontier had shaped our history and in good degree moulded our American type of character. Now the motive power in all this national activity was in large part the innate desire in the human species for newness. Mere physical comfort, the strongest sentiments of family life, endless counsels about "rolling stones," could not hold young America to the home environment. With the whole expanse of our territory explored, however, what has happened to this spirit of adventure? It is easy to recognize that in one form and another it still persists, but it is also true that the law of the spiritual world in regard to making old things new has a counterpart in the material domain. So it comes to pass that great energy is now expended everywhere in doing old things in new ways.

Our interest for the present is with the law in the religious world and especially with its effect upon the organizations of religious life. We have cited the frontier doctrine of Professor Adams merely as an illustration. All old and well-established denominations are forced to face what is now generally described as leakage. It is difficult to hold a rising generation to an inherited membership in a church organization. This is not merely a problem of a birthright membership as we sometimes suppose. The dozen or more denominations whose official publications come to our office all have the same plaint. How can we hold the young? How can we convince them that the fold of their fathers offers as large an opportunity for service as some other environment new and strange to them?

This is truly no simple problem. It is a complex, we may readily believe, of many problems. No one perhaps would question that the spirit of adventure—the desire for newness is a dominant influence in these problems. At any event, we make bold to claim that the average type of Christian in all the denominations has fallen far below this possibility of having the "dust of life" transmuted into gold.

Christianity is a challenge for most noble and most daring adventure. It carries young men and women into difficulties and dangers untold. We are thrilled with their heroism and ready to give our utmost to further their high adventure. The religious life, however, can not be permanently maintained on this platform. The bulk of us are after all confined by stern necessity to much more restricted fields of service. Must we believe then that the "noble and daring adventure" is not for us? It seems clear that there is unlimited territory ready to our hand—that we have failed to appreciate the infinite resources of this "new state of things" that will come into existence in proportion as we actually become "new creatures." All religious societies wait longingly for a method of applying this principle to their membership. A new type of Christian seems to be needed—a type that will satisfy the highest aspiration of the young, present the noblest possible venture of faith and of life, and yet hold society to the prose of every day duty with vitality and enthusiasm.

It seems little other than a vague generality to say that this is to be accomplished by a new type of Christian. All are agreed upon the Archetype. His teachings are known. His ideal of service proclaimed. His sacrificial life exalted. Why is the average product so tame and lifeless? The text might make it clear. Old things become new, "if any man is in Christ." That proclaims an experience, not the recognition of a principle, or a cult, or a man merely. Barnabas won the Jerusalem disciples to Paul by relating to them "how he had seen the Lord." That is what being in Him involves. He becomes a first-hand, everyday reality. Each day is a new adventure of faith. Every person we meet is a new ambassador from Him. Those children who maintained a Friends' meeting in the streets of Bristol when their parents had been carried off to jail and the meeting-house locked against them "had seen the Lord." No higher adventure than serving Him there in Bristol could entice them. There is no hope and no desire of reproducing those conditions. Quite as clearly there is no hope of arresting leakage in our Society or in any of the multiplied organizations, apart from such experience. Some seeming new adventure may appear to attract tremendous interest and energy. The only thing that can hold it, is the life "new every morning."

Instead of new fields of adventure, or in addition to them, let us learn how to present the experience of Newness. Thus shall we find a constantly growing frontier to entice adventurous youth. We have long presented the New Heaven. Do we not need to know better how to present the New Earth?

J. H. B.

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

The recent death of a prominent Unitarian minister of one of our neighboring cities recalls his visit, a few years ago, to one of our country meetings. Being in the village, he attended the small mid-week meeting, concerning which he gave the following account to a member of the meeting, some three years afterward. Soon after taking his seat, he said, a company of about a dozen came in and quietly took their seats. As the silence settled over the meeting, he at first felt the waiting attitude of a spectator. This was followed by a nervous anxiety for something to be done, for something to begin, until in his nervousness, he could hardly contain himself in the continued silence. Looking into the faces of the company and listening to the voices of the birds which floated in from the near-by trees, he felt this nervousness leaving, and gradually the spirit of worship so enveloped him in the solemn silence that never in his life had he felt such "at-oneness" with his Heavenly Father as he was then favored with. This experience was related by him in his own pulpit, and repeatedly thereafter he would ask his people to observe times of silent waiting in their public worship.

Is not the holding of such meetings worth while? If others coming amongst us, feel the overshadowing presence of the Most High and leave such a testimony, why should we grow discouraged because of the fewness of our numbers, or the failure of the many to appreciate the worship that characterizes a true Friends' meeting. May the same concern possess us as it did those who have preceded us that "all our meetings be held in the power of God."

CARL PATTERSON.

CHESTERHILL, OHIO, First Month 26, 1918.

JESSE H. DEWEES.

Knowing that many Friends are interested, I thought a brief account of the sad accident which caused the death of our valued Friend, Jesse H. Dewees, would be of interest to the readers of THE FRIEND.

On Third-day afternoon, First Month 22nd, he and his father, Thomas Dewees, were engaged in cutting down a dead tree that was hollow at the butt. As the tree started to fall each ran in different directions. Jesse in getting away ran into a snow-drift and before he could get out of it the tree swung around and fell across him at the hips. A snag of a limb just grazed his side and caught his coat, pinning him down. Being unable to move the tree, his father dug the snow out from under him so he could draw the sufferer from underneath it.

Making him as comfortable as he could, he ran to the house, about a quarter of a mile distant, to summon help. Fortunately a man in a sleigh was passing and he was pressed into service. Upon returning to the injured man they were joined by Jesse's brother-in-law, John A. Binns, and were able to lift him into the sleigh and take him to the house. As they reached the house, the doctor who had been summoned arrived, and upon a hasty examination found there were serious injuries.

He was taken at once to the hospital, where it was found the right leg was broken just above the knee, the hip crushed and serious internal injuries.

He was made as comfortable as possible and preparations made to operate should he be able to stand it. On account of the loss of blood due to internal hemorrhages he did not have strength and by the next morning it was evident nothing could be done to save him.

His wife, father and mother were taken to his bedside and remained there until the end came, about three P. M., Fourth-day, the 23rd, nearly twenty-four hours after the accident.

He was conscious all the time and the family were comforted with the assurance he gave them that he felt nothing in his way and he believed the All Wise Father who noted the sparrow's fall would care for his little family if he was not permitted to live to help raise them.

A gloom has been cast over the community and expressions of sympathy are heard from all quarters.

The funeral was large, being attended by many relatives, friends and neighbors. The accident and the attendant circumstances have made it an especially sad and impressive occurrence.

He is survived by the widow, seven small children, his father, mother, a brother and sister.

The feeling prevailed at the funeral that it was more important that we who are left should know a preparation for the future rather than mourn for the departed. It was felt he had not put off this preparation to a more convenient season, but had endeavored to so live that he might be ready when the summons came.

E. F. S.

FRIENDS' PEACE TESTIMONY IN JAPAN.

THOMAS E. JONES.

Until the holidays of this year the country Friends' meetings in Japan had not been brought into direct touch with the present-day peace testimony of English and American young Friends. Until the last year more attention has been given to other phases of Friends' teaching than to our peace principles. This has been done because it was necessary to enlarge and organize the meetings before beginning intensive work along doctrinal lines. With the organization of the Yearly Meeting last year it was thought the time had come to give some intensive training to local groups.

It is easy to imagine the difficulties which might arise from teaching a people that war is wrong when that people had been trained for a thousand years to believe that the greatest glory attainable is to die in battle for one's country. Because much depended upon this initial step for many of the meetings, great care was taken in planning the campaign. Gurney and Elizabeth Binford made all the arrangements, scheduling meetings in six of the stations in Ibaraki Ken.

The proposed attendance of Loyal and Mary Balderston from the Imperial University at Sapporo, of Esther B. Rhoads and of Thomas E. and Esther B. Jones, who had recently arrived from America, was especially mentioned. Other members of the party were Toki Iwasawa, the interpreter, who had spent four years in America attending Westtown and Columbia, Edith F. Sharpless and the Binfords.

In most of the meetings a dinner and social preceded the addresses. American young Friends would have been amazed to see their Japanese cousins clad in voluminous Oriental robes, sitting on their feet and "chop sticking" a concoction of rice, onions, chicken, eggs and brown sauce out of large round bowls. Here I had my first real go at Japanese food.

The meetings were opened with Scripture reading and devotion, after which the speakers were introduced by the interpreter. The messages usually consisted of a statement of what young Friends in England and America are undergoing for their belief and what they are actually doing in France to show their loyalty to their country and God. It was then stated that Friends are as ready and willing to lay down their lives for their country and the great ideals outlined by the Allies as the objects of this war as any other persons. Yet Friends hold that there is a better way for gaining these principles than to go to war. Friends do not hate war more than other people, but they give their lives to the position that war is not only hideous but impractical. It can never gain the objects for which it pays so dearly. The way of love, co-operation, and service is not only more lovely, it is more practical as shown by accumulated instances in history. The Friends' position has been recognized by the United States Government and the American Red Cross. Yet the whole theory is on trial for its life. The Society of Friends and similar believers are the guardians of this truth. The principle must be maintained if every Friend is bankrupt or imprisoned in its defense. Friends are fearlessly carrying out the teaching of Jesus even when it is unpopular to do so. Japanese Friends have a great opportunity to register their approval of this way of national resistance in a country where its teaching is unknown. They could send one or more representatives to work with the Friends in France, they could start a campaign for funds and could organize sewing and knitting societies. They could aid in the longer course of peace training by starting study classes and increasing these as rapidly as possible to public meetings.

After the addresses were concluded a time of discussion followed, during which some most interesting questions were asked by the Japanese. Some of them were: "How could there be a war in Europe if those nations believe in Jesus Christ as they claim?" "Why do each pray to God to help them find some better way to inflict greater destruction and death?" "Why have so nearly all of the leaders in the peace movement become believers in war since a war has come?" "Were these people sincere or are they sincere now?" "As nations become rich they depend more upon their own strength than that of God. The Bible is certainly true where it says that you cannot serve both God and Mammon at the same time." "When I first thought about foreigners coming to Japan I did not want them. I did not like them. I thought they would take the Japanese money and kill the people. But after I met some and learned more about them I find that they like Japan and do not want war. People of Japan and America ought to know each other. Then they would not build big battle-ships and train armies. It is bad to have big armies and navies, because they make other nations afraid and disliked." A number of other questions and statements of a similar nature were made in the course of the meetings.

It is difficult to say what practical results will come from these meetings, but a start in the Quaker peace training has undoubtedly been made. Plans are being made to follow up the meetings and to start Peace Study Classes in as many places as possible. It is difficult to say whether the Japanese Friends will contribute at all liberally to the Reconstruction work in France. The war has affected the masses in Japan in no visible way except to raise prices both of foodstuffs and labor. A few people are becoming immensely rich. They hold the destiny of the country in their hands and can see but little that could be gained by sending soldiers to France. The whole conflict is much farther away from rich Japan than rich America before war was declared against Germany. The spirit of sacrifice has not yet struck the Japanese people generally, and therefore it will be hard to awaken Japanese Friends to their opportunities for service and testimony at this time.

FROM A FRENCH HOSPITAL.

[We have had the reading of the following letter, addressed by the writer to a group of her friends in New York. It pictures work in a different field from that given in other letters recently published and we are glad to share it with our readers.—Eds.]

LA MISSION DE LA SOCIÉTÉ DES AMIS, SAMOENS, HAUTE-SAVOIE, France, Twelfth Month 25, 1917.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

I can but admire the religious devotion which is strong enough to keep people in church until 1 A. M. in mid-winter. No heat whatsoever and a service of several hours, while at home many of us feel it too much to attend a service in thoroughly heated buildings.

We had a Christmas dinner, too. Turkey and salad, plum pudding, cake and sauce and coffee. It was, of course, a great treat, but it did seem funny to have a dinner of such a queer combination. No vegetables, but the salad of lettuce. The Christmas tree is ready and the room is to be thrown open at 5 P. M. The children are wildly excited and have been up singing and carrying on from the small hours this morning.

Poor little youngsters, my heart aches for them terribly because they have so little to brighten and cheer them. The other day one of the members of the Staff was ill, and I went out walking with the kiddies in her place. What do you think they sang as they walked! Prayers for the dead. Just imagine, out for a walk and singing prayers for the dead? Did you ever hear anything more pathetic! I cannot get it out of my mind. We must do something to bring back into their lives something besides sorrow. The directress will not allow the piano to be used, the children have no play-room and but a few boxes of blocks with which to play. Many of them have been allowed to run wild for months, for there was no one to look after them and nothing for them to do in the ruins of their homes. They are nervous to the last degree and then for recreation they sing prayers for the dead! I suppose that it is because the church is the only place where they have heard music for so long and they love music. They know some French singing games too, when we have a place for them to play that is warm enough. I am sure you will understand why to-day is scarcely Christmas, the contrast is so terrible. Yet our patients have much that other refugees (repatriés) lack. We have good food, warm clothes, good beds and are well cared for by the nurses. English Friends have done much for them, but they have had a very limited supply of money and have had to make it go as far as possible.

The house was built for a hotel and not a hospital and there are many drawbacks. The need for recreation is really the most urgent now, I think, and I have taken it up with the Committee. Many of our worst cases have been bed-ridden for months and are so blue and depressed. I wonder that they get on so well as they do. It is a real pleasure to see their faces lighten when I go to their rooms, and when I can get them to laughing I feel that I have done something worth while. I have so little time, though, for anything besides my classes and my medical gymnastic work that my visits have to be confined largely to my patients.

Here are some histories. No. 1—Was a German prisoner for two years. She was repatriated and went to some friends in Paris. She was engaged to be married, and of course knew nothing of her fiancé during this time. Finally, through her friends, after reaching Paris she got in touch with him and he went to Paris for a few days. They had known each other from childhood. The arrangements for the wedding were made for his next furlough and both were so happy. Then he was killed. Poor girl, she is a wreck. She is suffering from sciatica and her limbs are so badly affected that she cannot walk. It is hard even to turn in bed. From a strong, robust young woman she is almost a shadow now. No. 2—A married woman, with a dear little girl here. She lost two fine daughters by asphyxiation through the gas bombs. Her husband was at the front and became insane through the horrors. She herself has some tubercular throat trouble so that she cannot speak aloud. No. 3—Another young woman also engaged to be married. She has lost both father and fiancé and all her property.

Over and over as I try to cheer them, I wonder if I had suffered as they, whether I would not feel much as they. Indeed, I do not know whether I could be as brave as they. Life at best is so sombre and tied to bed in a hospital it must be dreadful. My two French books have been a boon. If any of you have old French books that you do not want just send them along for our library. I told you that I would beg and I am going to keep right on doing so. Find out from the Red Cross people how their books come or send them addressed to our headquarters in Paris, Care U. S. Expeditionary Force, in order to get the benefit of domestic rates. The Government has very kindly extended to us the privilege of using the military mail without stamp, but one has to be very careful of what one writes and so far I have only sent letters for France in that way. . . . The American mails must have been held up. I have received a postal from —, another from —, and three letters from my sister and one or two forwarded letters. Just think of being nearly two months in a foreign country and losing all the news from home.

I do not remember the date of my last letter and will have to turn to my diary now for a continuation of this.

SEVENTH.

I have ascertained that 90 litres of milk are consumed per day and that the price continues to soar because the milk is bought up to be made into cheese for the army. We had a wonderfully beautiful sleigh ride to-day to a neighboring village, where our excellent little physician was called to see a patient. The mountains, covered as they were, part way by snow and the dark evergreens coming out in bold relief were wonderfully beautiful. It grew dark and very cold before we returned and for the first time I noticed the wonderful brilliancy of the stars. The children were giving a little play for which we were late. The ingenuity displayed by their teacher in dressing them out of next to nothing was perhaps the most remarkable part of the performance. We really have some very pretty little tots when they are dressed up.

When they let out the fire to replace the frozen radiators we had two days of the most trying cold that I have ever experienced. The man in charge of the plumbing here is rather lazy, and the only place for us to have a fire was on the open hearth in the salon. He would not clean the chimney and the fire smoked so badly that we had to keep the windows open to let the smoke out. I think I told you that my room was so cold that I would have to stop in the midst of combing my hair and put my fingers on a hot water bottle to enable me to hold the comb. Towels would begin to freeze right after using. My work is very exposing. Most of the time I have to take it out of doors. This, coupled with having no place to get warm afterwards, proved too much and the doctor ordered me to bed for a day-and-a-half with a bad cold. So I had a talk with her and told her that I did not think that I could stand it unless some arrangement could be made to give me a warm place for rest. So as we could not find a room outside the house the Directress finally arranged for a little room with a tiny wood stove. I assure you that it is a luxury, not only for me, but for the members of the staff who wish a quiet place to work. . . . Now our smoky fire-place has been cleaned and we sit around it in the evenings and talk. It is most interesting to hear the nurses tell of their experiences. One from an English hospital said that where she worked the patients were supplied with gas masks and the beds were made up on stretchers so that they could be carried out hastily. An Irish nurse told us ghost stories. She had really and truly heard banshee cry and described it in fearful terms. I asked her what it ate, but she said that as it was a ghost, of course it did not need anything to eat. I leave it to you to decide how a ghost could cry loud enough to disturb a village without having anything to live on. With the English stories, as well as with the Irish, I notice that the ghosts are always heard, not seen. I suppose that they are the last remnants of superstition.

We are not very far from Geneva, as one of the nurses took a little girl to be X-rayed and brought her back the same day. The Swiss are so thoroughly neutral that she could not stop, as they would not allow anything to be brought across the border.

FIFTEENTH.

I have a little kindergarten class of ten but no material with which to work. Also I have practically nothing for the ward kiddies, who have to stay in bed for the whole morning, but are allowed to take a walk in the afternoon. The Christmas tree, which was set up in our salon, afforded intense excitement to the house this afternoon. All the children and helpless were remembered and some from outside as well. It was a sight to watch the faces of the children as they came in and when Santa Claus appeared there was a wild whoop, although one or two of the small ones were quite frightened. Some Paris firm sent down some American flags and some paper caps which added to the merriment. There were also chocolate and oranges rolled up in bright-colored papers. After the presents had been given, the children sang in French the English national anthem.

My little people are very inattentive in class, and if one does something wrong and is corrected for it, the others seem to delight in doing one of two things: either they will follow the lead of the naughty one with great glee or else they will call out that they are all right. I was quite in despair at first, it seemed hopeless to bring order out of chaos, but now the children are beginning to obey the sound of the whistle and to take their places quietly, when I work with them.

The older girls are very jubilant over gymnastic costumes. Again the Franco-American Unit had sent down some brown cotton flannel. Last week I got their suits cut out for them and I am hoping that they will have them finished and that I shall be able to get a picture taken this week. We have had no sun to speak of for about ten days, and I have to return the borrowed camera, so that I am anxious to get the picture at once.

TWELFTH MONTH 17, 1917.

Borden's condensed milk is on sale in the village. We wanted some to make chocolate over my fire, but decided that sixty cents a can was too much to pay for it. This afternoon two of the fathers in uniform visited my class of little children and in a short time were playing about as excitedly as the children themselves.

A. GERTRUDE JACOB.

BETTER THAN BURDEN LIFTING—What helpless creatures we should all make of ourselves if we could persuade God to do for us as we ask! Our first cry, when a heavy burden strikes us, and our continued cry while the burden remains, is that God will take it away. Fortunately God is not so cruel as to do us the harm that we ask for. When our children beg us to let them omit certain school lessons, or give up school entirely, we love them too much to yield to their entreaty. How much better was this petition in a pastor's public prayer: "If any are here with special burdens, if I thou dost not lift the load give them strength to bear it"? The power to bear burdens makes a richer life than a weakening freedom from burdens.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

GOLDEN KEYS.

A bunch of golden keys is mine,
To make each day with gladness shine.

"Good morning," that's the golden key
That unlocks every day for me.

When evening comes, "Good night," I say,
And close the door of each glad day.

When at the table, "If you please,"
I take from off my bunch of keys.

When friends give anything to me,
I use the little "Thank you" key.

"Excuse Me," "Beg your pardon," too,
When by mistake some harm I do.

Or if unkindly word I've given,
With "Forgive me," I shall be forgiven.

On a golden ring these keys I'll bind,
This is its motto, "Be ye kind"

I'll often use each golden key,
And soon a happy child I'll be.

FIVE LITTLE FOXES.

Among my tender vines I spy
A little fox named—By and Bye.

Then set upon him quick, I say,
The swift young hunter—Right Away.

Around each tender vine I plant,
I find the little fox—I Can't.

Then, fast as ever hunter ran,
Chase him with bold and brave—I Can.

No Use in trying—lags and whines
This fox among my tender vines.

Then drive him low, and drive him high
With this good hunter named—I'll Try.

Among the vines in my small lot
Creeps in the young fox—I Forget.

Then hunt him out and to his pen
With—I Will Not Forget Again.

A little fox is hidden there
Among my vines, named—I Don't Care.

Then let I'm Sorry—hunter true—
Chase him afar from vines and you.

—Union Gospel News.

GENERAL CROWDER ON C. O.'S.

M. Albert Linton has furnished us a photographic copy of a recent report of General Crowder's. The table gives the numbers exempted for all reasons in the first draft—3,887 of the total of claims (1,161,206 in all) were on the ground of religious creed. Of these the General says:

D. RELIGIOUS CREED; "CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS."

1. As to the partial discharge authorized by the law for persons professing a "religious creed opposed to war in any form" (so-called "religious objectors"), the total number of such discharges was 3,887.

(a) A first inquiry might be: What proportion of such creed members availed themselves of this claim?

This question can not yet be answered, until time permits a complete examination of the files of the local boards.

(b) As to the partial nature of the discharge (leaving them liable to serve only "in some capacity declared by the President to be non-combatant"), it may be stated that the President has not as yet seen fit to call for such non-combatant services in any such instances. Nor has he by any Executive order defined, at the time of preparing this report, the scope of non-combatant services for such persons.

(c) This ground of discharge, however, has been far from receiving public support. A very large majority of the district boards recommend that religious objectors should not be discharged. Evidently the feeling is widespread that the religious-creed objection is in many cases not genuine. Furthermore, many boards express the belief that honest religious objection ought not to be allowed to deprive the Nation of an able-bodied defender. Many of the boards, however, which favor holding religious objectors to military service express the opinion that those whose objection seems genuine should be assigned to non-combatant service.

2. The "conscientious objector," so called, has no recognition in the selective-service law, and is thus distinct from the religious-creed member.

(a) It was supposed by some that the number of "conscientious objectors" who would refuse to appear if drafted, or to serve if ordered to camp, would be large—as many as 20,000. In fact, the reports from camp commanders indicate that only 561 have disclosed themselves by refusal.

The Secretary of War had under consideration, at the time of preparing this report, a plan of treatment in the camps which will preserve from impairment the necessary standards of military discipline, without doing undue violence to the sensibilities of such of these misguided men as may be sincere in their principles.

(b) There is extremely little popular sympathy for this class. Almost unanimously the boards assert that they are slackers in disguise, and ought to be sent to the front.

(c) Some boards treat religious and conscientious objectors as one class, and say that, when found to be honest, they might well be assigned to non-combatant service. But it should not be forgotten that the two classes are entirely distinct—legally, morally, and practically. They are legally distinct, because the act of Congress expressly recognizes and gives a legal status to the one, but wholly ignores the other. They are morally distinct, because the one is obeying what he regards as a Divine mandate, binding the conscience of believers, and sanctioned by the settled tradition of their church; while the other is merely choosing to accept the loose and untried speculations of modern theorists who avow no respect for religious scriptures and profess no authority over the conscience. They are practically distinct, because the one includes an ascertainable group of individuals, registered in their sect, definitely fixed on May 18 (the date of the passage of the selective-service act), and not capable of enlargement at will; while the other may include anyone whomsoever who has chosen, after May 18 last, to make profession, however insincerely, of an opinion opposed to war; and thus this group, if recognized in practice, would inevitably become an easy and impregnable refuge for an unlimited number of "slackers."

THINGS for which no one has ever been sorry:

Doing good to all.
Speaking evil of none.
Hearing before judging.
Thinking before speaking.
Holding an angry tongue.
Being kind to the distressed.
Asking pardon for wrongs.
Being patient toward every body.
Stopping one's ears to a tale-bearer.
Disbelieving most of the evil reports.

C. O.'S AT CAMP SHERMAN.

CHARLES LIVEZEY.

Thinking some information relative to C. O.'s at Camp Sherman might be of interest to Friends generally, I am forwarding some excerpts from two letters recently received from one of our members now in the Camp.

There are forty-three of the "segregated" C. O.'s, though the word "segregated" does not really apply at all. Because of lack of room anywhere else in the hospital, we have our bunks lined up, end to end, along one side of the corridor, which connects the barracks in which the hospital force is quartered. Consequently, we are in a most conspicuous place, for the corridor is almost constantly used through the day and quite a little in the night. Of the forty-three there are represented thirty-seven Mennonites of various branches, one Brethren, one International Bible Student, one Pentecostal Mission and three Friends. There are very few of the men who say anything to us.

The C. O.'s who work (perhaps sixty) have to take more than we, for the men realize that there is no non-combatant service in the army and that those who work are inconsistent. They respect us more in our stand. None of the C. O.'s are required to drill here at the hospital. One or two who do not belong to a society whose creed forbids taking part in war are not asked to drill. A notice on the bulletin board a few weeks ago read like this: "All whose religion forbids them to bear arms sign this paper." These two saw that from the way this was worded they had a right to sign it, so put down their names with the rest. Consequently, they get off, for a notice shortly after read,—"all who refuse to carry arms need not attend this drill."

We do not know what is ahead, but whatever comes I believe most of our number will stand against taking up anything whatever under the military machine. Two boys who have recently joined our group have gone through quite a lot. The officers over them for a long time would not transfer them to the hospital, and as they refused to "uniform," drill or even stand "formation" for roll call they were severely treated. One was in a guard-house two weeks and another was dragged around and otherwise abused, but they stood firm. It does one good to see some who cling to the Master's teachings.

In a more recent letter an account is given of an interview between four officers, two from the Camp and two purporting to be from Washington. They were very courteous, talking to them in groups, but most of the questions were directed personally to our correspondent: first stating they wanted to know just how he felt about this matter. "I did not tell them I was opposed to war and my reasons, for I took it they already knew about that; but replied: Well, there are two things I have thought of that I would be willing to do, there may be others, but these I have thought about and could freely do—I would go to France under the American Friends' Service Committee and take up reconstruction work under their direction; or if allowed to return home would engage in an occupation which was to the National interest (farming), and turn over my earnings (over and above what it took for living expenses) to this Committee, for use in the reconstruction work."

They asked me if it would hurt my conscience to do hospital work. "I replied, yes, it would; telling them I felt every branch of the military organization, even the hospital service, contributed to the efficiency of the whole." They then wanted to know if hospital service was not similar to the reconstruction work; and whether when men with broken limbs were sent over here from the battlefields it was not a duty to nurse them back to health. I told them that part of it was all right, but that it was the idea of the military hospital to fit men so they could again return to fighting.

One remarked he thought that was a rather "far-fetched" argument. I proceeded to explain that if all our patients were to be returned to their homes as civilians we could not offer this objection, neither could we if we were free to use our influence to show these patients the wrongfulness of war and wherein we felt their taking part in it was wrong, but that under the military such advice and counsel would be a grave offence. No reply was made to this.

They asked if we talked these things over among us or not and I replied we did occasionally. They also queried whether we tried to influence other men here, my reply was that when some of them came and talked with us we did not hesitate to express our views, but that we did not go about trying to persuade others to our point of view. They asked if I was sure we had not taken this position with the idea that we might be sent back home. My reply was that this was not our idea at all, that personally I had not expected we would be allowed to return home. One asked if we were not citizens of this United States and whether as such we did receive various advantages and benefits, protection, etc., which it offered. I agreed that we did. He then wanted to know if it was not our duty in return to help protect our government, our institutions, our mothers, sisters, and wives, suggesting dire things that might happen should the Germans come over here. I answered we were not taking our stand in any spirit of antagonism toward our government. We did not approve in the least of some of the things other countries, Germany in particular, were doing, but that we did not approve of the means our country is taking to bring about the desired ends. We believed that real peace (one of them having said, "there are four of us officers here, and I believe I am safe in saying there is not one of us but is as anxious for peace as are any of you") which we were all so anxious for could only be brought about by brotherly love and good-will to all men. Their only answer to this was: "Well, you understand that can only come about gradually." One asked what we would do if the government decided to hold us right here, and when I answered that we could only suffer such punishments as the government saw fit to inflict upon us, he replied, "The government will not do anything of that kind." Upon the question being put the second time near the close of the interview I replied that, personally, the only thing I could do would be to suffer such penalties as the government decided to impose upon us. Being asked if I thought that was the way the majority of our number felt about it I gave them an affirmative reply.

It might be of interest to state that while these young men have at various times been deprived of their cots for emergency use of the sick in the hospital and thereby compelled to sleep on the floor, causing a few cases of violent colds, that they have recently been again furnished with other cots and assured they could keep these as long as they needed them.

Two of their number have recently been discharged, one for physical disability, the other was apparently too nearly a nervous wreck, following his treatment prior to his segregation, to be retained in service.

One of their number, a Mennonite who was sick in the hospital a few days about two weeks ago, was taken into another part of the Camp, placed in private quarters pending an investigation or court-martial for his supposed leadership amongst the segregated C. O.'s. An inquiry was instigated in a few days by his people from home, resulting in his liberation; so he has now freedom of the Camp, city and surrounding country without "guard," except that he is barred the privilege of going back to the Base Hospital and associating with his former group. He keenly feels this separation from his fellows and kindred spirits, though willing to accept the accompanying loneliness of his position, trusting his influence may perhaps not be for naught. The separation of this individual, instead of weakening, has probably strengthened the group, evidencing that he was not a leader and that they were not relying upon him as such and demonstrating beyond doubt that the individual convictions of these C. O.'s are grounded on something more substantial than the leadership even of an honored fellow. Shall not we who still have our liberty, give these heroic young standard-bearers our heartfelt sympathy and support, and closely scrutinize our own positions that we, too, may be consistent standard-bearers for our Society before the world at large, contributing our "mite" toward that world reconstruction which some day must come.

FROM CAMP SHERMAN.

[Arthur C. Standing, of Earham, Ia., has forwarded this letter.—Eds.]

BASE HOSPITAL, CAMP SHERMAN, O.
Thanksgiving Evening, 1917.

DEAR CLASSMATES:—

I shall try to hurry this little letter along, that it may pick up in flesh as fast as possible. Of course, with any live-stock, they can only be forced just so much. Nevertheless, I hope to note an improvement when I next see this.

I suppose you will want to know something of Camp Sherman, and I shall try to tell you a little. A year ago, if some one had told me of the things as they have been occurring, I should have thought they didn't know what they were talking about. Yet when one gets into camp once he no longer takes it as a dream, but realizes a reality.

I came to camp on First-day, Tenth Month 7th, and was transferred to the Base Hospital on the 10th. I had not intended to do any military duties, but when it came to caring for the sick or refusing everything and going to the guard-house, I gave in. I thought that these sick, like myself, were not here from a matter of choice, not because they had chosen the military, but because it had been forced upon them. It surely was some one's duty to care for them, and if I did it solely as a matter of service to the men, refusing pay and uniform from an organization of whose methods I could not approve, I thought I could conscientiously do it, pending the Government's decision, and it would show a willingness to be of service to suffering mankind. So for two weeks or more I had charge of one of the hospital wards at night, with sometimes as high as two dozen patients.

Yet I was not satisfied, for I soon saw that quite a lot of the hospital force was made up of fellows like me, whose church creeds forbade bearing arms or taking part in war. I saw that we could not but be releasing men to do the things that we could not do ourselves. I realized also, more and more, that all parts of the army organization contributed to the efficiency of the whole. I saw that I could not go on and with an explanation told the officers so. Without any guard-house experience I was ordered to move my belongings from the barracks where I slept, to one of the hospital wards, in which about twenty-two Mennonites (one was a Brethren), who had refused to work, were kept. So that is where I still am.

I was the first Friend here who took this stand, but Freddie Kennard, of Barnesville, and Joseph Borton, of Quaker City, soon joined us. There are now thirty-seven of us. There are twelve of the Old Order Amish Mennonites with their long hair and beards, and peculiar dress, which make them look years older than they are. There are also twelve Amish Mennonites, seven Mennonites, one Defenseless Mennonite, one Brethren, three Friends and one who belongs to the Pentecostal Mission, a church which is not opposed to war. The faith of this young man surely is remarkable.

Until Seventh-day last we had no heat in our quarters and sometimes most had to go to bed to keep warm, but now we have steam heat and more warmth than is best for health. At least most of us have colds now, and we were not bothered much before. The treatment we have had has been remarkable good. When we take into consideration how "sore" many of the soldiers are at us, and how some of the petty officers would do most anything, if they only could, it is a wonder that we have had it so easy. Of course, trials have come up, but on the whole we could hardly have asked it to be better. We get plenty to eat and the meals are far better than I expected army meals to be, though, of course, not like home meals. We are not under guard and are allowed to take hikes over the hills when and how we please, as far as we choose, singly or in groups, just so we are back promptly at the times we are supposed to be, which are scarcely ever for anything but roll-call morning and evening. We go to meals with the other soldiers when and how we please. Our only duties are to clean up our quarters, but it is not often that anyone bothers to see whether this has been done or not.

The fellows hold devotional exercises every morning and Bible study every evening, which are interesting and show sincerity and strength of purpose, although they are not like our way. They are surely a nice company.

There are probably sixty C. O.'s at work here in the hospital. Some are poor examples of conscientious objectors. Others I should like to see feel more as we do about the matter. One progressive Friend in particular I sympathize with. He thinks we are taking just the right stand and would do the same in a minute, but for the fact that he feels he must be making something to support his father, mother, and sister who are in exceptionally poor circumstances.

I doubt not that the testing time is ahead of us, but why should we fear if we really trust in God? Maybe some will fall when the real test comes, but many I feel sure would suffer death rather than compromise. Although I do not believe it shall come to that, yet how much grander it would be to sacrifice our lives in the service of the King who knows no defeat, than to follow the lead of worldly leaders who are but for a time and who know not the grander things of life, who are blind to the beauty of Love.

One thing I do believe may come from this war, is a purification of God's Church. Of the thirty-seven fellows in our company I can truthfully say that this experience is drawing them nearer together and nearer to God than most anything in their lives. When everything goes just as we might wish there is a tendency to forget our dependency on our Master. Perhaps things are going too smooth for us at the present, but I believe most are prepared for something different in the future.

Really we have here so many things to be thankful for and so little that we could complain of! Our friends can visit us at any time, which we surely do appreciate. My wife and grandfather were down to see me a couple of weeks ago. They came on Seventh-day morning and left late Fourth-day evening, so I had a real good visit. They stayed at a farm-house less than half mile from here, and I would spend most of the day with them and then go up to the house in the evenings, from about six till nine o'clock. Perhaps I could have come in later than that without being stopped by guards, but I wished to take no chances.

Well, this draft business did sort of break in on the new happiness that had come into my life, but by no means could it steal it away. My wife is bearing up bravely, for which I am thankful, and is as anxious that I stick to the right as I am to endeavor to follow our Leader.

I haven't told much, but I don't want to take up too much room, and will bring this to a close.

With best wishes to all, I am your classmate,

LA RUE BARKER.

NEWS ITEMS.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.—A temperature of -10 degrees in the near suburbs of Philadelphia on the 5th did not detain Friends from Quarterly Meeting as one might have expected. There were more late comers than usual on account of interrupted trolley service and delayed trains, but the meeting at last was near normal size. The session for worship before lunch was favored with the company of visiting Friends. Two members of Burlington Quarterly Meeting had service—one in prayer, the other in a valuable message for the need of the hour from the life of Jacob. Mansaku Nakamura spoke in Japanese, Gilbert Bowles interpreting for him with an admirable distinctness. Very evidently the fundamentals of ministry as we conceive it are understood by Japanese Friends.

Seven items of business claimed the attention of a joint session at 1:30. These were mostly of a routine character, but the first item dealt with possible fuel conservation in a different arrangement of the city meetings. It was decided to omit the West Philadelphia meeting for the present and to hold the First-day evening meeting at Arch Street instead of at Twelfth. Any other possible consolidation was referred to the officers of the two city Monthly Meetings with power to act.

The Queries and reports for Yearly Meeting were considered in separate session. It was evident in both meetings that lively reactions to these time-honored means of dealing with Society problems still prevail amongst us.

The First Month number of Friends' Fellowship Papers is full of interest from cover to cover. We should think it a misfortune not to read the whole number. We shall hope to reprint two or three of the articles, but as the present pressure of matter may prevent this we may refer to them briefly. Alfred Lowry, Jr., has a suggestive contribution, "Concerning the Ministry." It departs from conventional phrase, but unfolds the resources of spiritual capital in this serious calling.

Corder Catchpole writes from Detention Cells, Dover Court, on "The Spirit of the C. O. Movement" in a note truly heroic. What could be nobler than this—"It matters very much indeed, not only what we do but how we do it; not only is the nature of the cause important, but also the spirit in which we advocate it. Unless we are kept in the true spirit we may lose, however good our purpose; at all events we can not achieve complete success." George and Janet Whitney have a sprightly article (very much in the style of one of Ernest E. L. Payne) which will interest Philadelphia Friends. Its view is what we should call catholic. As usual, E. F. H. writes with an elevation of spiritual perception that sets the note for this most acceptable periodical.

ALUMNI and Friends of Friends' Select School are cordially invited to hear a lecture at the School by Professor Herbert L. Willett, Ph.D., of the University of Chicago, on the afternoon of Sixth-day, Second Month 15, 1918, at 12.40 o'clock. His subject will be "The Greatness of the Bible."

Professor Willett is regarded as one of the foremost popular lecturers on the Bible in America, and stands very high, both as a scholar and as an eloquent speaker.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING SECOND MONTH 2, 1918.

Received from 33 Meetings.....	$6,000.14
Received from 12 Individuals.....	390.50
Received for Armenian and Syrian Relief.....	233.89

$6,714.53

CHARLES F. JENKINS,
Treasurer.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE.—Figures are usually dry and juiceless products. Yet we think that contributors to Friends' War Relief Work will be interested in a few figures telling how their money has been and will be spent. This bulletin is a statement of receipts and expenditures during the first six months of work and an estimated budget for the first year.

Prior to First Month 1, 1918, $152,062.33 was expended. For the six months from First to Sixth Month, 1918 (end of our fiscal year), $188,000 has been definitely appropriated for work already undertaken. Overhead expenses (maintenance of offices, postage, printing, etc.) will probably require an additional $10,000 for this same period. There will thus be needed for the work to which we are already definitely obligated $350,000 for this fiscal year. The scope of our work (and hence of our obligations) has steadily increased and an even larger rate of increase during the next few months is in prospect. Urgent appeals have come from our workers in Russia asking for $25,000 to relieve a famine that has stricken 100,000 people in the district where we are working. A new work in Italy is probable. The scope of our work in France is to be very greatly increased. It is impossible to foresee the extent of this increased obligation for new work, but our present best estimate is $150,000 prior to Sixth Month 30, 1918. Adding this to the $250,000 for which we are already obligated, there will be needed $500,000 for this fiscal year.

Toward this sum there was received prior to First Month 1, 1918, $259,306.30. This means that more than $230,000 must be raised during the six months succeeding First Month 1, 1918. Unforeseen opportunities that we should attempt to meet may arise, so that much more than this may be necessary. We are in touch with unlimited and unprecedented need and the measure of our giving should be the measure of our utmost ability to give.

The following statement of receipts and expenditures, although of interest for the period covered, is not valuable as a guide for the future. During most of this period our work was in the early stages of development, and had not reached the place of certain regularly recurring, permanent needs. For example, the expenses of the training camp at Haverford were less than half the expense of the work of these same men in France. We had not received until First Month any accurate statement of the expense of our work in France since it had been gradually merged with the existing work of English Friends, and it took time to ascertain the expense attributable to the American personnel. It developed that our remittances had not been sufficient and that English Friends had advanced funds on account of the expense occasioned by our workers. We not only must make reimbursement for these advances when the amount is ascertained, but we have had to greatly increase our remittances over past figures as given in the following statement:

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, FROM SIXTH MONTH 5, 1917, TO TWELFTH MONTH 31, 1917.

Individuals, mostly Friends of all branches.....	$ 62,264.19
Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Fourth and Arch Streets....	71,665.67
Meetings connected with Yearly Meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.....	73,695.07
Five Years' Meeting.....	38,556.53
Other Meetings of Friends.....	6,983.75
Fellowship of Reconciliation.....	2,775.50
Miscellaneous Organizations.....	2,484.86
Interest on Deposits.....	780.73
	<hr/>
	$259,306.30

EXPENDITURES.

American Friends' Reconstruction Unit

Expended in U. S. A.

Training Camp at Haverford.....	$ 5,836.14
Equipment.....	7,228.10
Traveling Expenses to Philadelphia.....	1,530.07
Traveling Expenses, Philadelphia to France.....	17,961.09
Hospital Supplies.....	709.80
Sundries.....	2,345.23

$35,610.43

Expended in France (Friends' Anglo-American Expedition).....

50,164.55
$ 85,774.98

Russian Work

Expended in U. S. A.

Equipment.....	$ 1,120.75
Traveling Expenses to Russia.....	3,466.84

$ 4,587.59

Expended in Russia.....

3,000.00
$ 7,587.59

English Friends for Allocation by Allocation Committee of London Yearly Meeting.....	35,000.00
Blankets and Condensed Milk, etc., for Foreign Relief.....	6,764.13

Home Service

Shipping and hauling.....	$ 179.12
Patterns.....	841.50
Wages.....	67.50
Sundries.....	18.29
Special charities.....	15.00
	<hr/>
	$ 1,121.41

General Expenses

Secretaries.....	$ 1,779.50
Stenographers.....	917.73
Telephone, telegraph and cables.....	480.84
Postage and printing.....	2,093.04
Sundries, petty cash account and furniture.....	1,120.49
Traveling.....	722.62
	<hr/>
	$ 7,111.22

Reserve Fund to Cover Letters of Credit..... 11,500.00

$154,862.33

APPROPRIATIONS MADE AT A MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE, held First Month 15, 1918, to cover period ending Sixth Month 30, 1918.

1. Work in France	$ 900,000.00
2. Work in Russia	3,000.00
3. English Friends for Allocation by Allocation Committee of London Yearly Meeting	30,000.00
4. Reimbursement for advances by English Friends for expenses of American personnel	15,000.00
5. Reserve to cover closing up of work, return of workers, contingencies, etc.	50,000.00
	$188,000.00
Probable expenses not appropriated for:
Overhead Expenses	$ 10,000.00
Probable Increase of Work	150,000.00

As before stated, expenditures during the succeeding months will be very much greater, both for the work now definitely established and for new work. A portion of the cash balance built up in the early months before the work started can be used. The present rate of receipts, however, must very greatly increase. Between Seventh and First Months we expended more than we received, and our future monthly expenditures must probably be nearly double our present rate of monthly receipts. In such work as this—governed by no standards or precedents—it is absolutely essential to maintain a large cash balance. Contingencies requiring large unforeseen expenditures may develop within a few days' time. No large plans for the future can be developed except as our work and our workers are protected against such contingencies. In addition to these uncertain contingencies is the certain obligations of closing up the work and bringing home several hundred workers, for which a large amount must be reserved.

The figures in our estimated budget should not necessarily be considered as a standard for future contributions. They are merely the amounts to which this Committee has felt justified in committing Friends. All that Friends are able to give, above this budget of $500,000, should be given if Friends are to play their proper part. It seems to be a time when each person's share of world burden should be considered in terms of sacrifice. This Committee will endeavor efficiently to represent Friends in using all that is given in fields of the greatest needs. We are able at any time, if funds are provided, indefinitely to extend the healing, reconstructing influence of our service—if not through our own workers, through English Friends. We should now deem it a high privilege to share in the service hallowed by their three-and-a-half years of exhaustive effort. We can scarcely conceive what it means for 20,000 people to give $500,000 per year for three years; yet that is what English Friends have raised for their several distinctive war-relief enterprises.

Unquestionably many Friends are now regularly giving all they can and some no doubt are making considerable sacrifices of comforts to do what they are doing; but we believe that there are many of us, and some who have given largely, who have as yet made no sacrifices on this account. The thought has been expressed that there are some occasions when what is often regarded as sacred—our so-called Principal (often only the surpluses of former years invested)—may be spent, as well as Income. Possibly this is one of the occasions when Friends should not examine too closely whether or not they are encroaching on their Principal, when many others are conscientiously giving their lives and all they have in unselfish service.

It is not so much a duty as it is a privilege for us to join, according to our several abilities, in this work of reconstructing both the physical and spiritual foundations of a war-shattered world.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE,

Rufus M. Jones, Chairman, Alfred G. Scattergood, Vice-Chairman, Charles F. Jenkins, Treasurer, Vincent D. Nicholson, Secretary.

FINANCE COMMITTEE—Alfred G. Scattergood, Chairman, Rufus M. Jones, Charles F. Jenkins, Vincent D. Nicholson, John R. Cary, L. Hollingsworth Wood, J. Harold Watson.

SPECIAL CONFERENCE AT WOOLMAN SCHOOL, Second Month 22-24, 1918.—Arrangements have been made for a Conference for young Friends, but not excluding any Friends who are interested, upon the two following topics: "Foreign Missionary Work as a Means of Giving Practical Expression to our Peace Ideals," and "The Means of Deepening and Enriching the Spiritual Life of Friends."

Among the speakers already secured are Gilbert T. Bowles, of Tokio, Japan; Rufus M. Jones, Stanley R. Yarnall and Elbert Russell. Much of the program will consist of informal discussion.

Accommodation for about forty Friends can be provided at Woolman School and in the neighborhood.

A detailed program will be ready shortly. Applications for accommodations or for additional information should be addressed to Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa.

WILL YOU BE ONE OF 150 NEW VOLUNTEERS FOR THE RECONSTRUCTION UNIT?—Are you interested in having a share in the great opportunity that was described in THE FRIEND of Second Month 7th? If you have not read the account, procure a copy of that issue of THE FRIEND and read of the urgent call for 300 men that has come to Friends from the Red Cross in France. We shall be able to fill half of the places from applications now on file, but we need new applications of properly qualified men to supply the other half.

The long delay in the obtaining of permits and passports and the rapidly increasing difficulty of securing ocean passage make it urgently necessary to elect men at the most rapid rate possible. If you feel this to be your path of service please make application immediately. For application blanks, write to 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A knowledge of French is not necessary. Ability in carpentry, wood-working, or mechanics is most needed, but many of our best men had no technical experience before entering the work.

If you decide to apply do not delay. Many Friends now in military camps could be on our Unit in France if they had volunteered earlier. We cannot give absolute assurance of exemption for all members of the Unit called in the second draft, but we think there is little risk of having to bring home men who are actually engaged in the work. At any rate, the risk is ours.

All readers of this statement should take pains to bring the matter to the attention of men who might be possible applicants. A special effort should be made to interest men experienced in any of the building trades or in handling machinery. Our most urgent need is for men able to operate a planing mill. We would appreciate the names and addresses of technical training men and any information as to possible difficulties in the way of their entering the work.

SEND YOUR NEWSPAPERS TO FRANCE.—We are in receipt of a request from our Paris office that the home communities of members of the Unit send local newspapers to our men in France. Communities that have no members on the Unit might send copies of the nearest metropolitan paper. It is not necessary for any one community to send papers every day. One or two a week from a large number of communities will supply every member of the Unit regularly. They should be addressed F. W. V. R. C., A. P. O., S. 5, B. E. F., France. Care should be taken to provide sufficient postage. Our Paris office has had considerable trouble and expense in connection with "postage due" on mail from America. From our central office in France they will be distributed to the men at the various depots.

BULLETINS NOS. 9 AND 10.—These Bulletins, dealing with Sewing and Knitting, are now ready for distribution and will be sent free of charge upon request. Bulletin No. 9 gives general information and instructions as to the work of women's clubs and contains a list of patterns with prices. Bulletin No. 10 contains knitting directions for different garments.

RECENT SAILINGS.—During the past few weeks the following members of the American Friends' Reconstruction Unit sailed for France:

James Thorp, Media, Pa.; Charles F. Penock, Lansdowne, Pa.; Charles S. Satterthwaite, Lansdowne, Pa.; Raymond T. Moore, Lansdowne, Pa.; Robert P. Brown, Moorestown, N. J.; E. Leslie Nicholson, Westville, N. J.; Wistar E. Goodhue, Germantown, Pa.; Omer A. Coppock, Wichita, Kas.; Donald B. Snyder, Richmond, Ind.; Paul W. Gordon, Richmond, Ind.; Mary Kelsey, Chestnut Hill, Pa.

Of the above eleven workers, seven are members of the Yearly Meeting which meets at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AFTER two months of the closest fellowship with our dear English Friends, A. Kemp Brown and Wm. Blair Neatby, through their visitation to meetings of Friends in eight States, a tribute to their services and truly Christian labors amongst us seems fitting, since they have returned to their homes in London and Birmingham.

In by-gone days such visits from either side of the Atlantic were frequent and very helpful—the power of pure love constraining men and women to bear the perils of the deep and, in those days, of the wilderness, to share the heavenly privileges of a living faith. And it has seemed to the writer, under a tendering sense of the spiritual effect which these two Friends have left behind them, that their spirits had a strength and savor which will not be forgotten by those with whom they met, who also appreciate their devotion, considering the present dangers of travel. There was a simplicity and purity as well as sweetness and spirituality in their ministry that built up and satisfied the soul.

ORLANDO, Fla., Second Month 1, 1918.

J. E.

The following letter needs no explanation. A notice of this very reliable work has been published in THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 2, 1918.

ASA WING, Provident Life and Trust Co.,
Fourth and Chestnut Streets, Phila., Pa.
MY DEAR ASA WING:—

Dr. McCallum, who has been a missionary in Russia for most of his life, and for the past few months has been in charge of financial exchange for the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, from this office expects to return to the Near East, about Third Month 1st, to assist in our relief work in Erivan, Russian Caucasus and Urumia, Persia. He has just come to me and asked if it would not be possible to secure the services of two Philadelphia Friends, men between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five, to accompany him.

The Committee are planning to reorganize the work in these two centers and to undertake it upon a somewhat larger scale. I am sending thee an article written some time ago by William T. Ellis, which will give thee a picture of our work in Erivan, as it is now, also our Workers' Manual, and our latest news sheet, which will give thee a somewhat comprehensive idea of the work that the Committee is doing.

These two workers would already find an energetic group of men busy in these two centers and the type of work that they are needed for is office work, and would require a knowledge of bookkeeping and stenography. I would appreciate it very much if they would speak to any of thy friends who might be interested in the work. I am writing about it also to George and Bernard Walton and Professor Rufus Jones.

Sincerely thine,

NORA WALN.

FIFTEEN members of the Committee on Education were present at its regular meeting, held First Month 18, 1918.

A verbal report for the Advisory Committee told of arrangements for the employment of a vocal training teacher, and the Committee recommended that $200 for her salary be appropriated from the Special Fund of $10,000. It also recommended the appropriation from the same fund of $50 toward the salary of the drawing teacher in the Atlantic City school. Arrangements for the apprentice teacher at Friends' Select School to substitute for teachers in the smaller schools have not yet become operative; but it is expected that they will become so soon.

Nathan L. Jones, Treasurer, presented a report which was accepted by the meeting, and he was authorized to make the payments suggested in it.

There was no report from the Visiting Committee, but Mary Hutton Biddle stated that it had visited eight of the schools and had found some improvement in their condition.

Upon request the Superintendent presented a problem confronting the West Grove School Committee, viz.: whether the school at West Grove shall be moved into a larger building, with two teachers, so as to accommodate Friends' children from Kennett Square and London Grove, or whether the West Grove Committee and Friends at London Grove shall unite with those of the other branch in improving and patronizing their school at London Grove. After general discussion of the various phases of this question, the Advisory Committee was appointed to represent the Committee on Education in the consideration of the subject with the West Grove Committee, subject to the call of the latter Committee. The Advisory Committee was given liberty to call upon other members of the General Committee to take part in such consideration.

The Treasurer, as Chairman of the Finance Committee, was directed to present to the Third Month meeting a budget for the school year of 1918-'19, and to fix a time for the annual presentation of the budget, also to definitely fix the dates of the fiscal year.

Julia H. Moon reported that she had sent a letter about the Avon to THE FRIEND, in which it had been published; and Elizabeth H. Bacon reported that she had written as directed to the Pocono Manor Association. C. Walter Borton said that he had conveyed the thanks and appreciation of the Committee on Education to the anonymous donors of the $5000.

Thomas K. Brown appointed Margaret M. Cary, Bertha J. Clement and Walter Brinton to write the annual report and present it to the Third Month meeting.

ELIZABETH H. BACON,
Secretary.

LETTER sent by Rufus Jones to members of the American Friends' Reconstruction Unit, in accordance with a minute of the last meeting of the Service Committee.

HAVVERFORD, PA., First Month 22, 1918.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' UNIT.

MY DEAR FRIENDS:—I want you to know that time and distance have increased rather than lessened my affection for you and my interest in your work. I read with enthusiasm the accounts of your experiences, and I hear with much joy of your devotion and your efficiency. I forbear to comment on your difficulties of life and work because I know you would not want me to say from a distance the usual things about hardships and sacrifices. You and I knew in advance that this could be no holiday excursion, and we faced from the start the stern features involved in this clear call of duty. I can only say that I am not unmindful of the heroism and patience which shine out everywhere in this task of ours.

Those of you who were at Havverford last summer, where our common fellowship was of the happiest sort, will remember how often I used to remind you that our reconstruction work must be a spiritual service, as well as a manly effort to rebuild and repair what has been devastated and laid waste. You cannot do your full service to France unless you can help restore and refresh the spirit of those who have unexpectably suffered, and exhibit in your lives and in your words and in your work an underlying faith in eternal realities. More and more we shall now find the centre of religion not in dogma and doctrine, not in book and institutions, but in love and fellowship and service and sacrifice which spring out of union with that deeper Life of our Father-God, which is the only source of healing for the wounds the war has made. Everything which increases the experience of this underlying life makes one better able to render his full service, and everything that deepens and cultivates the inner life puts added power and wisdom into the outreaching activities of hand and foot and lip.

I do not want to make meetings a burden to you or to enjoy any dreary performance of piety, but I hope you will be able to have in your groups times of real religious refreshment together and that you will help each other to grow in spiritual perception and to draw upon the infinite resources of the unseen. May He who said, "Wherever any man raises the stone or cleaves the wood there am I," be present with you in your toil and may your hearts burn as you give your service to those who need it. I send to you my heartfelt affection and my thanksgiving for your lives and work.

Sincerely your friend,

RUFUS M. JONES.

NOTICE.

MEETINGS from Second Month 17th to 23rd:—

Western Quarterly Meeting, at Westgrove, Sixth-day, Second Month 22nd, at 10 A. M.

Muncy Monthly Meeting, at Elklands, Fourth-day, Second Month 20th, at 10.30 A. M.

Frankford, Fourth-day, Second Month 20th, at 7.45 P. M.

Germanstown, Fourth-day, Second Month 20th, at 8 P. M.

Philadelphia, Fourth and Arch Streets, Fifth-day, Second Month 21st, at 10.30 A. M.

Havverford, Fifth-day, Second Month 21st, at 7.30 P. M.

DIED.—First Month 15, 1918, at her residence, near Berkeley, Maryland, MARTHA COWGILL SMITH, daughter of Gideon G. and Elizabeth C. Smith; a member of Deer Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Darlington, Md.

—, at Clarinda, Iowa, First Month 26, 1918, MARY MOFFETT, widow of William A. Moffitt, in the seventy-seventh year of her age; a life-long member of the Society of Friends.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The Teen Age in the First-day School." A course given by W. Edward Raffety, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of "The Survey," New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

SWARTHMORE, PA.

WISSAHICKON INN

REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address
A. B. JOHNSON.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL PHONE: Barlog 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

BELL PHONE: Filbert 2066.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

Hajoca

Pedestal Lavatory

Equipped with the Hajoca Waste which prevents backing up of residue from previous ablutions.

Visit our Showrooms—within easy reach of City Hall. Hajoca Book, free.

Haines, Jones & Cadbury Co.

1130-1144
Ridge Ave.
(At 12th and Spring Garden)

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

W. B. WEAVER

UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

SUCCESSOR TO S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10:30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only

Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL PHONE.

WANTED—IMMEDIATELY—FOR SERVICE IN France. (Earliest Possible Sailing) four men experienced in operating wood-working machinery. We have a special cable request to supply urgent need. One Nurse—Two Women for Social Work. A prerequisite for this social work is a speaking knowledge of French. Past experience in social work is not so important, and all Friends who speak French are urged to apply. Send inquiries or applications to American Friends' Service Committee, 20 South 27th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

FRIENDS' QUARTERLY EXAMINER

The only quarterly Review published by Friends of London Yearly Meeting

A new volume of this old-established Quarterly has just commenced, and contains valuable articles by Dr. Barton, "The Quaker Testimony Against War Re-examined"; Edward Grubb, "A Rejoinder Thereto"; J. F. Peace, "Panama Canal"; J. S. Thornton, "On Isaac Sharp"; &c. The text of a Review in its annual contents. Recently the "F. Q. E." has published the following articles—

- "Christian Politics and War", the late Frederick Seeborn, LL.D., D. Litt.
 - "Some Memories of Uden", Beatrice Hazraden, B.A.
 - "Wordsworth; the Heroic Poet of his Age", William Grayson.
 - "John Bright and War", Margaret E. Hirst.
 - "The Sun Fan Rising: A Narrative and some Reflections", Frederick W. Fin.
 - "Professor Silvanus Thompson and his Message", by the Editor.
 - "The Garden of Peran", George Lloyd Hodgkin, B.A.
 - "The Problem of Armament and a League of Nations", C. Lowes Dickinson, B.A.
 - "Thoughts on Punishment", Leonard Doncaster, D.Sc., F.R.S.
 - "Educational Ideals", Ernest E. Unwin, M.A., B.Sc.
 - "Tom Blyan: an Educational Pioneer", Azael S. Rowntree, M.P.
- The future Programme provides articles of equal importance. Annual subscription, $1.66, in advance, to Grace W. Blair, Medina, Pa.

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E. Bell Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS

CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped, prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. PHILA.

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

WANTED—HOUSEKEEPER, PREFERABLY MIDDLE aged woman, for bachelor, good home, ample opportunity for study and advancement. Apply Dr. W. H. HAINES, 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, any Fourth-day of the week, 2 to 4 o'clock.

WANTED—PERSON TO DO TYPEWRITING, IN country, on Friends' History.

Address ANNA M. P. DE COE,
Cream Ridge, N. J.

WANTED—BY A PERSON OF REFINEMENT, education, and large experience—a position to care for an aged person or an aged couple and their home, or to care for motherless children and their home.

Address S. S.
Care of "The Friend",
207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—A COMPANIONABLE YOUNG WOMAN to assist with children, where other help is kept.

Address "C",
"The Friend", 207 Walnut Place.

WANTED—BY A YOUNG LADY, FOND OF elderly people and children, a position to care for either, from 2 until 4 o'clock each day; has nursed in a Friend's family for three years.

Address "C",
1824 W. 4th Atlantic Street, Toga, Phila.

A MOTHER, WITH DAUGHTER, AGED NINE, DESIRES a home for the winter in a quiet family of Friends.

Address M. E. K.,
Office of "The Friend."

Investments

Yielding from 5% to over 7½%

OUR February list of investments contains many offerings both sound in character and attractive in yield, offerings to meet every investment requirement.

Send for Circular PF-154

The National City Company

National City Bank Bldg., New York

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities

Philadelphia 1421 Chestnut St.,

Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton
"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL

will need for the academic year 1918-1919 an assistant secretary, familiar with bookkeeping and general office work, who will have some duties in supervising study rooms; and also an assistant in the Primary Department.

For this last position a teacher of some experience is needed. The duties will include assisting in the third year work; supervising writing; helping on the playground; and if possible conducting simple classes in sloyd and other hand work, and coaching irregular pupils.

Application should be made to

STANLEY R. YARNALL, Principal
Germantown Friends' School
Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

*Phone, Spruce 3632

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES
Bell—Spruce 17-81 -- Keystone—Race 637
R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS
218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH and RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense
Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth from 30c to 50c.
REDUCES
FIRE RISK.
Guaranteed for one year.

$16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels
Paper

Paper Bags and Twine

259 South Third Street

Genealogist

Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 E. Stockton St., Trenton, N.J.

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey,
Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -- PHILA.

BALDERSTON'S APPLE-BUTTER

We are now prepared to fill orders for apple-butter at the following rates:

2-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $4.50

1-Quart Jars—per Case of Six Jars Each $2.40

by freight or express, l. o. b., Colons.

Smaller orders will be forwarded by Parcel Post at an additional charge to cover costs.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,

COLORA, Cecil Co., Maryland.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, SECOND MONTH 21, 1918.

No. 34.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"PHYSICIANS OF PUBLIC OPINION."

One of the impulses against which we have to struggle in these days is that of helplessness.

We know that "God who loveth all His works, hath left His hope with all," but we can not always feel it. Sometimes it is as if we were hurried along, as by a resistless tide, swept past, and away from, the old familiar landmarks—into a world we know not; at least by our former standards.

A late magazine article describes some one looking at two little girls; one six years old, the other four, and exclaiming—"Just think! Those children will never remember what the world was like before the war!"

We, who can remember, find that some of our friends and neighbors look upon us in a different way. They had seemed to travel with us in thought. Now our paths diverge. Some of the work we were doing is taken out of our hands; "We do not talk about those things now."

And so we may be tempted to sit down and wonder where our work is—just now. In such a frame of mind the writer goes back again and again to an afternoon last Autumn, when, during the waiting for a companion, in the reading-room of a Philadelphia department store, she picked up and idly glanced over a weekly containing a brief article by our Secretary of War.

Its purpose was to warn the American people against going into the great war in any but a serious and earnest spirit. It repeated that the struggle might be long; that there would be losses and disappointments—that those who are left at home would not escape burdens and anxieties. Unaccustomed strains would wear our nerves—our usual way of life would be interrupted—in short, he concluded, there will be great need for those who can act as "physicians of public opinion."

Secretary Baker has said other good things, but nothing more comprehensive than this phrase.

We have all experienced that waiting "to hear what the doctor says," when a dear life hangs in the balance. How we watch his face, and weigh his words, when he is one whose opinion we can trust. He sees further than we can into the meaning of symptoms, his eye is trained to note the slight changes. How much his patience, his calm cheerfulness, can do to quiet the restless, to cheer the despondent.

So may not we, if we have attained to a degree of settlement on the Foundation that "standeth sure," and are thereby enabled to keep a hold upon the things which "can not be shaken," but "remain,"—have our work to do as "Physicians of Public Opinion."

Elizabeth Fox Howard says in the current number of Fellowship Papers: "It is not so much what we say as what we are!—a mission perhaps, but not always easy to remember in these difficult days. Our lives in every part, our intercourse with all sorts and kinds of people, must witness to the power of love which we believe is the greatest force in the world, whether in private or public, or international affairs."

We, who believe in this power, may be doing our greatest service in the affairs of every day life, if we are watching a chance to lay a quieting touch on the feverish pulse of public opinion as, for instance, it concerns those whom we are beginning to call "dangerous aliens."

"People don't like Germany any more," said a small girl in one of our Children's "Homes." They "think Germans are bad." Even in the sheltered life of the "Home," her little heart had been troubled by the attitude of those about her, for she was evidently of German blood.

There is plentiful evidence of a desire to stir up the spirit of strife; there is much dwelling upon "every day's report of wrong and outrage with which the earth is filled," so that whatever is cheering and steady, must be sought out, and emphasized, if we would keep ourselves from depression and be able to help others.

Wise men are planning for the future—the "new world." What may be the message of the "new religion"—the spirit of the "new social order,"—the details of the terms of "permanent peace"—it is not given to all of us to foresee. But here and now; to-day—to-morrow—we, any one of us—may be, in our own measure, "physicians of public opinion."

F. T. R.

THE GROUND OF OUR TESTIMONY.

It must come as a surprise to not a few Friends to have it stated that the Quaker testimony against war is based upon the Mosaic precept, "Thou shalt not kill." To most of us, surely, the testimony is actually based upon Christ—upon His life, His teaching, His death, His resurrection and His abiding in us, as all the hope of spiritual glory that we have. He handled the precept in question as He handled the whole Mosaic law, by expanding the idea of family or tribe into "the whole family in heaven and earth." Against the limited, passive "Thou shalt not kill," He set the conquering note, "Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you." This is no pale passivism. To those who accept it in His spirit, it becomes the most militant force in the world, even when they may be shut up in the apparent hopelessness of a military prison.

Christ's idea of a "conquering Peace," to use W. Blair Neatby's favorite term, has made great inroads upon the settled customs of organized society. Two instances are cited below. In these conquests one finds the unanswerable argument for the "better way of life" in international affairs, for which we cannot cease to plead or to suffer even in the face of war. Once ions, and solitary confinement, and unspeakable cruelties seemed necessary in treating the demented. Now we all know that aesthetic, educational, moral and spiritual forces can prevail with such unfortunates when mere physical force fails utterly. The same is true of "hardened" criminals; apparently it has always been true of wild savages. The Pennsylvania demonstration alone might well shame the modern failure to have these greatest forces marshaled so as to have made war impossible. But these forces have not been so organized, and with the present ruthless assaults upon civilization shall we sit down supinely and cry "peace, peace"? By no means. The world's extremity must be our opportunity. We have at least two peaceful ways to express ourselves. First, by suffering, and by the relief of suffering. So small as our valiant young people in France may feel their work to be, so paltry as the needed half million dollars for the yearly support of this work actually is, there can be no question—the evidence is already at hand that in the after-war appraisal of resources for a new order this work will be a star of hope in international reconstruction. It gives the kind of sacrifice these volunteers have made a world content.

The second form of expression may be even more important than this. We may speak of the "failure of Christianity" in this world extremity. In doing so there is very great danger that we exclude ourselves—our own little Society from that failure—so subtle are the assaults of spiritual pride! In the matter of propagating "the better way of life", (this is the second form of expression to which we refer) we must confess to have failed very signally. That this failure, however, has not been complete is indicated in the exemption clause of the draft act. If our logic had been all wrong—if we had been just a set of blind enthusiasts, it was neither conceivable that we should have survived two hundred years, nor yet that we should have been recognized by Congress for something which we are not. "Christ's conquering peace" is no monopoly of ours. It is one point of advantage in our equipment for service that we have stood for it, even though we may have failed quite signally to teach it as a method applicable to international affairs. Above the din and smoke of battle is the promise for the world of this conquering peace. It must come in fullness after the war, it must come certainly by a method other than that of warfare. The call of the hour to us (it is heard in undertone even from military circles), is to mobilize these spiritual forces of life now so that we shall be able to contribute an appreciable mite to the new world order. Are we alive to this responsibility? Are we asking ourselves in candor why we have failed to do it more fully in the past?

J. H. B.

To know the Lord we must seek Him in all the transactions of life, and learn daily of Him.—A. SHIFTON.

A NEW JERSEY YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE.

Like an oasis of peace in the midst of our troubled times was the gathering of young Friends of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting at the Moorestown Academy on the afternoon and evening of Seventh-day, Second Month 2nd.

There was an attendance of perhaps one hundred, including a group who came from Westtown by special permission, and a few parents and teachers and members of the Religious Service Committee.

The afternoon conference was on the topic of "The Three-fold Life of Prayer, Bible Study and Service." Papers by Mary H. Rhoads and Henry W. Roberts dealt with prayer in the individual life and prayer in the meeting for worship. The discussion following was especially lively and helpful, attention being called to the value of prayer and worship in the midst of our everyday life, the use of odd times, and the need of being in the attitude of prayer about everything we do,—praying without ceasing." We must recognize, also, the value of united worship wherein we help each other to pray better than we could alone, and the call for intercessory prayer and life. Testimony was borne to the sense of help received in time of need from the prayers of friends far away, and to the fact that prayers are answered. We should break through any set forms and pray directly to God. Prayer is a real and efficacious thing if we have the right attitude to God,—a sense of absolute and final dependence on Him. We were reminded of Peter when he found himself sinking as he walked on the water to Jesus, and realized that God was essential to his life, nothing else remaining on which he could rely. When we reach this position prayer is very real.

May Jones gave reasons why we should study the Bible, emphasizing especially its many promises, and telling how the acceptance of just one of these had brought wonderful peace and joy into her life. A paper by Helen P. Cooper gave many practical suggestions about studying the Bible, the master-key being prayer. We should take a book of the Bible and live in and with it day by day till we know it perfectly and realize it was written for us. So we should learn to know the men and women of the Bible, and its teaching, and to know it as a whole.

Eleanor Stokes reminded us that Jesus knew no conflict in His life between culture and service. But His Church hitherto, while recognizing social Christianity, has placed its chief emphasis on self-culture, and men's eyes have been on the other world and their own soul's salvation even in their service of others. The constraining love of Christ has been the motive power of the Church, but it has not been applied to social conditions. Hence is our present world-tragedy. We should pray, "Our Father, thy Kingdom come and thy will be done on earth, here and now and forevermore."

In His own person Christ represents invincible good-will. We may know God by working with Him to fill the world with wise, forceful men of invincible good-will. Our love should be so Christlike that our brother's interests will be of vital interest to us and will be met by our fellowship and sympathy. We should serve our neighbors because Christ laid down His life for us; because so doing we are working with Him for His Kingdom on earth, and are helping to make the Gospel of Jesus Christ a living reality in a world that sorely needs Him.

James Willits impressed upon us that in order to serve most effectively we must give ourselves unreservedly to Christ, without Whom we can do nothing. As we keep in constant communion with Him and under His guidance we can truly serve our neighbor.

Mary Barton spoke of the need of overcoming our reticence about spiritual experiences whether due to our sense of their sacredness or our humility, or our fear of criticism. If the needs in our meetings are not being met the responsibility perhaps rests on us individually. Spiritual life in ourselves, our meetings and the Society would grow if we could overcome our tendency to withhold our better selves from others.

William H. Richie summed up the discussion by showing the relation of prayer, Bible study and service to the normal Christian life, of which Christ is the centre and Christ-consciousness the power.

After an hour and a half for supper and sociability there was a meeting addressed by Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles, who very helpfully showed how the Bible can be used for the building up of religious experience. Some of Christ's questions were cited, leading us to earnest thought and deeper understanding of His ideals of sincerity, sympathy and service as central needs of human life. The wonderful effect of the gospels on Japanese reading them for the first time suggested our trying to read our Bible as if it were a new book and thereby gaining fresh insight and inspiration.

Thus dwelling together for a time on the realities of life we were strengthened in faith and peace and hope and love.

E. C., Jr.

A REVIEW OF RAYNER W. KELSEY'S NEW BOOK — "FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS."

[We have already printed a brief review of Rayner W. Kelsey's book from the President of the Board of U. S. Indian Commissioners. The following is prepared at our request by an interested member of the Tunesassa Committee.—Eds.]

"This little volume is presented with the misgivings that always come when one arises from a literary task that has involved merciless condensation." These are the opening words of the author's preface, and the reader who follows this account of Quaker and Indian intercourse, covering, as it does a period of 262 years, and extending over so vast a continent, will have sympathy with the author and will be not a little pleased at his success.

In the great work of spreading the blessings of Christian civilization, no one nation or set of men have labored alone, and in this book the effort is made to give credit where credit is due. Thus, the heroism of Jesuits and Franciscans, the zeal of Congregationalist and Moravian are acknowledged along with the labors of Fox and Woolman and the philanthropies of "Liberal" and "Orthodox." Also, since generosity and fidelity are traits which Indians share, their contribution is not unnoticed.

Some idea of the scope of this book may be had from the following extracts and notes. In the perusal of the work, one has the satisfaction of knowing that materials have been gleaned chiefly from "sources" by a trained student who has had the advantages of Quaker association in both West and East.

At the beginning of the volume the history of the American Indians is sketched in outline. We are told that, by careful estimate, a decrease of 65 per cent. has occurred, since the white man came, in the number of Indians inhabiting the territory to-day comprehended by the United States, Canada, Greenland and Alaska. In the United States, in place of their vast domain, the broken tribes are distributed on 161 reservations.

"The story of such change in the fortunes of a once free and haughty race is sad at best, while at the worst it is not wholly darkened with loss nor unlightened by deeds of honorable state-craft and Christian charity."

"It was inevitable that the vast area of America should cease to be occupied by a scattered people in the roving, hunter stage of life. It was indeed of the greatest importance that the Indians should be led into the higher stages of life, wherein the earth, intensively cultivated by settled communities, could support thousands in the place of hundreds. So arose the necessity for the extinction of Indian land claims and the compression of the tribes within narrower limits.

["Friends and the Indians," 1655-1917. By Rayner Wickersham Kelsey, Ph. D., pp. 1-xii, 1-291. Published by The Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs, Philadelphia, 1917. For sale at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa. $1.50.]

The tragedy of the transaction lies in the stupidity and selfishness with which the work was often done by the representatives of Christian nations."

In regard to the work of transformation we read, "It is a task of the slow centuries to undo the work of ages and remake the savage children of the forest. Some will always scoff as the hard task drags and clogs along its way. Others will toil and faint not."

As a statement of up-to-date Government policy, Cato Sells, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is quoted, "Broadly speaking, a policy of greater liberalism will henceforth prevail in Indian administration to the end that every Indian, as soon as he has been determined to be as competent to transact his business as the average white man, shall be given full control of his property and have all his lands and monies turned over to him, after which he will no longer be a ward of the Government. . . . This is a new and far-reaching declaration of policy. It means that the competent Indian will no longer be treated as half ward and half citizen. It means reduced appropriations by the Government and more self-respect and independence for the Indian. It means the ultimate absorption of the Indian race into the body politic of the Nation. It means, in short, the beginning of the end of the Indian problem."

The second chapter of the book is entitled Preaching, and covers the period (roughly) 1658 to 1800. It describes the journeys and travails of Friends who from a sense of duty visited the Indians "to declare God's Everlasting Truth, and His Everlasting Way of Life and Salvation to them."

In the third chapter, with the heading Practice, is reviewed the conduct of the Quakers in their "week-day" intercourse with the Indians in civil concerns.

An interesting if sad revelation in this section is the extent of Indian slavery in early colonial days. Against this dark background, the generally enlightened practice of the Quakers stands out clearly.

Then follows a chapter entitled The Quaker Peace. Here we see more intimately the workings of the Quaker Peace policy in the settlements where, for a longer or shorter period, the influence of Friends was felt, politically. Just at this point the reader will find one of the most noteworthy portions of the book. The light of common sense and justice are thrown upon certain insinuations of the historians, Parkman and Fiske. They are answered in their own words. William Penn is ably defended as he was by Dixon in 1851.

Following the year 1800 the attention of the reader is largely restricted to what Friends have accomplished in their corporate capacity, in the establishment of mission stations. As in the preceding century, there have not been wanting bearers of Gospel messages to the Indians, but in addition there were inaugurated more permanent stations, the first of which was undertaken by Philadelphia Friends, and resulted in the establishment at Tunesassa. Other Yearly Meetings responded to the calls of particular times and needs. New England labored among the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy tribes from 1820 to 1870. New York rendered valuable assistance to the Six Nations until most of these moved westward, in 1830. "Liberal" Friends (N. Y.) who received the funds of the Indian Committee, continued to labor amongst those Indians who did not migrate. Especially noteworthy was the effort, united in by Friends of Genesee, Philadelphia and Baltimore Yearly Meetings to combat the selfish claims of the Ogdén Land Company. No Friend should be ignorant of this history.

Following the withdrawal of the tribes westward, the care of Friends followed them in many fields and with varying success, when suddenly a turn of affairs threw open a wide door for their efforts. Costly Indian wars of '52-'54, '64, '66 and '67 convinced even "military men that the war policy was not successful in dealing with the Indians. . . . "It was estimated at the time that in the Cheyenne War . . . the cost was more than a million dollars for every Indian killed." General Grant, during his Presidential term, invited the co-operation of Friends in a policy of improvement and education and it was decided that Orthodox Friends should give their care to the tribes in Kansas and the Indian Territory, while "Liberal Friends" should be responsible for tribes resident in the State of Nebraska. During the decade in which the Government encouraged this policy notable results were obtained.

Accounts of work still maintained in Oklahoma and in other fields including far-off Alaska, concludes the volume, whose index and bibliographical hand-boards will be the joy of future explorers in this wide field.

In a book containing so much valuable record and constructive suggestion, one sentence seems to me regrettable. It may be so read as to imply that the teaching of industrial arts in the later mission period was a happy substitution for Christian doctrine as taught in the seventeenth century by George Fox.

That such idea is refuted by present-day happenings is all too patent. As no amount of industrial arts has saved Germany from relapsing into savagery, so in no other way could the Indians be rescued from barbarism than by God's grace. This latter view is suggested. I think, in every other part of this interesting book.

W. B. E.

A MESSAGE OF LOVE.

MARY HEUSTIS PATTERSON.

I come before my readers, as the Apostle Paul told the Corinthians, "not with enticing words of man's wisdom," but with a message from Christ's Sermon on the Mount, wherein he entreated the multitude to "Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness," and assured them that all things needful will be added. And although the Pharisees were noted for their strict observance of rites, ceremonies and traditions, they demanded of Jesus when the Kingdom of God should come. He answered and said: "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation, neither shall they say, Lo here! or lo there! for, behold, the Kingdom of God is within you." The apostle afterward declared to the Corinthians, this kingdom "is not in word, but in power." I believe the Kingdom of God is the power revealed by unceasing prayer, by which we hold communion with God, our heavenly Father, in the secret of our own souls. This communion stimulates beautiful thoughts, aspirations and longings for good, that through faith are sanctified by the power of Truth and ascend voiceless, or in words, to the throne of the Most High. The prayers of thanksgiving for God's blessings of love, of truth, of beauty, of goodness, and of power, are the prayers that come from the righteous, the faithful, who have come to partake of the feast of good things that make the Kingdom of God a joy forever. The truths of this Kingdom are as a feast of good things to all who love and serve in humility of spirit, with charity for all and enmity toward none. If we are careful to practice these graces, we are either serving by good works, or by a ministry of love. This service may be in teaching God's truths, in healing the physical body, in serving those in need, in doing justice and showing mercy to all, in consoling the broken-hearted, or in comforting the bereaved ones. Whatever our mission may be, if it is only in quiet waiting, each daily life has an influence over others, and "each becomes a minister of God according to the gift of Divine grace in Christ." Although we may sometimes doubt God's love, or may question His mercy, and may feel He is sending our afflictions or misfortunes to punish us for our misdeeds, we may yet strive to be submissive to what we consider the ordering of an all-wise providence. We may say we have great faith in prayer, and yet know not, in our own strength, how to pray aright, for we may be so anxious to obtain our hearts' desire that we may ask amiss. Our failure to receive may then prove "a blessing in disguise." It may make us see that it is our selfishness, unbelief, or disobedience that is causing our afflictions, and may show us that we are only paying a just penalty because we have slighted the bountiful provision God has made for our needs, our comfort, our enjoyment, and for the salvation of our immortal souls. It is only when we disregard His eternal laws of Truth that we are forced to "reap bitter for sweet and darkness for light." "He that cometh to God must believe that He is and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him," and without this faith it is impossible to please ourselves, much less to please God. If we seek we shall find Him through prayer, in His own kingdom within us. God is just, and shows "mercy to thousands who love Him and keep His commandments." To such the Kingdom of God is radiant with light in the glory of God's redeeming love in Christ.

PASADENA, California.

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF HENRY T. OUTLAND, Sr.

[From The Roanoke-Chowan Times of First Month 24, 1918, written by M. J. Peele, and abbreviated for THE FRIEND.—Eds.]

The subject of this sketch was born Second Month 21, 1846, near Rich Square, N. C., and departed this life Twelfth Month 28, 1917.

He was the second of the six children of Wm. C. and Martha Copeland Outland and was a descendant of the Outlands, Copelands and Peeles, who settled in this section and assisted in establishing Friends' meetings here in 1760.

With the exception of about two years which, in young manhood, he spent in the home of an uncle in Indiana, he has ever made this section his home.

Although of a mirthful and witty temperament, Henry quite young in years showed signs of deep serious thoughtfulness; often manifesting in rather a marked degree an inclination to give heed unto the promptings of the voice of his conscience, which voice, later in life, he became thoroughly convinced was none other than the voice of the Risen Christ in his inmost soul—"Behold I stand at the door and knock, if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him and he with me." (Rev. iii: 20). As he was thus made willing to open the door of his heart to this precious Visitor, who dwelleth with the contrite and humble in spirit, he experienced a change of heart—the New Birth—and was readily converted into a "mouthpiece" for his dear Lord and Master, whom he now loved above everything else.

The wording of the text of his first sermon—"Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"—serves as an index to his conception of the Church as shown throughout his useful career.

Notwithstanding the marked degree of piety strikingly manifested during his childhood days he, as not infrequently is the case with those who are chosen by the Lord for pillars in the Church, was allowed to plunge into the dark sea of doubt and disbelief, as regards the future state of mankind, but, happily from this deplorable state he was soon led into the Glorious Light of the Sun of Righteousness.

At the age of twenty-six years he was recorded a Minister of the Gospel among Friends. He was not only a birthright member, but an ardent and practical one as well, made so through the saving knowledge of Christ, his Redeemer—this alone makes any true Friend. Throughout life he remained a loyal and highly esteemed Minister in this branch of the Church.

Even when a mere boy he was of a studious disposition, especially as regards the study of the Holy Scriptures, often scanning their precious pages during rest periods—while his plow horse rested in the shade or his father's pigs were being minded. By thus carefully and prayerfully reading and meditating over this sacred Book—although he never attended any theological seminary—he soon became well versed in the Bible.

He traveled quite extensively in behalf of the Church, having three times visited the Dominion of Canada and crossed the Chesapeake Bay nearly 100 times, visiting meetings and families as is the custom among Ministers of this Society.

Wherever apprehended duty took him he was warmly received and highly esteemed we are assured, by voices which have followed him back home through letters to his meeting, as well as through the medium of private information.

Whenever duty called him away and ample means were lacking he was always provided for, sometimes in rather a remarkable manner. Only one of the many instances to illustrate this we give herein. Once while on his way to the train he was asked by his son if he had his pocketbook, which, upon examination, he found missing. Naturally, the son insisted they return home but, after a few moments' meditation, and doubtless prayer, he (the father) declared, "I must go on." Soon they met a man, who hailing them, said; "Mr. Outland, I awoke early this morning feeling you were in need of money, and remembering I owed you a sum I told my wife I was going to take it to you, so here it is." Consequently the trip was made.

He was happily married to Abigail P. Gennette, Wayne Co., N. C., Tenth Month 13, 1870. To this union were born seven children, one of whom died in early childhood.

One who visited him two days prior to his death said of him in part,—“It was a very great satisfaction to be with him. While in his presence it seemed we were with one who had ‘overcome’ and was just waiting to be translated from this vale of tears to that Place promised to the ransomed and redeemed. At one time he said, ‘Last night after retiring I felt so very low down I hardly knew what to do and these words —“Cast all thy cares upon Him”—came to me, this I was enabled to do and immediately I felt great strength.”

On the last night of his life, after having lain down, which he had not been able to do for many hours before, his daughter says of him,—“He looked so peaceful and closed his eyes and said,—‘I commit myself and my dear family to the keeping of the Lord.’ He soon fell asleep and rested well for a few hours.”

His funeral, held at Cedar Grove, Twelfth Month 30, 1917, despite the zero weather, was fairly well attended. Many lively testimonies were handed forth by those who felt called to speak, from the Scripture texts: “He being dead yet speaketh,” “Holy is he who hath part in the first resurrection for over him the second death can have no power,” and “The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are His.”

The burial took place in Friends' Cemetery, Woodland, N. C.

“To thee it (death) is not
So much as the lifting of a latch;
Only a step into open air,
Out of a tent already luminous
With light that shines through Its transparent walls.”

NOTES FROM THE SOUTH.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

Listen to the exhortation of the Dawn:

Look to this Day!

For it is life, the very life of life.

In its brief course lie all the verities

And realities of your existence;

The glory of action,

The bliss of growth,

The splendor of beauty.

For yesterday is but a dream,

And to-morrow is only a vision;

But to-day, well lived, makes

Every yesterday a dream of happiness,

And every to-morrow a vision of hope.

Look well, therefore, to this Day!

Such is the salutation of the Dawn.

—From the Sanskrit.

The last few days of sunshine and a much higher temperature than has mostly been experienced for several months past, give inspiration and rest to the mind and spirit as well as to the body. “The glory of action, the bliss of growth, and the splendor of beauty” never seemed more real. One must get a true perspective from a distance and so the quiet of this retreat in the southland has afforded some opportunity to view the passing world with renewed confidence in that Eternal Order which abides in the midst of all the conflict and the sorrow with the universal suffering.

The terrible winter and the terrible war are both but a temporary phase of the great evolution from the lower to the higher realities. The hour and power of darkness will not prevent the resurrection of light and love and human fellowship, however much they may destroy human beings. Each day renews the promise, “as thy need so shall thy strength be.” A recent writer has said, “Your brain is a babbling child; your soul is like a prophet walking in the garden. The prophet turns, enters your house with inspired face, bringing a message for you—for you alone.”

“The continued whimpered nothings of the child distract the prophet's intention and he departs without leaving the revelation. You must still the voice of the brain to hear the deeper, the unerring voice. . . . We hear the song sparrow a thousand times. At last, in some moment of our purer receptivity, we realize that this is one of Nature's angels saying, ‘The plan is good. The plan is good.’ The sparrow was singing it all the time.” Yes, as I have listened to the mocking bird and the cardinal to-day it has seemed to me that the Divine purpose was just as good and more promising of fulfillment than ever before in human history—the glorious sunset and superb afterglow sealing the conviction “there shall be light at eventide.”

In our short-sightedness we say, alas! alas! when in very truth the Father, who gave us being, is striving, through every day's experience of His extended mercies, to show us His marvelous loving-kindness. For while truly

“God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants His footsteps in the sea
And rides upon the storm.”

Yet we continually see how He “tempers the wind to the shorn lamb.”—if we keep the right eye open.

The world is in the throes of its greatest chastening and blessed are they who understand that we are on the threshold of a new social era. When such men as Charles Schwab say, seriously, that “the aristocracy of the future is not going to be the aristocracy of wealth; it is going to be the aristocracy of men who have done something for their country and for the world at large. Such men will be the true aristocrats. When that time comes, wealth will not be the standard nor will lineage of birth, but the standard will be the man of honorable and straightforward demeanor.” We must realize that a new day is dawning upon our social horizon.

The readjustment will be difficult for some who have been caught in the meshes of materialism and for those who have not chosen spiritual realities rather than material. For the spiritual alone makes life worth living.

Had the spirit and teaching of John Woolman prevailed in the world, these drastic changes would not now be necessary. With the lamentable failure of the churches in this world crisis and the crushing burdens of militarism afflicting the whole human race, men and women will turn to the inward Source of help. In his New Year's message to the Society of Friends, Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin suggested the true remedy: “No negation of evil will save us to-day. Only the cleansing streams of Divine love and power can carry us forward to realize a new and better world.”

“Love must be in us no passing emotion, but a dynamic and creative force. This it may become, not by the will of man, but as we are born of the Spirit.”

Our journey to Florida on the eighth inst., was much more comfortable than some have experienced this winter, on account of belated trains. It is one of the privileges of travel to meet with very intelligent and agreeable fellow-travelers. As these come from different sections of our country we had profitable converse and a symposium of thought and sentiment.

The South has been greatly enriched by many visitors and residents from the North, East and West, who have carried their habits and traditions with them. Some of these newcomers have built very attractive winter homes and transferred their interests from orange groves to real estate. This was particularly manifest during the freeze of last year and that of a month ago.

Our own bungalow was made entirely ready for us by a kindly neighbor, and has been made very comfortable by a heater in the cellar through a range of 60°F. since our coming on the tenth inst. We took the St. John's River boat from Jacksonville to Sanford and greatly enjoyed this trip of two hundred miles—seeing one large alligator in the water and many blue and white heron. Many changes have come to this land of flowers since the writer first saw it thirty-five years ago, but the St. John's River remains the same. We have had an attendance of thirty to fifty at our meetings for worship, held in "The Osceola."

ORLANDO, Fla., First Month 30, 1918.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

TAMI'S MISSIONARY WORK.—[The following is furnished by Esther Balderston Jones.—Eds.]

In Mito, Japan, there is a little girl about ten years old named Tami. Her father is principal of a normal school and she lives in a pretty house with her little brothers and sisters. They all wear pretty flowered dresses, and wooden shoes and play all sorts of games American children do not know, and some they do, like hide and seek and jump rope.

Tami's house is very near the Friends' Meeting-house and when about one hundred children go in on First-day morning to First-day school, she goes too.

One day the teacher taught a temperance lesson. This time it was not, "It is wrong to drink beer and wine," but "It is wrong to smoke tobacco." Tami listened carefully because her own dear father smoked tobacco. At the end the teacher said, "Now I am sure you all understand how tobacco is a poison. It makes the inside of the lungs all yellow and dirty and it is hard for them to take the good air and make the blood clean and pure. It also makes the heart work badly, and people often die because their hearts have been hurt by tobacco and cannot work any more."

Tami's own heart almost stopped beating as she heard this. Suppose her father should die! But the teacher went on, "I expect some of your fathers smoke tobacco. Are you going to sit by and see them taking more and more poison into their bodies, and say nothing?"

Tami could not forget what the teacher said, and one day when her father came home, and was sitting smoking, she came up to his knee and said, "Father, is tobacco very delicious?" "O, no," he answered, smiling, "it's not good at all." "Then why do you smoke it, father?" "Oh, because I am used to it." "But, father," said little Tami, looking up with her eyes full of tears, "father, my teacher told me it was poison and was bad for your body. Won't you please stop—I don't want you to die, dear father—" and she buried her face in his lap.

He threw down his pipe and never smoked again—because he, like most people, really knew it was bad for him, but just did it because he was used to it; until his little daughter's question roused his conscience. So Tami was a missionary to her own dear father.

Whoso hath felt the spirit of the Highest

Cannot confound nor doubt him nor deny;

You with one voice, O world, though thou deniest,

Stand thou on that side, for on this am I.

FRIENDS COURT-MARTIALED.

Alwyne A. Walmesley (Lancaster P. M.), at his court-martial at Park Hall Camp, Oswestry, on the 28th inst., said:

"Could I but let you realize the closeness of God's presence and of the practical care that I have experienced during these months; as well as of the consciousness of the power and reality of prayer, which has long been a component part of my life, but whose sense has been intensified beyond all perception in the quiet communion of my prison cell, you would grasp, in some small measure perhaps, the absolute positiveness of the testimony I stand to own before you to-day. . . . As the forces of the world are working to a deadlock, as people are beginning to feel the lack of something, and to gain no satisfaction along the path they are pursuing, it becomes more and more urgent upon us to hold out clearly our testimony as to the reality, the all-sufficiency, the omnipotence of His way of life. . . . In this spirit [of the message of Christ] Penn successfully colonized Pennsylvania; Livingstone found in it a fitting counterpoise, a sufficiently sustaining and penetrating power for contending with the darkness of Africa. Through this power, too, Quakers have lived in strength and quietness of mind, in the midst of perils—whether from the raids of hostile Indians or from the turmoil and uncertainty of civil wars and persecution, when others who relied on force of arms alone, either found that source of strength fail them in their hour of trial, or else, not daring to trust that power so far, were compelled to retreat to safer places. . . .

"In the spiritual development of the individual lies the only hope for the salvation of society, the only check to prevent civilization from plunging headlong into that anarchy to which it is only too clearly advancing. The nation that retains sight of the just relationship of values—which can still distinguish the virtue of real things—is the one which will come out of this awful struggle with her vital—her moral—strength least impaired, whatever her material gains or losses may be. We must beware lest we do not draw back in time from our apparent inclination to follow along the disastrous path of political thought which Germany has chosen, and which has led to all her perverse aspirations, and to the brutal expression of their working out."

A. A. W. was sentenced, for the second time, to two years' H. L.—The Friend (London).

A MEETING FOR WORSHIP IN A DETENTION CAMP.

[After the letter from a prisoner of war, which we printed a few weeks ago, the following from The Friend (London) seems to be further convincing evidence that the heaven of good in the camps is working wonderfully.—Eds.]

The Emergency Committee for the Help of Aliens has received from a prisoner of war the sum of £1 10s., the result of a collection for widows and orphans, made at the little meeting held every evening in his hut, together with a model of the hut in the form of a collecting box. He wrote to the Secretary of the Committee:—

"DEAR FRIEND.—By the everlasting grace of God I was enabled to hand to our friend a little model of a but such as we live in, containing the small result of the few here that are trying to follow that 'pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father,' to be sent on to you. We would be thankful to you, if it would help to lead to the formation of our concern: 'an international fund for widows and orphans,' as well—and I personally have a most burning concern in this—feel that all nations, belligerents and neutrals alike, are responsible and answerable for their welfare. We are still gathering nightly in silence, awaiting the breaking of our daily bread of life, and have thus by the everlasting mercy of the Father, been led to embrace the true faith followed by 'Friends,' and pray Him daily for the grace of Jesus to enter the hearts of all men; that the Holy Spirit may renew their minds, and they may see 'the Light within' them, and listen to the voice Divine that taught them to love one another. Our prayers are uniting with all in the mind of Christ our Lord, for the turning of men unto Jesus, the Lord and Saviour, who alone can lead them to that peace, which the world and all her armies can never give, the peace of God, who is Jehovah-Shalom, our peace."

We are devoting the money thus sent to us for the widows and children of men who have died during their internment.

M. C. F.

LETTER FROM RUSSIA.

АМБУКАР МУТЦЕК, Оpendьпрекарer Yer 27, Hyzydyeken поpоор,
Cооpеken ryd., Tenth Month 14, 1917.

DEAR MOTHER:—

Both this matter of being American representative! I never get time to write to any of my family and friends. First-day is the only day that I have time to write letters and then I'm in a mad tear to get off notes to the girls in the other centres asking them, for pity's sake, to send reports, and send wool, and send potatoes, and looms, and what not—then I must write twelve pages to H. C., laying all the matters of a two days' session of the Committee here before him, asking advice, reproof and suggestions.

I like the job of relief worker, but when it comes to Committee member and housekeeper thrown in, I'm ready to give up. I did hope that changing my centre (not physically speaking, but a different place of residence I mean) would relieve me of that housekeeping job, but no! if we stay here for the winter which occurs if the refugees don't all go to Siberia as the Subeemooka ones did, I'm to be housekeeper at Andreevka. It is not so large as the other place, but there will be a doctor, two nurses and myself, English speaking, an Austrian prisoner who runs the dispensary, another who is hospital orderly, two German speaking refugee girls as maids, a Russian girl who does cleaning and washing, and worst luck! a Russian refugee who is major domo in the matter of buying, pumping water, etc. Also it is rumored that we are to buy cows, two or three, and run a dairy as milk is so scarce.

It was most picturesque the other day. We were laying in our winter stock of hay, which had come two days' journey up from Cossack land (near Asia) in carts drawn by a camel each. We had six camels geared to as many carts lying down all over our little compound; and of course my trunk has not yet come and camera was not at hand.

I have only recently come to this new place, and I think it will be interesting. There are rather more women in the work-room, and we do more diversified things, such as making padded coats, which are stuffed like quilts and are warm enough to stand the climate here, as well as the usual work of sorting wool and preparing it for spinning, weaving, knitting and embroidery; also preparing hemp for spinning and weaving, etc. The place has the reputation of doing poor work, as it has not had a regular relief worker for some time. The work-room is situated right within our compound—for which I'm devoutly thankful. It is a small building, one-story high, of well-finished log cabin style; painted a dull orange, as are all our buildings and floors. Within are five little work-rooms, about the size of our sitting-room on the farm (11x18), an office and three or four storage closets. I go about jingling with keys, as we live back in the old days when everything must be locked up. I have not found out whether it is Russian or English.

By 8 A. M. I'm on duty getting the working members of the forty women who work here, and checking also the amount of wool given out for home spinning. Everything is weighed when it goes out as wooly fuzz and comes back as balls or stockings. And all must be weighed and measured in Russian weights and measures. Spring balances made in England according to Russian poonds (36 pounds) and foonts (3½ pound). This is most as bad as their alphabet. Then I must trot around to see what the weaving is like, and how many women will finish that day, so that a new warp (or is it woof?), I know the Russian terms but not the English) must be made ready. You should see the fancy plaids we do, also stripes, but the best things are quite narrow, not more than an arshine (¾ of a yard) wide, as the looms won't take any more. All Russian material comes this way.

At this point I was called off to have an attempt at a discussion with the old nuidjik who is to make valerikis for us. These are a kind of felt boot very thick and warm. His wife came along to see what wool we had purchased for the things, and I really understood some of their conversation. Also the major domo came in, and we had much business weighing the bag, then weighing the wool and the bag, and charging up the man with so much wool from our store-house which he is to deliver as three pairs of valeriki next market day.

On my way back to our living house Gulda, the maid, wanted me to show her how to make an American salad as I had promised. So in lieu of lettuce I cut up hearts of cabbage and mixed it with cold duck (we get presents of ducks from grateful patients) and cut up the last of our tomatoes and some hard boiled eggs—and here laugh! made some mustard dressing! How do you do it? Would you like to know what I did? Put some white liquid on the stove, it comes from a native cow, and goes by the name of milk, but it acts, looks and tastes queer, and never has any cream and sours while you look at it. Then I put in some Ruskyy butter, which is boiled after being shaken into a semblance of butter (it tastes like cheese and acts so, too). Then I mixed some so-called mustard with cold milk (it lumped) and stirred it into the loathesome mass. Now knowing my ingredients please give me a real receipt—only our mustard tastes like curry. Also please a cook book which emphasizes carrots, cabbages and mutton would be most acceptable. The only thing the English know to do with a vegetable is to boil it, and here we have a very nice German-speaking Russian girl for cook, who wants to come to America after the war, so she will learn anything.

Poor Gulda—I'm going to smuggle her. If any one wants a good maid and will send me the money I'll bring her home. She works from 5 A. M. till 10 P. M. and learns English after that. She comes back at five to get supper when we send her away for the afternoon and evening.

Now I must go to supper and our weekly mail cart is likely to come before that is over. As soon as supper is over it is time for service. Do write to me lots. I'm sure you aren't as busy as I.

ANNA J. HAINES.

ADHERENCE TO PRINCIPLE.

The Friend (London) of First Month 18th has an appreciation of Joseph Firth Clark, who died First Month 9, 1918. The following recital of examples of adherence to principle will interest our readers:—

J. Firth Clark was for thirty years a member of the Doncaster Corporation. On two different occasions he occupied the post of Mayor. When holding this office in 1908, he received an invitation to meet King Edward VII on the Doncaster race course. The local paper says, "To the general amazement and consternation," he declined. The letter he wrote on the occasion ran as follows:—

"It would indeed have been a great honor, which I should have looked back upon all my life with the greatest gratification, as I have a profound respect and regard for our most gracious King, whom I desire to honor in every way, as one of his most loyal subjects. Though I have lived in Doncaster all my life, I have never once attended the races, and did not therefore feel that I could consistently break through the rule even for so great an honor."

Again, to quote the local paper, "The incident caused a great sensation at the time, and many people were little short of horrified that Doncaster's mayor should have declined to meet His Majesty." Those, however, who knew J. F. Clark were not surprised, for the keynote of his life was firm adherence to principle. If a thing was wrong, it was wrong and there was an end of the matter. In this same spirit, when war broke out, he severed a life-long connection with the Liberal Association (of which for many years he was President), after, it had joined hands with its political opponents and become as he phrased it, "a recruiting agency." It was a great satisfaction to him that his two sons and daughter shared his strong pacifist views.

He that is true to God will be true to man also.—ELLWOOD.

NEWS ITEMS.

The minutes of the Educational Committee which appeared in our last issue were printed without the sanction of that Committee. The editors are glad to receive authorized reports from the various committees of our meetings, they believe it adds to the general interest of the causes we all wish to foster, but we acknowledge the error as ours in having printed freely from the minutes of this Committee.—Eds.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

[From rather extensive reports of Charles Evans in our hands we select the following items. It is our desire to give all necessary details without duplication.—Eds.]

ORGANIZATION.—Our total number of workers in Paris and in the field amounts to 138, they are distributed as follows:

- 8 at 53 Rue de Rivoli, Office Mission Anglo-Américaine.
- 4 at 4 Place de la Concorde, Bureau Friends' Unit A. R. C.
- 1 in Paris, assisting Dr. Morax in eye work.
- 13 at Dole, building maisons démontables.
- 23 at Ormans, building maisons démontables.
- 1 at "La Glandier," near Pompadour, preparing a report on conditions in a proposed home for 1,000 Belgian children.
- 1 is loaned to Military Affairs to assist in developing artificial limbs.
- 2 are loaned to Historical Department, Civil Affairs.
- 1 is loaned to Grace E. Harper for agriculture.
- 3 are loaned to Dr. Lucas at Toul, Caserne du Luxembourg.
- 9 are in Plessis-Robinson E. L. Trudeau Hospital, Dr. White Department.
- 2 are loaned to Italian Com. of American Red Cross (also two English Friends).
- 10 at Hospital du Château, Sermatze-les-Bains.
- 18 at Sermatze, Agriculture and House repair.
- 16 at Gruny. House repair and agriculture, 8 each.
- 10 at Ham, erecting maisons démontables.
- 4 at Esmerly-Hallon, maisons démontables.
- 1 at Golancourt, Agriculture.
- 1 at Samoens, Pretubercular and Convalescent Home.
- 1 at Bar-le-Buc, Relief work.
- 1 at Charmont, Relief work.
- 2 at Vitry-le-François, Relief and embroidery.
- 3 at Troyes, Relief work.
- 1 at Bettancourt-la-Logne, Children's Hospital.
- 1 in Paris, not assigned as yet to any department.
- 1 in Hospital, Paris.
- 1 at Foreste, maisons démontables, work just beginning.

138.

This total combined with the British Friends of 176 makes 314 the number of workers in the Société des Amis.

Twenty-five more men have been cabled for to be placed in different departments of the Mission Anglo-Américaine, two additional women nurses are expected, also three women additional Social and Relief workers and one man whose papers were delayed in America may arrive at any time.

CURRENT WORK.—Repairs and reconstruction proceed in Gruny. Agricultural work is suspended in the open on account of weather conditions, although threshing at Sermatze in country barns will go forward continuously. Several men are at work erecting tractors and plows just received from America, both arrived in good condition. Increased preparations for breeding rabbits are under way, also importation of goats from Pyrenean mountains.

Some forty acres have been plowed and sown to wheat near Golancourt. Our work near Ham has been retarded by inability to get permits for workers; but on the 27th thirteen carnets d'étrangers came through in a bunch so that this difficulty is eliminated. Several cases of tools and agricultural implements have been just received from America, together with one 3-ton White truck for lumber hauling at Ormans and one 1-ton White truck for general service at Ham. These much needed additions will be invaluable.

MISCELLANEOUS.—In the main conditions appear sound, here and there a worker loses the vision and fails to put out as much energy as we think proper, but in the main this is not the case. Some of the men do surprisingly well, and undertake menial tasks, such as cooking and washing dishes for large groups of their co-workers (where this is temporarily necessary) with good cheer.

NEW WORK.—In addition to the operations at the Hachette property previously touched upon, our chief extension in the line of new development is at Dr. Babbitt's hospital at Sermatze. We have loaned him trained workers from different équipes who have been doing the electric wiring, attending to the lighting arrangements, plumbing affairs, etc., besides the general renovation. Dr. Babbitt advises that he has a large number of surgical cases pending, and it would appear that before we are ready to treat them a very considerable volume is waiting our attention. We think, therefore, there is no question that this move is a wise one. The arrival of Dr. Babbitt on the scene at Sermatze has enabled our Dr. Earp to move his office nearer Verdun, his headquarters now being Auzeville. He also finds plenty of work waiting. The tuberculous work of the Friends in Paris has now been moved to the new office, Rue Boissy d'Anglais. This arrangement is in every way far superior to the old one where the patients called at the Hotel Britannique. Our workers are delighted at the improvement.

An American of means residing in Paris is preparing to endow a group of farm buildings or a suitable Château for the assistance of tubercular refugees. She has offered us the direction and control of the work. The matter is being investigated and we shall ask your advice before going seriously into the proposition. We have also loaned to the Am. Cross 4 workers for Italy. These are leaving by train to-night to report at Rome. Two of them speak Italian fluently and are experienced in the field, and two other Americans have had varied and valuable experience, and the fifth member of the party has had considerable life in Italy and is going down to make herself useful in any capacity.

MISCELLANEOUS.—We wish to express our gratitude for the confidence shown in the Friends' work by the granting of our appropriation and by your further general endorsement of our request for additional transportation facilities. In order to cut down the consumption of essence (gasoline), we are purchasing from our own funds 50 bicycles in Great Britain, which we shall expect our workers to use wherever possible. These are to be distributed throughout the different équipes.

It is understood that our dear Friend Esther Fowler, of Winona, Ohio, has a minute of New Garden Monthly Meeting, liberating her to attend the approaching Yearly Meeting and some other meetings within our limits.

TUNESSASA NOTES.—Harvey E. Garwood, whose death occurred on the 10th inst., at Tunessassa, was born on Eighth Month 16, 1881, his parents being Daniel G. and Annie Garwood, of Moorestown, N. J.

For several years he had been employed as butter-maker in the dairy at Tunessassa. He made many friends, both among the whites and Indians. This fact was evinced by the attendance at the funeral meeting, held at the School on the 11th, when almost every family in the valley was represented.

As no one was witness at the time of the accident resulting in his death, the account of it can only be supplied from the attendant circumstances. A few weeks ago he had spoken of a fainting spell, during which he was compelled to lean against the wall for support. It is supposed that a similar attack overcame him while he was feeding some carrots and turnips to the horses, since he was found lying crosswise of a stall, having apparently fallen under the horse, which being frightened, must have trampled him. When found he was unconscious and died about a half-hour after being removed to the house.

His last act was therefore one of kindness, a trait which seems to have marked his actions through life. The sympathy of Friends will go out to his family in their sudden bereavement. W. B. E.

At Tunessassa perhaps more than at most other schools anxiety is felt in regard to contagious diseases as School convenes. We have so far been preserved from contracting the dreaded small-pox so prevalent in this State during the past fall and winter, but two cases of Three-day Measles have appeared among the girls with the prospect of more to follow. Each has been only slightly ill.

The children are much interested in their work, especially those in the Domestic Science classes recently started.

The new cottage is practically completed and ready for occupancy.

Some grading and outside painting will need be done when warmer weather comes. It is uncertain when Henry B. Leeds and family will move into it, since the unusually cold weather has frozen the water pipe line leading to it. The pipes leading to the rear cow stable, the tenant-house, and the horse-barn have also been frozen.

Charles S. Moffitt is expected to move into the tenant-house soon and act as one of the outside helpers.

Some exceptionally pleasant evenings have been spent by the family in the living-room around the open fire-place, recently built by a Friend interested in the comfort of the family.

W. B. R.

FIRST MONTH 31, 1918.

CHARLES E. TEBBETTS has a significant study of the statistics of the Society of Friends during the past five years. Some of his statements will come as a surprise.

"They show a loss for the five year period of 397 for the Five Years' Meeting; or 261 for all America." . . . "Philadelphia that for so many years showed little gain, during the last period gained 194; and London outdistained all American Yearly Meetings with a gain of 1452. The meetings that are showing heaviest losses are those of the Mississippi valley."

The following paragraph shows the analytical character of the study: "A more careful study of the local meetings of Indiana Yearly Meeting reveals another factor. Of the sixteen Quarterly Meetings, only four show any gain for the period. Of its local meetings nineteen may be classed as city; thirty-nine as village, and eighty-six rural. About one-half the city meetings show considerable gains, and also one-fifth of the village; scarcely one-tenth of the rural meetings show any progress; most of them hardly holding their own. A slight survey of the other Yearly Meetings indicates about the same situation in them. Further light comes from Kansas statistics. Eight Quarterly Meetings, having forty-eight meetings, and 4141 members in 1917, lost during the five years 972 or 19 per cent. Seven of these Quarterly Meetings were in the eastern half of the State, and the oldest in the Yearly Meeting. Four Quarterly Meetings with fourteen congregations and 2062 members, gained 52, or barely held their own. Six Quarterly Meetings, with thirty-seven congregations, and 5350 members, gained 947 members, or 15 per cent. All six are the new meetings in the western half of the State."

The regular session of Abington Quarterly Meeting was held on the afternoon of the 7th, at Germantown. A sense of the inclusiveness of the Master's service spread over the meeting when Mansaku Nakamura and Gilbert Bowles gave a message from Japan. Although the number of Christians does not exceed the Buddhist priests, they have risked their lives for their faith and the service of Christ and through this manifested courage and the enthusiasm of the children, comes a great hope for the future.

"They shall come from the north, south, east and west into the fold and they shall become one flock, one shepherd."

The report of the Visitation Committee was read, followed by a discussion upon the smaller meetings and all were encouraged to bring their strength and support to them.

After the reading of the report upon Intoxicants, a young Friend expressed the desire that the personal contact which comes through the Inquiry, might be directed into other and more important channels, if such means of contact can be found. The meeting united with the concern.

M. J.

The Correspondence and Publicity Bureau of Japan is one of the hopeful constructive agencies that since 1917 has been working for enlightened internationalism.

The general Secretary has offices in the Y. M. C. A. building in Tokio. His duties include personal interviews with influential political and newspaper men of Japan, the preparation of press material, co-operation with efforts of the League to Enforce Peace, arrangement of lectures and addresses, the co-operation of churches, assistance to Japanese Students, etc., etc. The annual budget of $2400 received from the two peace Societies seems a surprisingly small sum for the basis of so much work.

The Scripture Gift Mission continues its valuable work. Letter No. 11 from them gives compelling evidence of their claim upon our support. From France and Russia, from military policemen and from hospital workers come striking testimony of the comfort and help of the pocket testaments.

304 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Penna.

TO THE EXEMPTION COMMITTEE:—

Second Month 11, 1918.

Reports of Visits to Camps Dix and Meade.

An apparently well-founded report in effect that one of our members at Camp Dix had so far departed from the situation of a Conscientious Objector as to accept a military assignment was the chief reason for the writer visiting that place on the 6th inst. I am glad to be able to state that the report was incorrect. There are at Camp Dix, so far as we are able to ascertain, only six absolute C. O.'s. Sidney O. Nicholson and Wendell F. Oliver are members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Frank Morse is a member of Friends' Church, New York. Edward DeHart, Rudolph Brana, Lloyd Donnell are included in the group. These men are engaged in volunteer work in the Camp Library. They looked well; and there was evident among them a feeling of close fellowship. They were very anxious to be released from the life of inactivity; although I think they felt the force of the statement expressed to them that their time spent in camp is for a definite purpose; and that it will have a definite influence in events yet to be developed.

A trip to Camp Meade was made on the 9th inst. in company with F. Algernon Evans. We first visited the Y. W. C. A. Hostess House and found there Lane, Baily, Hagaman and Loeb. Recent unpleasantness in camp was brought to a climax some two weeks ago by cruelty inflicted upon Stabler, who had his ear-drum punctured through the orders of a brutal officer. This resulted in a sympathy strike on the part of all the C. O.'s. We intervened on their behalf some two weeks ago; and a better understanding has resulted, though there is still some tension and a feeling akin to discouragement at the outlook.

Baily has for weeks been working at the Hostess House. Lane, Hagaman and Loeb were returning at the time of our visit—the first time since the recent strike—to see if they could make satisfactory arrangements for volunteer service. Hoffman was working in the Y. M. C. A., and we did not see him. Stabler is still in the Base Hospital; and though he has recovered his hearing, we are led to believe he may be kept there until released from camp. Branson, Thorpe and Mason have accepted no definite service of late, except to cut and haul fuel for their barracks (no coal is furnished them) and certain kitchen duties. Branson and Mason were quartered with the Socialists. Grantham has accepted service in the Utility Branch of the Quartermaster's Department. We met him in full military uniform. He expressed satisfaction at the course he had taken.

Of the above, Lane, Branson, Thorpe, Mason and Grantham are members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Baily and Hoffman are near members and Hagaman and Stabler are members of the other Branch of Friends.

The large groups of Mennonites and Dunkards were being visited by leaders of their sects; and we could but be impressed by the large number of men of fine physique, inactive much of the time, but who wanted to be working if they had an opportunity to do what their consciences would allow.

The enforced freezing process visited on our men by an unfriendly captian fortunately was not of long duration.

There continues to be a strict guard placed around the C. O.'s quarters. Until last Seventh-day this was composed of Negro soldiers; and we were told that the whole C. O. group was soon to be transferred to the south-west section of the camp in the part allotted to colored troops.

There seems to be partiality in granting passes home. Captian (now Major) Andrews, who has been responsible for the treatment of the C. O.'s with whom I had made agreeable relations, had gone to Baltimore, which we regretted, as I wished to thank him for his spirit of co-operation and bring to his attention some minor difficulties which should be corrected.

It seems rather presumptuous for a layman to advise Exemption Boards; but that has been part of my duty of late in order to secure Form 1008 for our young men—this being done by personal visits to the Boards and by correspondence to points in the Middle West and as far distant as the State of Washington.

The study course started some weeks ago was interrupted by the unrest and compulsory cold air treatment. It is now being taken up again, and we feel it will be of much service to our young men.

Respectfully submitted,

W. M. B. HARVEY, Secretary.

CONFERENCE AT WOOLMAN SCHOOL, SECOND MONTH 22-24, 1918.

Sixth-day, Second Month 22, 3 P. M.—"The Art of Worship." Address by Elbert Russell. "Spiritual Exercises: Are there any of value for Friends?" Discussion opened by Hannah Clothier Hull.

Sixth-day, 8 P. M.—"Foreign Missionary Work as 'alternative service' for young Friends." Discussion by Stanley R. Yarnall, George G. and Janet L. Whitney, Margaret M. Cary, Samuel Bunting and others.

Seventh-day, Second Month 23, 10 A. M.—"Unsuspected Sources of Spiritual Power." Address by Rufus M. Jones. Discussion.

Seventh-day, 3 P. M.—"The Meeting for Worship: (1) as a means of spiritual strength for ourselves; (2) as a means of helping others." Discussion by Anna B. Griscom, Marion Longshore, J. Passmore Elkinton, Nancy Morris, William T. Cope and others.

Seventh-day, 8 P. M.—"The Relation of Foreign Missionary Work to World Peace." Address by Gilbert T. Bowles. Discussion.

First-day, Second Month 24, Forenoon—First-day Schools in the vicinity.

First-day, 3 P. M.—"The Present Challenge of Foreign Missions to Friends." Address by Gilbert T. Bowles. Discussion.

Accommodations for about forty guests can be provided at the School and in the Swarthmore neighborhood at the following rates: lodging 50 cents, breakfast 30 cents, luncheon 30 cents, dinner 40 cents, dinner First-day 50 cents.

Applications for accommodations should be addressed to Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING SECOND MONTH 16, 1918.

Received from 37 Meetings.....	$8,396.21
Received from 14 Individuals.....	188.25
Received for Armenian and Syrian Relief.....	83.50
Received for Butlers.....	21.50
	$8,689.46

CHARLES F. JENKINS, Treasurer.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The following may seem to have more political flavor than articles that usually appear in our paper, but we print it as information just as it came from Washington.—Eds.]

THE COMPULSORY TRAINING BILL.—The American Union Against Militarism. Washington, February —.—Is there any danger of the passage by Congress of the Chamberlain bill for compulsory military training? I have been asked this question repeatedly of late. I don't pretend to know just how much danger there is, but if I lay the situation before your readers, they can judge for themselves. Certainly it is no time for us to flit ourselves to sleep with too much optimism.

There are several factors on our side. First, all of the Congressmen and one-third of the Senators have to be re-elected next November. This makes them extra cautious. They are worried—all of them—and their disposition is not to pass any radical legislation if they can help it. As one Congressman said the other day: "The people are sore. You have made conscripts of their sons and some one else has made non-descripts of their Congressmen, and they don't like it." Whether that judgment is correct or not, doesn't matter. The point is that Congress is inclined to go slow. Secondly, neither the President nor the Secretary of War has shown any desire to push the Chamberlain bill for compulsory military training. In fact, Secretary Baker in his annual report, distinctly opposed the suggestion on the grounds that the conclusion of the war might make universal military training unnecessary. Thirdly, Congressman S. Hubert Dent, Chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, has polled his committee and has a majority lined up against reporting out the Chamberlain bill during the Sixty-sixth Congress.

All that looks hopeful. One might almost be justified in asserting flatly that the bill is dead so far as this Congress is concerned.

But what about the next? There's the difficulty. And it is mighty serious.

In the first place, most of the political prophets are agreed that both houses are going to pass into the control of the Republicans at the November election. They are almost evenly balanced in strength—the parties, I mean—to-day; a few votes would put the Democrats out and the Republicans in. If the Republicans capture the lower House, then the pacifist Dent will be ousted as chairman of the military affairs committee.

He will be succeeded by Kahn of California, an ardent advocate of the Chamberlain bill. In the Senate Chamberlain would be ousted as chairman of the military affairs committee, but his place would be taken by Warren, of Wyoming, the father-in-law of General Pershing and an ardent exponent of the Chamberlain bill. Furthermore, the chairman of the Senate committee on foreign relations would go to Lodge, of Massachusetts, "big stick" advocate, the chief exponent of the doctrine of economic imperialism in the Senate. The jingoes will be in the saddle, with a vengeance!

To-day the country is being plastered from one end to the other with posters and other propaganda for compulsory military training. Every hotel has Hudson Maxim's book in it, alongside the Gideons' Bible! Medical associations are being systematically lined up for the Chamberlain bill. Rotary clubs and chambers of commerce are spreading the "good work" everywhere. Wright Patterson, the editor of the Western Newspaper Union, which furnishes "plate matter" and "patent insides," to country weeklies, says in a letter to Congressman Foss, that the country editors are becoming converted to the doctrine of compulsory military training, and he cites as proof the fact that when he polled 8,000 country editors last year and offered them a series of articles in favor of compulsory training, 6,000 of them accepted and ran the articles! When the American Union Against Militarism offered to pay for a similar service to country editors—for a series of articles on the other side of the question—the Western Newspaper Union sent a man to Washington to tell us verbally that they would not handle any material from us. "Your organization is considered pro-German," said the agent. "The editors would kick if we offered them anything from you." Your readers can draw your own conclusions regarding this excuse!

The American Union Against Militarism which has been in a state of suspended activity for the past six months, held a meeting of its executive committee in New York City the other night and voted unanimously to resume activities on a country-wide scale and do it at once. Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of the New York Evening Post, was elected chairman and Charles T. Hallinan, vice chairman. A secretary, to succeed Miss Crystal Eastman, will be chosen immediately and the headquarters at 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City, re-opened. It was unanimously voted the sense of the committee that the organization would drop all the various aspects of militarism and jingoism and concentrate entirely upon the issue of compulsory military training. We want to be able to pledge so many Congressmen against it that we can defeat it in the Sixty-sixth Congress, no matter which party is nominally in control.

CHARLES T. HALLINAN.

NOTICE.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street (Peana. R. R.), Phila., at 6.30, 8.21 A. M. and 2.41 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1010.

E. DEAN STANTON, Business Manager.

MEETINGS from Second Month 24th to Third Month 2nd:—

Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, at Burlington, Third-day,

Second Month 26th, at 10.30 A. M.

Gwynedd Monthly Meeting, at Norristown, First-day, Second Month 24th, at 10.30 A. M.

Chester, Pa., at Media, Second-day, Second Month 25th, at 7.30 P. M. Concord, at Concordville, Third-day, Second Month 26th, at 9.30 A. M. Woodbury, Third-day, Second Month 26th, at 8 P. M.

Abington, at Horsham, Fourth-day, Second Month 27th, at 10.15 A. M. Birmingham, at West Chester, Fourth-day, Second Month 27th, at 10 A. M.

Salem, Fourth-day, Second Month 27th, at 10 A. M.

Goshen, at Malvern, Fifth-day, Second Month 28th, at 10 A. M.

Lansdowne, Fifth-day, Second Month 28th, at 7.45 P. M.

DEB.—At Moorestown, N. J., Second Month 6, 1918, REBECCA S. MATLACK, aged eighty-nine years; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey.

—, at Moorestown, N. J., sixth of Second Month, 1918, AMOS R. BARTLETT, aged seventy-nine years; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey.

FOUNDED 1865.

THE PROVIDENT
LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY
OF PHILADELPHIA

Have you thought of the need of additional Life Insurance to cover Inheritance Taxes?

Write for Information

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.
COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: } LOCUST 243
} RACE 661

WISSAHICKON INN
REDLANDS,
CALIFORNIA.

THE WISSAHICKON INN is situated in an Orange Grove in Redlands the most beautiful place in the San Bernardino Valley.

At the Wissahickon Inn, a family hotel of fifty rooms, you will find a homelike place, good food, and careful attention to your wants.

Steam heat, rooms with private bath and plenty of public baths. One or two cottages on the grounds. Near parks and golf course. Tennis court. Magnificent roads for motoring.

For reservations and prices, address
A. B. JOHNSON.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM
PARK PLACE
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
1714 SANSON STREET

Engraving and Printing
FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY
Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting Cards. Die Stamped Writing Paper
TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 20 years; Medical 13

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The 'Teen Age in the First-day School.'" This is a new volume by W. Edward Rafferty, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of "The Survey," New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire whole grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Solicited

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. — PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only.
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R.R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

THE ESTAUGH
HADDONFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Two vacancies—apply to

ANNA EASTBURN WILLITS, Haddonfield, N. J.

THE HOLMES PRESS
Printers
J. L. Engle, Pres.
1336-40 CHERRY ST. — PHILA.

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS,
1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey,
Substitute for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street PHILADELPHIA, PA.

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE

PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

Assoc. M. Am. Soc. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. : : PHILA.

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

WANTED—HOUSEKEEPER, PREFERABLY MIDDLE aged woman, for bachelor, good home, ample opportunity for study or social work.
Apply Dr. W. H. HAINES, 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, any Fourth-day of the week, 2 to 4 o'clock.

WANTED—BY A PERSON OF REFINEMENT, education, and large experience—a position to care for an aged person or an aged couple and their home, or to care for motherless children and their home.

Address S. S.
Care of "THE FRIEND,"
207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

A 60 inch
three-ply
RHOADS DRIVING BELT

J. E. RHOADS AND SONS

PHILADELPHIA NEW YORK CHICAGO

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESTNUT ST. PHILA.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of
RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

GERMANTOWN
FRIENDS' SCHOOL

will need for the academic year 1918-1919 an assistant secretary, familiar with bookkeeping and general office work, who will have some duties in supervising study rooms; and also an assistant in the Primary Department.

For this last position a teacher of some experience is needed. The duties will include assisting in the third year work; supervising writing; helping on the playground; and if possible conducting simple classes in sloyd and other hand work, and coaching irregular pupils.

Application should be made to

STANLEY R. YARNALL, Principal
Germantown Friends' School
Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton

TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

Investments

Yielding from 5% to over 7½%

OUR current list of investments contains many offerings both sound in character and attractive in yield, offerings to meet every investment requirement.

Send for Circular PF-154

The National City
Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia — 1421 Chestnut St.,
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

A COMPLETE LINE
OF

NURSERY STOCK

FRUIT TREES,
ORNAMENTAL TREES,
SHRUBS,
SMALL FRUITS,
ROSES,
CLEMATIS,
HEDGE PLANTS.

The Rakestraw-Pyle Company
KENNETT SQUARE, PA.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, SECOND MONTH 28, 1918.

No. 35.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVID H. FORSTYHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVID H. FORSTYHE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

DYING MESSAGE OF EARL GREY, AS REPORTED BY HAROLD BEBBIE.

"Like most Englishmen he was spiritually shy, and only now and then allowed me to see what was moving him, and moving him very deeply. These moments were unforgettable. I seemed for a second to see his soul straining to know if I had apprehended the uttermost truth of his spirit which he shrank from uttering. He said to me once: 'You know the idea of those words—he being dead, yet speaketh? A voice from the grave often gets a hearing. That's what I'm after. I want to try and make my voice sound from the grave. I want to say to people that there is a real way out of all this mess materialism has got them into. I've been trying to tell them for thirty years. It's Christ's way. Mazzini saw it. We've got to give up quarreling. We've got to come together. We've got to realize that we're all members of the same family. There's nothing that can help humanity, I'm perfectly sure there isn't, perfectly sure, except love. Love is the way out, and the way up. That's my farewell to the world.'"

SUNDRY REFLECTIONS.

THE PRACTICAL ASPECT OF THE KINGDOM.

It is gratifying to observe among earnest people a widening and deepening conception of the Kingdom of Heaven as a realizable condition in "the kingdoms (or nations) of this world." In other words, the conviction is growing that whilst "the everlasting kingdom" to be fully revealed hereafter contains the final and perfect fruition of the immortal hope, the reality of that kingdom belongs also to the life that now is,—a present power designed to prevail throughout the world, and to "extend its operation" into every field of human energy and into all human relationships. "The Kingdom is an idea as broad as mankind, as inclusive as life itself," says a modern exponent of Christian truth. In consonance with this view, salvation consists in a participation in that kingdom, and is the possession or inheritance of all its citizens. Both the practical reality and the progressive experience of it are indicated in that historic statement, "And the Lord added unto the church daily those that were being saved." Salvation is also represented to us as a state of spiritual soundness or health, as well as of ultimate safety. The expression, "Thy saving health," found in the Authorized Version of the sixty-seventh Psalm, becomes "Thy salvation" in the Revised Version; and the Psalmist's prayer that it might be known "among all nations" coincides, in some degree at least, with that most significant petition, "Thy kingdom come." The spiritual progress in which the thraldom of sin is broken and its burden lifted for the individual soul must bring a condition of vitality and growth and the right functioning of gifts and faculties. With all these the true citizens of the Kingdom will serve its righteous cause and will labor, each according to his calling, to establish its principles in every part of individual and corporate life. Converted into concrete terms of present-day speech, the great fact has been stated thus: "The saving of the lost, the teaching of the young, the pastoral care of the poor and frail, the quickening of starved intellects, . . . political reform, the reorganization of the industrial system, international peace,—it was all covered by the one aim of the Reign of God on earth."

It is remarkable how frequently in the New Testament the Kingdom is spoken of in the present tense; not as being then perfected on earth, and not as coming "from hence," but on the other hand not as something wholly reserved for the world to come. Paul addresses the Ephesian brethren as "fellow-citizens with the saints"; to the Philippians he writes, "For our conversation (or citizenship) is in heaven"; and to the Colossians, "giving thanks unto the Father, . . . who translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love." Isaac Penington puts the matter thus: "'The kingdom of heaven is at hand,' saith the forerunner; 'It is come,' saith the Messiah; and in it there is righteousness and peace and joy."

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.

This was the preaching of Jesus, "the gospel of the kingdom of God." To those who were waiting and seeking, it came as glad tidings indeed; and it is but a difference of terms when Paul defines the gospel as the power of God unto salvation, as he had found it to be for himself. Again he speaks of having gone about "preaching the kingdom," and signifies that his ministry was "to testify the gospel of the grace of God." Here then we are shown somewhat of the nature of the Gospel—that it is a source of truth, and not simply a declaration of truth. The gospel dispensation is one of life and spirit and grace, some vision of which must have preceded Isaiah's apostrophe: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!"

It is sometimes remarked that the gospel spreads "by contact," and most certainly the ministry of human instruments has been a large agency in the extension of the Kingdom; but the gospel does not always wait upon such agency. Evidently it was "preached" to Abraham in some other way, and to countless people the world over; for the intent of the ministry is at most to turn the minds of men to the gospel itself, and so to be helpers in their salvation and in the furtherance of the Kingdom of Heaven in and amongst the kingdoms of this world.

M. W.

FROM A LETTER OF DEBORAH RHOADS TO A NEPHEW AND NIECE, 1891.

"There is on earth no blessing like affection"; it may well be called the greatest thing in the world. I want to cultivate it toward all classes, and not confine it to those who are fondly endeared to me by natural ties. My doctrine is that we should first see to our own flesh and blood, attend to their outward needs, if we ought to; then let the spiritual interests of the whole family circle be dear to us; that we should seek occasions of prayer on behalf of these; and the Spirit would I doubt not help our infirmities with pleadings which could not be uttered. I have often thought of the time when the church was gathered together in Mary's house, and prayer was made on behalf of Peter, then in prison; and how those prayers were answered. If we were thus engaged under the influence of Christ, might we not see wonders done?

Well, when our duty is done for our families surely we ought to turn our thoughts to our fellow-men, and wherever our duty lies press on to do it. "The love of Christ constraineth us." My dearest, let me assure you that it becomes a delight to do the Lord's work as we are faithful in it. I admit the effort required, but He never over-drives His flock, but makes them to "lie down at noon" and rest when it is necessary.

I think we often get into a great haste and flurry to be doing for the good cause, perhaps more in the way of reform. But if we take care to be prepared as servants of our Lord, and are watching, we shall find all to move on with smoothness and order.

MINUTE OF EXERCISES OF BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING.

[Our Friend, Allen C. Thomas has kindly furnished us with a copy of the minutes of the Two hundred and forty-sixth annual session of Baltimore Yearly Meeting. The following is the minute of exercise adopted by that meeting.—Eds.]

The reports this year are interesting and practical. It is not possible to report the atmosphere or spirit of a meeting, but the spirit of hope runs through all the reports.

The work done by the meetings and that by individuals has been in various fields—some within the Society and some without it. In one or two particular meetings practically all the work has been outside the denomination. In small meetings this seems almost inevitable in many kinds of service, but we believe that there is a danger in satisfying ourselves in general service and so neglecting our special work. We should recognize that our own denomination has a definite and important place in the Church universal, and this place can only be filled by building up our own Church. While all denominations have their place, there are persons around us whose fellowship is really with us, and who would fit in with us better than elsewhere. In the past we have, perhaps, rather prided ourselves in not asking other persons to join us. We need to realize that God has called us to a definite testimony, and that we shall be doing the Church of the future an injury if we fail in the duty and privilege of carrying this testimony to others, especially at the present time, when the world needs so greatly the power of the living Christ.

If we would be effective in outside work we must be effective in our own Church work. This should be carried on in simplicity, in faith and in that power which comes from the Lord Jesus Christ.

There are great possibilities in small meetings and it is just as true as ever that where two or three are gathered together in His name that He will be with them. May we all bear our particular meeting on our hearts in prayer that God will help each one of us to do our individual part and not wait for some one else to come.

When new members are added we should be as fathers and mothers to them in love, in sympathy and in leading them into a fuller knowledge of the truth. If our Church work is thus carried on our meetings will not only be built up, but our hearts will go out to other persons and meetings in fuller measure, and there will be a desire to take a more active part in the work of evangelization and of upbuilding the Church.

We deplore the great evil of the race-tracks in the State of Maryland, with the gambling and their other attendant insidious evils. We earnestly urge upon all our members in the State of Maryland to use active efforts to do their part in striving to exterminate this evil in the State of Maryland. The approaching session of the Maryland Legislature makes the need of earnest effort at this time imperative.

OUR TASK.—At no time in the life of those of us living has there ever been a more imperative call to stand fast and uphold our principles of love and good-will.

Men may plan for peace and we would not decry an effort in that direction, but there can never be permanent peace except through justice laid deep in the will of God—as shown in the Golden Rule.

Now is the time to show that we are sincere when we profess to bear testimony against war. It is not disloyalty to our country. We would not harm our native land by debauching our own conscience and stultifying our convictions. The farther note of warning is already sounded and we learn that an effort will be made to foist universal military training upon the nation. This is to be a slogan for some coming campaign. Friends should be awake to this menace and not let it catch them as in a trap. We have been too easily lulled asleep in days past by the seeming pacific attitude of the world. Having been widely awakened to the actual condition we should be prepared for this fresh onset and be ready to meet the specious arguments of those who would thrust upon us the methods and manners of Prussia.—MARY M. HOBBS, in N. C. Friends' Messenger.

MANIFESTO FROM PROTESTANT MINISTERS OF SEVEN CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS IN AUSTRALIA.

"CONSCRIPTION AND CHRISTIANITY."

TO THE ELECTORS OF AUSTRALIA.

Fellow Citizens—

With almost complete unanimity the several branches of the Protestant Church have given their strong support to the principle of Conscription.

As these bodies are religious and not political they must base their attitude upon the Christian religion.

We, therefore, the undersigned ministers of religion, desire to express our complete dissent from the view commonly taken by our fellow-ministers. We, too, claim to base our attitude upon those fundamental principles of Christianity which are the common possession of all churches. We declare and we can conceive no more amazing or incongruous spectacle than that of ministers of the Prince of Peace advocating, often with intemperate zeal, the subordination of the rights of individual conscience to alleged military necessity.

In taking such a course Christian ministers seem to be abandoning the Christian tradition, and to be proclaiming to the world the failure of the laws of Christ.

We are far from accusing our brethren of hypocrisy or conscious desertion of Christian principle. We believe that they are acting from what they conceive to be the highest motives. We hold, nevertheless, that they are grievously misrepresenting their Master, and irreparably damaging the moral prestige of the Christian Church.

The present indefensible position of many Churches and ministers is, we believe, the result of a gradual process of which they themselves are hardly conscious, by which a new religion is being built on the ruins of that Christianity that the war is trampling under foot.

The new religion which is invading the Christian Churches is the religion of the State.

In this new religion patriotism is the virtue which takes the place of Christian Brotherhood; the State replaces God, and the National Flag replaces the Cross. Its supreme law is not the law of God, but the military safety of the country.

We earnestly commend to the attention of our fellow-Christians the words recently spoken in the British Parliament by Lord Hugh Cecil:

"There are a great many people who care about religion, but care much more profoundly about their country. These people have embarked upon the path down which Germany has gone. To say that the safety of the Republic is the supreme law is profoundly untrue. Not the safety of the Republic but the Divine law is the supreme law. For the honor and credit of this House, for the sake of the country of which we are citizens, because I would rather die than abandon the faith I hold so dear, I earnestly hope we shall adhere now and forever to the old doctrine, that as much as we love our country, we love something better, and when appeal is made our answer will be clear, firm and without hesitation."

These words state forcibly, yet charitably, a truth of vital importance to us all. We believe that when our fellow ministers preach Conscriptio in the name of religion, they are speaking not in the name of the Christian religion, but of that other religion which we have described as the religion of the State, and that if we take care not to confuse these two things but seek an answer to the question in the light simply of Christian principles, we shall recognize the incompatibility of Christianity and Conscriptio.

In all charity and good-will we urge upon our fellow Christians the earnest consideration of our view.

[Signed]—FREDERICK SINCLAIRE, Free Religious Fellowship, Melbourne; CHARLES STRONG, Australian Church, Melbourne; H. HOPE HUME, Congregational, Melbourne; F. CLEMENS, Baptist Church, Murrumbidgee, Victoria; ARTHUR J. PROWSE, Presbyterian, Tasmania; W. H. BEALE, Methodist, N. S. W.; N. KINDEN WEBB, Methodist, N. S. W.; WILLIAM COOPER, Society of Friends; A. RIVETT, Congregational, N. S. W.

HOLLAND'S PROTEST.

All the Protestant Churches of Holland have united in an earnest protest to Governments and nations against the continuance of the war, expressing the hope that while utterances of separate Churches have failed to gain the ear of the peoples, an accordant expression of "the voice of the Christian conscience may find willing and listening ears." They hope, too, that the Churches of other neutral countries and among the belligerents will join in the protest. They say:—

"We must begin by confessing with deep humility that we ourselves are guilty, and must admit that the sins of the nations are ours also. For although there have not been wanting among us serious attempts to preach justice and charity, we confess that we have not been sufficiently faithful in the clear and unqualified denunciation of the wrong. Too often we ourselves have been too deeply interested in seeking the advancement of material or at least not of spiritual interests, and this not only in the mutual relations of the Churches among themselves but also within our own individual Churches, when means and weapons have been used which were not seemly in the sight of Almighty God. . . . Confessing all this with deep humility, we pray Almighty God for His grace, and to forgive us our sins. But we would fear to be still more unfaithful to our trust if we failed and neglected to protest jointly against the frightful events of this our time.

"We therefore feel that it is our duty to insist, in the name of the Lord God, that the brutal force which now threatens to devastate Europe be put a stop to at once. We would not lay too great a stress upon the enormous loss, caused by the impoverishment of the various nations, but rather upon the loss of millions of valuable human lives. Still more serious is the total destruction of the foundations for the structure upon which formerly was based the sense of morality of the various nations. . . . But a still greater danger threatens us in the loss of the spiritual assets everywhere. The law of the High and Almighty, which not only requires the acknowledgment of the respect of the various nations in their mutual relations among themselves, is trodden under foot. The holy name of Christ, who forbids that hate and enmity instead of kindness and love be the rule among nations, is brought to shame. Facts are no longer correctly stated in the public press; not truth but twisted facts and sham, control the thoughts and conclusions of the people. Each nation seeks to glorify itself and to vilify the other. Both sides call upon God's holy name to pour His wrath upon the other, as if each were without sin, and the slogan, 'No peace without victory' is thoughtlessly adopted; a thought completely at variance with the spirit of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Thus the voice of conscience is crushed. A continuation of the war threatens to injure in a constantly increased ratio the Christian spirit—the spiritual assets which it is the bounden duty of the Churches to protect.

"The Churches can no longer remain silent on these points. . . . they consider it the duty of the nations to strive by all means towards a peace by mutual concessions. . . . These are the considerations which have induced the Churches to implore the Governments and the nations to pause, and to come at last to a realization of the high mission imposed by God upon all Christian nations."

A MESSAGE FROM GERMANY.

The declaration which follows, in translation, was made public by five prominent clergymen of Berlin during the Luther quadrocentenary and printed in Swiss journals:

"In this commemorative month of the reformation, we, the undersigned, pastors of Berlin churches, acting in conjunction with many Protestant men and women, feel ourselves called upon to make the following declaration, which is also intended to be an answer to manifold demonstrations of a similar character which have reached us from neutral countries:

"We German Protestants, conscious of the Christian heritage and Christian aims which we hold in common with them, extend to all fellow believers, to those in enemy countries also, our heartfelt and brotherly greeting.

"We recognize the deepest causes of the present war to lie in the anti-Christian powers which control the lives of the people of the earth, their mutual suspicion, their worship of force and their covetousness, and we behold in a peace by mutual agreement and reconciliation a peace that is worth striving for.

"We find the obstacles to an honest and closer approach of the nations to be mainly the unholy sway of lies and phrases by which the truth is distorted and silenced and false opinions gain currency, and we call on all, in all lands, who desire peace to resolutely combat this evil.

"We feel it a duty, in view of the present frightful war, in the name of our common Christianity, to strive henceforth with determination that war as a means of settling differences between peoples shall disappear from the earth.

"DR. K. ANER, W. MITHACK-STAIN,
O. PLESS, DR. F. RITTMELER,
R. WIELANDT."

It matters little where I was born,
Whether my parents were rich or poor,
Whether they shrank from the cold world's scorn
Or walked in the pride of wealth secure;
But whether I live an honest man,
And hold my integrity firm in my clutch,
I tell you, brother, plain as I am,
It matters much.

THERE is nothing more unreasonable than to estimate our worth by the opinions of others; to-day they laud us to the skies, to-morrow they will cover us with ignominy.

NOTES ON FIVE YEARS' MEETING, 1917 AND AMERICAN QUAKERISM.

GEORGE AND JANET WHITNEY.

We went to the Five Years' Meeting with a perverse feeling that we wished it was dear old London Yearly Meeting that we were going to. And as we looked out of the windows of the train at the glorious Autumn country, we made disparaging comparison of the tasselled fields of Indian corn with the English fields of wheat and oats and barley. But these things must be forgiven to the insular British mind (however legally American!) to which everything English has taken on a wonderful glamor across the wide Atlantic, and which has listened to nothing but praise of England for weeks and weeks!

Finding that Baltimore lay between New York and Richmond, Indiana, we spent the previous week-end there and so came on to Richmond by the Second-day night train with the Baltimore delegation of Friends. It was just like a jolly family party, and they took us right into the family in the incomparable American way.

We found Richmond, Indiana, a city of trees. Every road appeared an avenue of golden maples. The large Meeting-house, capable of holding two thousand people, was surrounded, like most of the houses, with a stretch of unfenced grass and the same golden trees.

We had pleasant lodgings close to the Meeting-house, under the chaperonage of that "friend of all the world," Carolina Wood.

The elevated seat given to the London delegation, on the platform, immediately behind the Clerk's desk, though alarming to the individual, was grateful as a tribute of honor to London Yearly Meeting. And there was no better place in the room for gathering impressions of the mass and detail of the Five Years' Meeting. The interest and magnetism of this great body seized upon us very early, and we had a curious double sense of being among friends, and yet being inexorably strangers, a little outside the currents that moved here, observers of this great gathering, with all its powers for present and future, good and ill.

Here, as wherever we have hitherto been in this friendly country, we were taken right into the fellowship and made to feel happy and at home in a warm, kind atmosphere. And yet little darts of strangeness constantly struck us with surprise at the big gap there is hitherto between the English and the American orthodox Friend. On the morning of the second day, there was a difference of opinion in the meeting. "Those in favor say 'Ay'" said the Clerk. "'Ay'" boomed from the delegates. "Those against say 'No,'" said the Clerk. "No" boomed from the delegates. "The 'ayes' have it," said the Clerk, with what we thought astonishing conviction! "It is so ordered!"

After the deliberate and free discussions of London Yearly Meeting, the delicate "sense of the meeting" felt and recorded by the Clerk there, this voting by acclamation made us feel foreigners indeed!

But we concluded that the great thing to remember about the Five Years' Meeting is that it is not, in a sense, parallel to our London Yearly Meeting, although it has much of the representative and correlative character of that gathering, and bids fair to have also its executive power. It is, above all, a conference, at which only accredited delegates have the right to vote, or the "freedom of the floor." It is rigidly organized for the rapid disposal of a large quantity of business. And a thought crept into our minds that perhaps the pastoral system which so much prevails in the Western States had laid a cramping hand on the freedom of Quakerism, and clipped the wings of faith in democracy so that large congregations no longer dared to trust the apparently unsafe elasticity of the Quaker method. Perhaps they have gained in celerity, but the loss seems great.

The Five Years' Meeting, however, is by no means static in its development, but a great and powerful living organism, and, as Sarah Baker said in her last address to the F. C. F. U., "life means growth." Recommendations were minuted that next time addresses should be strictly limited in length, and full discussion allowed on every subject.

Our ideas about the pastoral system, coming to it quite fresh in both its Eastern and Western forms, are that there is, after all, a good deal in a name. If the present "pastor" were called an Extension Secretary or a Home Mission Secretary, he would be inclined to do all that now makes him valuable to Quakerism in America, and be saved from much that makes him dangerous. If the Society of Friends loses its free worship, has it very much that is distinctive to offer to the world? It seems to us the pastor's misfortune rather than his fault that by the connotation which his name has derived from other churches, he expects, and is expected by his "congregation" or "flock" to take the responsibility of the ministry in Meetings for Worship, as well as to fulfil the duties of organizer and inspirer and leader of scattered social and religious efforts over a wide area—in which latter capacity he is so necessary and helpful.

A young Friend pastor, arriving late at a group meeting of Young Friends, who were having a very fine little Fellowship meeting together, excused himself for being late in remarking that he did not altogether regret it as it was well for what he might call "the laity" to be left to themselves occasionally, and try to get on without a leader!

In England, under the Free Ministry, we are brought up to believe that the Society of Friends has no laity. The very term "pastor" at once creates the idea of a corresponding "laity," both in the mind of the pastor and of the rank and file.

All the pastors we have met have been delightful people, are doing much fine work, but wouldn't they do even finer if they were paid organizers and not paid preachers—if their ministry in Meeting came freely and spontaneously, and their spirits were obedient, and if they could encourage and foster the ministry of others?

This is the way it looks to us, coming fresh from English Quakerism, and having attended over here both real Friends' Meetings, and also services conducted in "Friends' Churches," which differed in no outward respect from Congregational or Wesleyan Services which we have attended in England.

To return to the Five Years' Meeting. Before the end of the gathering we felt that the differences between, say, this gathering and the London Yearly Meeting, were superficial compared with the deep unity of aim and spirit underneath. In the sessions on Foreign Missions and on the problems and needs of Home Mission work we felt very familiar ground, but above all in the whole-hearted re-affirmation of the Society's testimony concerning war it became manifest that English and American Friends were standing shoulder to shoulder, and were one in heart.

They may not altogether be one in action. The problem is presented here in perhaps a more subtle, certainly a more complex form. Although conscription is in force, the selective nature of the draft leaves much scope for volunteer work in useful forms of national service, of which the most obvious are ambulance and reconstruction work abroad and work on the land at home. Most Friends of military age can see no reason why they should not do these things, and a thousand reasons why they should. The problem of substitution has not arisen and may never arise in this country of vast resources of man-power. The position of the would-be Absolutist is further complicated by the existence of a real Pro-German faction, who say and do many of the things an honest absolutist would say and do, from vastly different motives. The result may be the almost universal adoption of what in England we have learned to call "alternative service" on the part even of men who, if they were in England, or if things here presented themselves in the same light as they do in England, would unhesitatingly join the ranks of the Absolutists. I should like to write on this again, later on.

No notes of the Five Years' meeting, however scrappy, would be complete without mention of Elbert Russell's address on "Present Day Tasks," and Rufus Jones on "The Spiritual Interpretation of Life." The master-note of the former seemed to me to be struck in the words: "We must maintain our right to serve God as He directs us at all costs. . . . We must contribute to educational and ordinary philanthropic needs, and must not cease to work to prepare the world for peace. . . . We must continually prepare public thought for world-organization and for disarmament. . . . for the time when citizenship in the nation no longer conflicts with citizenship in the Kingdom of Heaven."

And with Rufus Jones's definition of religion the soul of the gathering was reached, and its spirit and purpose crystallized into an ideal infinitely great.

"Religion is the spiritual mobilization of the whole life of the whole man for the redemption of the whole world."—From Friends' Fellowship Papers.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

A TALE OF CATS. (A True Story.)—Hunting is the most fascinating of sports, at least the quartette found it so. Nimrod, the oldest, hunted everything from beetles to his own sisters. One of his favorite pranks was to lie in ambush and whoop out at them when they fancied themselves most secure from attack. Outwardly, of course, the girls resented these uproarious raids, but inwardly they rejoiced at the cold thrills of anticipated terror which enlivened the most trivial errands to cellar or woodshed. The two sisters, Teenie, so called because she had reached that precious thirteenth birthday, which brings with it the respect of one's contemporaries, and Bunnie, the quiet one, hunted the eggs. Every evening they went the rounds of chicken-houses, carriage-house, sheep-house and barn; never wearying of the task, because no two evenings brought them the same number of eggs in the same places. Ripper, the city cousin, nicknamed for her impetuous activity on her frequent visits to the farm, joined both hunting parties. Nimrod admitted her, not too grudgingly, to some of his minor adventures and Teenie and Bunnie welcomed her as a firm ally who aided and abetted them whenever they wished to punish Nimrod for some particularly daring escapade.

There was one place where the four hunters came together on equal terms. That was in the big barn. They would play hide and seek among the feed bins and in the hay mows for hours at a stretch. In the autumn each child stealthily concealed a little hoard of apples somewhere in the building, and at odd moments for weeks afterward they would slip away singly or in groups of two to hunt for the other hoards, the rule being that whoever found a hoard might appropriate the apples.

One terror haunted these solitary expeditions. No one mentioned it, until one day when Ripper's investigating hand reached into a dark corner and came in contact with fur which gave place to vicious claws. She flew into the house trembling with fear and some anger.

"There's an awful thing in the barn," she cried. "It lives in a hole and it has claws and I won't go in there by myself again!"

"It must have been a barn cat," chorused Teenie and Bunnie. "They're dreadfully fierce. They don't ever come to the house for meals like Bizzy does, and they hunt rats and they won't let you catch them or play with them," explained Bunnie.

"Afraid of a cat! Oh, my! Oh, my goodness!" jeered Nimrod from the doorway.

"I guess we're not the only ones afraid of those cats," remarked Teenie, pointedly.

"Huh! I'm not afraid. I hunt 'em. I'm going out to hunt some now, I guess. But you're scared to come along, so you can't hunt 'em!" And he turned away.

"Nimrod Stevens we are not scared! We're comin', too," shrieked the trio, tumbling after him.

Very stealthily they climbed the rickety stairs to the barn floor. At the top they almost stopped breathing to listen.

Above them on the roof the pigeons stepped back and forth and cooed. A swallow darted from the shadows and circled above the mows. The children crept forward a little. Then from a corner under an old piece of machinery came a faint "Meow!" followed by another and another.

"It's kittens," breathed Bunnie, joyfully. "Get them out, Nimrod."

The boy willingly obeyed. Kittens do not present the same terrors that battle-scarred old cats hold forth. He wriggled into a maze of wheels and the girls heard tiny growls and hissings as he put out his hand to take the kittens, then he emerged with two of the little creatures, one grey and one black as a coal with fiery green eyes.

"Say! They can fight!" panted Nimrod.

"Let's take them into the house and tame them," suggested Teenie. "Then they won't grow up fierce like these other old things."

She lifted a spitting, squirming kitten from Nimrod's arms as she spoke. "Come on!" she commanded. The kittens protested loudly against this form of transportation. Their cries grew more shrill and insistent as the children began to hurry. Suddenly there was a great scurrying across the floor. Bunnie and Ripper screamed. Teenie turned in time to see a great wild-eyed barn cat racing after Nimrod.

"Drop your kitten!" she shrieked, dropping her own. Nimrod obeyed without turning around. His hasty exit suggested a previous acquaintance with barn cats.

Outside the door, the children stopped, panting a little.

"Suppose that old cat had bitten you," gasped Bunnie, her eyes wide with fright.

"Aw, that's nothin'," answered Nimrod, carefully concealing some suspicious-looking holes in the back of his stocking. "I'm goin' fishin'! You girls can come along and catch grass-hoppers for me, if you like." Then as they started down the lane, he officially closed the incident in the barn; and sealed, as it were, a proclamation of emancipation for the barn cats, for all time. "If I were you I wouldn't hunt those barn cats much. They get awful fierce sometimes," said Nimrod, the mighty hunter.—ALICE TRIMBLE.

LETTER FROM FRANCE.

FIRST MONTH 20, 1918.

I have had four letters and the Ledger this week, so my mail has been very abundant and entertaining. The weather has been much milder and all signs of frost have gone. I am sitting in my room now without a fire with the window wide open. This has enabled us to get to work again in a more serious way and we have started on a roof and on some interior brick-laying, etc., which the severe cold prevented. We spent three day's getting in a supply of wood from the chopped-down trees and now the orchard is beginning to be cleared up although we have left the small branches piled up, but I imagine the French will soon make fagots of them when they get a chance. If our staying here is agreeable to the authorities we shall soon, I expect, be getting some new men up and tackling the work more earnestly. I finally finished up the cupboard I was working on, very much to Mme. Varley's satisfaction, and on her repeated invitation I went over to drink some coffee with her and had a very pleasant conversation. The gay way in which everyone refers to any difficulty or privation they ask you to share with them "C'est la fait rien, c'est la guerre!" is very misleading. They don't consider the war gaily or joyously, it is a very serious and terrible state of affairs and cannot end too quickly and every one will say so, although no one has any formula or means of putting an end to it. Mme. Varley loaded my pockets up with apples that came from Normandy, and very good they were, too, in spite of the fact (I think) that she said they were sent to her last Summer, and then when I was leaving she tried to force a five-franc note on me and I had a terrible time persuading her that I couldn't take it. I had to put it on the back of her hands and let it fall to the floor. My French is inadequate for such a situation, but we parted very good friends just the same.

I have at last sent the order for Mme. Debailly's furniture—two beds, a table, four chairs, a buffet and the kitchen and dining-room utensils to the Bon Marché and we shall hope to get them up here sometime soon. She and her children are very happy over the prospect although she says very little; I shall get her to write when she gets the things, although I suspect that she doesn't know how, but either the school mistress or Mme. Debailly's daughter, Henriette, will do it. I wish I could spend the rest of the money as wisely but it is very hard to tell anything about the condition of the people here—many of them have money, but all are reduced to the same level and the houses of the rich are no better than those of the poor, and the furnishing is almost the same. No one makes any complaints except in a general way, and as our relief workers never come here, I feel it almost impossible to know what to do. I shall, however, keep my eyes open and when I see a chance I shall spend the money promptly.

Time seems to be slipping away very fast and it will soon be Spring and time to consider whether I shall come home for the summer or not. I can't make up my mind very much ahead, it depends too much on conditions of various kinds.

I had hopes that the Germans might prove their good faith to the world by the way they received the Russian terms, but they seem to have been as "pig-headed" as ever and as impervious to outside ideas. Some kind of a new light is needed in their brains, and I for one cannot see any way of putting it in. I wish I could or that anyone else could perform the operation. J. H. H.

LETTER FROM PARVIN RUSSELL.

GREENY, SOMME, Twelfth Month 21, 1917.

Isn't it strange how circumstances change the relative importance of various things! For instance, I had to spend a rather laborious little period mending one of my treasured knitted socks, which in some way was scratched a bit last evening, before I could allow myself to start writing. Ordinarily the fate of a sock is a rather small matter, but not here; and I am glad to find my wonderful little sewing bag (that they made over from my leather collar-bag) meeting the emergency in proper fashion, with a card of khaki-colored darning cotton. That bag has certainly done real service already, and it will have a long life yet, to be the small edition of thy good sewing-room.

Thy little bundle of gloves and of chocolate was a most surprising contribution of luxury and usefulness, and I fairly pounced on those cotton working-gloves, as well as imagined the use the others will get, too. We can get a cheap brand of chocolate near here, but it can't touch the original, and I admire the generous size, too, as they will appreciate. To-day, the camion brought me also a nice little package of nuts and candy from a very pleasant school-teacher in Brooklyn, who knitted my extra sweater and gloves. Needless to add, she is about fifty and very severe, but she has more or less adopted me inasmuch as I am one of the two boys here from the Brooklyn meeting. She very kindly wrote me a good long letter with all the news of every one I knew over that way, including a copy of a little weekly paper, Current Events, and a magazine. She really has been exceptionally nice, and I shall now have to add another to the list of letters that ought to be written soon. They now number eleven, but what can I do about it? Especially when, as was the case these last three days, Mac and I have to rise up by the unwelcome call of an alarm clock at five-forty, when the night is still dark and the water and everything is frozen, and chase down to the other house to get breakfast for the whole tribe. I have also had a day and a-half of wood-sawing out in the "back lot," with a tall fellow, who used to be a gymnasium teacher, and there should see the sawdust fly! Yesterday we took two cuts off of a cherry stump left by the Germans, which was about fifteen inches in diameter, and a number of other stumps have also bowed to our efforts, but I would be bow so far over to cut them that I thought I could scarcely come straight again!

Perhaps they may have noticed in my last letter to — speaking of a snow-storm just beginning? Well, it kept up all one night and here we got up to find about eight or ten inches of snow on the level, with the roads badly drifted as high as four or five feet right here in the village! That meant considerable difficulty for everyone to get around, so the mayor wrote a request in very formal language, asking our head man or "chef" to build the village a snow-plow. Four of us were set at it immediately, scouting around for material, since we had nothing heavy enough. As usual, we resorted for timber to the enormous German dugouts nearby; also found some excellent angle-iron to serve as runners to protect the wood; two of the boys searched about the ruins of an old Boche machine shop and found several great iron straps to fasten at the front of the plow with a ring to pull the whole thing by, and so we accumulated enough to make a pretty decent implement. The interesting thing about it was that it was made entirely of old German material, except nails, screws and one solid block up at the front. This, by the way, I had to saw by hand from a great old beam in a ruined barn—the beam being solid oak, and over ten inches square! Does thee wonder that we have appetites? It seems that the mayor expected only a rather ramshackle affair, knocked together for the emergency, but when we finally showed it to him, he was pleased all over his face and kept remarking how fine and solid it was. Of course we had to be on hand when it was tried out, so he brought up his three horses, hitched them up single-file, and with four of us sitting on it for ballast, the trial trip took place, right down the main street, with his honor, the Mayor, walking along in the nice broad clean "wake" behind us. It was something of a joy ride for us, and we drove, or rather rode, and guided the plow through the several streets that make up this illustrious village, until civilized people might once more venture forth. It was the second day after the storm before communication was open between here and the big pike, a quarter of a mile outside the village, and our good plow was quite instrumental in doing all but the deeper drifts. Moreover, the plow will last long after we are gone, and may help to remind these good people of the group of strangers who spent the winter amongst them.

Exceptional as this cold spell and snow have been, there is nothing I've seen in France for wonderful delicacy and beauty like the whole landscape the second day after the storm; for a heavy fall the previous evening had crystallized on every tiniest twig, and great trees were decked in a foliage that surpassed all the brilliant, glistening ice storms that we have admired at home. The heavy frost was laid right over the snow, and since there had been almost no wind, the effect was a fantastic sparkling white drapery over everything, that reminded one of the way Nature might decorate for Christmas. Ordinary chicken wire was so heavily laid that in some places the long white crystal groups almost met at the centre. Even the most fragile spider webs in the corners of fences and under the eaves, and about the little framework covering the well, were nearly as large around as a lead pencil with this pure white tinsel of the fairies. The delight of it is that it didn't disappear with the first sunshine, but remained and was more beautifully touched by an additional frost the next night. All Gruný is like a dreamland outdoors, and if this bitter cold didn't mean such suffering for many a family, I should certainly like to see the snow and all these dainty festoonings remain for Christmas. It is a sight, however, that I hope to remember as long as I live, and it has been a treat to be out among the trees working with saw and axes, but seeing with our eyes and drinking in the glory of it. Thee might suppose that standing out in the snow all day would be hard to bear, but the other chap and I both wear puttees of burlap wrapped from ankles to knees and in addition for this work we had each foot done up in a big burlap cement bag, tied with heavy cord. It is awkward and makes the natives smile, but it has kept our feet dry and warm and we are both thanking the day we first saw Italian laborers tied up that way in winter to keep warm, for without that idea we should have been miserable and probably sick.

LETTER FROM WALDO HAYES.

HOME ADDRESS, WEST CHESTER, PA.

The setting of the scene is at Ham this last week. The quippe has rented half of a large hotel of three stories. Most of the English Friends room on the second floor, and we in the third. The third floor, or attic, is divided in two by a thin tar paper partition. French soldiers sleep on the other side. Our half is again divided by a thin partition, four sleeping on one side and three, including me, sleeping on the side next to the French soldiers. Indeed, a partition, quarter-inch thick separates me in my cot from a snoring French poilu. Two little windows, about a foot square, through the roof above, let in the moonlight which floods the sides of two huge brick chimneys passing through the attic on either side.

I wake up as there is much commotion on the trench side. My head is under the covers, or indeed, in the sleeping-bag. Without putting my head out, I bring my left arm over and look at my wrist watch. It is six. I cautiously nose my way from the covers to the open and find it as dark outside as in. Much relieved at the thought that there is no earthily use in getting up yet, I hurry back under shelter, first knocking off the icicle formed in the last few minutes on my mustache. The commotion increases next door and loud cries of "Allégé!" and other loud conversation ensues. The French can never talk quietly. They always sound as though in a heated argument. Soon each one of the soldiers goes bumpity-bump down stairs, making a loud noise as their mailed heels clatter down the wooden flights. Peace reigns again. It is six-thirty. I plan out the day's work and my thoughts often go homeward at this hour. Quietly I drop off into a state of semi-consciousness when a great racket begins down stairs. In the hallway on the ground floor there is hung a brass seventy-five millimeter shell and a little bell. The morning orderly is beating it viciously. First call for breakfast. Hour six-fifty. My nose again pushes its way heavenward. I stick one eye over the blanket. It is as dark as it was before. I lose all thought of getting up. Some one yells up the stairs, "Hey, some of you up there, come down and help break the ice in the wash-house." Terribly discouraging words, these! No answer to the calls. Another vicious beating of the shell ensues. The English boys are up and going down—no word heard from America. I decide to get up and am half dressed before I am fully awake. Jenkins' muffled voice under the bed covers is heard, "What time is it, Hayes?" "Seven-ten," I yell. "Is it cold?" he whispers. "Yes, the coldest yet." (Really it was warmer.) "I believe it is colder," comes from the depths. As I go down to wash I see Speer making a fire in one corner in a little stove. America is waking up. The wash-house floor is solid ice. The water splashed by bathers last night is the cause. With a hatchet I knock in an inch of ice, frozen over night in the water barrel. Really a week's growth of whiskers is great protection against such cruel water. I am the first American at the breakfast table; England is well represented. Hot oatmeal and cocoa are simply great. Next there is lunch to put up and American mail comes at eight. I go out to help Ernest Brown crank the water truck. The oil in the crank case is so frozen that one can stand on the crank and not budge it. We get the Garner going and hitch the White to it. So the White gets warmed up. All the builders pile in. Jenkins, Griest and I, who work at Foreste, put in our bicycles. Out we start up the St. Quentin Road, across the Somme, which is not larger than half the Brandywine. The trees are covered with wonderful ice crystals. The heavy water-laden atmosphere here freezes every night like heavy frost on everything. The flat, snow-laden fields stretch on either side. (I must not describe further.) On the right we see two long rows of rooks feeding on the snow like two regiments. In each row there are perhaps a thousand. We soon pass a large white stone which says Somme on one side and Aisne on the other. We are now in the Aisne district. Soon we turn and arrive at Villers St. Christophe, where all dismount. Some have erected and are erecting houses here. We three jump on our wheels and soon arrive at Foreste, after passing regiments of men cleaning roads. We have temporarily put our things in some old barracks here. We have rigged up a field stove here temporarily during the cold weather. We take our lunch to the Marie where the Mayor's wife warms it for us. We then pick up tools and set to work on our house. The sections have become quite warped by exposure since they left Dole. Besides the ice and snow have also to be removed from them. Noon arrives: hot cocoa, hot potatoes, American canned tongue, jam, bread and butter and cheese await us! And what an appetite! We tackle work again till sunset and then put tools away after carefully oiling them. Jumping on bicycles we ride back with a glorious rising moon and a glorious sinking sun. The tall towers with the little barred windows look just like the pictures in King Arthur books. (And the soldiers are often heard singing inside by the yule log.) These pinnacles stand out clearly in the moonlight and are wonderful to see. They remind me of Whittier.

"As yonder tower out-stretches to the earth,

The dark triangle of the shade alone when the clear day is shining on its top,

So, darkness in the pathway of man's life is but the shadow of God's providence.

By the great sun of Wisdom east therein,
And what is dark below is light in Heaven."

And soon we gather around the table once again for appetite is such a solid habit. After this our chef reads from the Scriptures every evening, for surely here is the guiding force.

Thus another day is over. The work here in France in general is growing daily and becoming more encouraging. The Red Cross consider us one of their best departments. There is always plenty do and we hope that all at home are behind us—we know they are.

I slept last night in a little German dug-out, and am now writing in it.

ELI JONES AS MAJOR-GENERAL.

NOTE.—While reading a book entitled "Southern Heroes", I found this piece, which is amusing as well as very interesting, owing to the fact that it has a bearing on the present time. I will copy it and leave it to your judgment whether it should be published.

A. J. HEALD.

WHAT CHEER, IOWA.

Owing to his popularity and activity in temperance work, Eli Jones was elected by a large majority to the State Legislature of Maine, in 1854.

The election was very unexpected to him, as he had not sought the place; but having been chosen, largely on account of his temperance principles, he said he would see what he could do "to help put new teeth into the old law," and much credit is due to him for the existence of the "Maine Liquor Law." When the time came to be sworn in as a member of the House, Eli Jones alone kept his seat while the others swore to do their duty. Then he arose and "affirmed" to the Governor that he would faithfully perform the duties of his office.

Although he worked on important committees and was diligent in other duties of his office, he had never addressed the House. Some of the members who knew his ability arranged a plan to call forth a speech from him. In the course of the session it became necessary to appoint a Major-general to the second division of the Maine militia. In 1838, Maine had undertaken by force of arms to assert her right to a region near her northern boundary, claimed by both her and Canada. There was much mustering of troops at the Capital, and fully ten thousand soldiers marched through the deep snow and cold to drive the enemy from Aroostook County.

Though they were brave and ready for battle, happily no blood was shed, and peace was wisely made. But the "Aroostook War" became famous as a subject of banter, and many jokes were made at the expense of the officers.

The old nursery rhyme was quoted:

"The King of France, with twice ten thousand men, Marched up the hill, and then—marched down again."

Primarily for these two reasons, to urge Eli Jones to his feet, and to joke the former officers by appointing a Quaker, an avowed peace advocate, he was unanimously chosen to fill the vacancy of Major-general.

The nomination was so entirely unexpected by Eli Jones that he was at first perplexed by the situation. He saw that much was at stake, and that wisdom and caution were needed. Having his horse at Augusta, he drove that night to his home at Dirigo, fifteen miles away, chiefly, perhaps, to discuss the situation with his beloved Sibel and the Friends most suitable for counsel. After talking far into the night with his brother-in-law, James Van Blarcom, he walked the floor alone until the new day was dawning.

Upon reaching Augusta again, he found the occasion far more important than he had anticipated. The news had spread that the Quaker was to speak in regard to his appointment, and the hall of Representatives was crowded. Not only were most of the members of the Senate present, but many other citizens. The subject of the appointment was introduced, and Eli Jones spoke in substance as follows:

"Whatever my ambition may have been in times past, my aspirations have never embraced such an office as this as an object of desire. I can assure the House that my election as Major-general was an honor wholly unexpected. It is true that when the Governor announced to the House the existence of the vacancy, a member privately remarked to me, I shall vote for you; but I replied, declining the honor, and proposed to return the compliment.

"To my mind there is something ominous in this occurrence. I regard it as one of the developments of the times. Who of us, when assembled ten years ago, in quiet and retired places, to affix our signatures to pledges of abstinence from intoxicating drinks, would have believed that in 1855 we should be elected to the seats we now occupy, amid the overwhelming rejoicings of the people, and pledged to the support of the Maine Law? Who that at that time had visited the plantations of the South and had seen the slave toiling under the lash of the task-master, would have believed that in 1855 the people of the larger portion of this great land would have roused the stern determination to subdue the encroachments of the slave power, and have pledged themselves never to cease their labors until the wrongs of slavery should be ameliorated—nay, more, until slavery itself should be abolished?

"Still more wonderful! Who would have believed that the State of Maine, which a few years since gloried in an Aroostook expedition, and was noisy with military training and the noise of arms, would in 1855, exhibit the spectacle of a peaceable member of the Society of Friends being elected to the post of Major-general of a division of the militia, and that, too, by the representatives in their legislative capacity?

"But I have endeavored to regulate my own conduct by the principle that legislation should not go very far in advance of public sentiment, I, therefore, submit this suggestion in all candor.

"It is generally understood that I entertain peculiar views in respect to the policy of war. If, however, I am an exponent of the views of the Legislature on that subject, I will cheerfully undertake to serve the State in the capacity indicated. With much pleasure I shall stand before the militia of the Second Division and give such orders as I think best. The first would be, 'Ground arms.' The second would be, 'Right about face; beat your swords into plow-shares and your spears into pruning-hooks, and learn war no more.' I should then dismiss every man to his farm and to his merchandise, with an admonition to read daily at his fireside the New Testament, and ponder upon its tidings of 'Peace on earth, good-will toward men.'

"If, on the other hand, it should be determined that my election is a little in advance of the times, I am willing as a good citizen to bow to the majesty of the law, and, as a member of the Legislature to consult its dignity and decline the exalted position tendered me by the House, and I will now decline it. With pleasure I now surrender to the House this trust and honor and retire to private life."

This speech was delivered among interruptions of loud applause, and made a great sensation throughout the State; and not in Maine only, but it was commented on by many of the newspapers and appeared in the columns of English journals.

Pictures of the fighting Quaker were made, the order to his troops printed below. It even came out in an African journal, so that what seemed an unimportant pleasantry on the part of the Legislature of Maine, gave Eli Jones an opportunity to preach peace to a very extended audience, and to make his voice heard far beyond the little State capital.

From this time, Eli Jones was regarded with much respect by all the members, and he received encouragement and support in whatever he desired to accomplish.

At the close of the Legislative session he called upon the Governor to thank him for his kindness and his help in different ways.

He remarked to the Governor that he had been in rather a peculiar place during the winter, and had felt somewhat like a "speckled bird." The Governor said to him, "Mr. Jones, what you call being a 'speckled bird' has given you more influence than anything else could possibly have done."

Whatever he may have accomplished in other lines during his term of office, Eli Jones gave a clear testimony concerning the Christian teaching respecting peace, temperance and oaths, and returned to his home in China, Maine, thoroughly respected by all with whom he had been associated.

NEWS ITEMS.

The letters of Francis Pennell and other portions of a "Friend of Revolutionary Times" are in type, but under the present pressure of matter must be postponed temporarily.

The many friends of J. S. H. in this country will rejoice at this item in The Friend (London):—

A cablegram has been received from India reporting that John S. Hoyland has recovered from his attack of typhoid fever, and that his eldest son is now in excellent health.

CORRECTION.—The little poem of Caroline Hazard's, "The Ninth Hour," on the front page of No. 32, was attributed to the volume, "A Brief Pilgrimage in the Holy Land." It is to be found in the "Scallop Shell of Quiet." These two volumes and "The Yosemite and Other Verses" should appeal to Friends. They are most attractive and convenient gift books. We are expecting to print some review of them soon.

MARY S. McDowell, sister of the Carleton McDowell of Friends' Unit in France, has lost her position as a teacher in one of the Schools of New York City. The Superintendent of Schools is quoted as saying she is "an excellent teacher" and "a very estimable woman whose views happen to be in serious conflict with those prevailing (the italics are ours) to-day." She has made no secret of her conscientious objection to war.

The Foreign Missionary Association of Friends, of Philadelphia, needs a young woman teacher for the Girls' School, Tokio, Japan, also a man and wife to work among the young men and students from the Japanese Universities. Any who feel a call to either of these positions will please communicate with

ELLEN W. LONGSTRETH,
Chairman Candidates' Committee.

PENN STREET, BRYN MAWR, PA., Second Month 21, 1918.

The Friends' Guild of Teachers (English) was this year honored by the presidency of Leonard Downester, the distinguished biologist of King's College, Cambridge. The following brief excerpt from his address points to dangers on both sides of the Atlantic:—

Three great dangers face us in the near future, against which our boys may greatly help; Materialism; undue insistence on Efficiency as a means to Power instead of Service; Militarism. In combating this last, let us see to it that the alternative training in our schools be hard work, real daring. We must have ideals; and we must keep them continually before us.

THE American Friend records the following as happening under date of First Month 3rd:

The Quarterly Meeting, composed of our mission meetings at Matamoros, Victoria and Matzahuala, met there in regular session, and there was not an American present. Unforeseen hindrance prevented the two missionaries planning to attend from arriving, and all business was carried through by the natives. One splendid action taken by the meeting was a recommendation to the Monthly Meetings that they urge their members who have enlisted in the army to ask for their discharge, return to their homes, and live in peace. Surely, our Mexican Friends are proving worthy of their heritage.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Media Second Month 12, 1918. As previously arranged, an interval for lunch intervened between the session for worship and that for discipline.

The need of obedience, the fact that God's strength can be made perfect in our weakness, and the hopeful view that, in spite of the terrible events now transpiring, God's spirit is still at work in the hearts of men—these were some of the subjects feelingly spoken to by a number of Friends in the first meeting.

In the business session, the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders reported their answer to the new fifth Query. It was cause for thankfulness that they were able to answer it in the affirmative. A large committee to assist subordinate meetings and to care for calling conferences was appointed. Encouraging reports on the use of intoxicants and the education of our children were received from the several Monthly Meetings.

In separate session the Queries were considered, and answered, and in the men's meeting, the care of trust funds was discussed and the subject referred to the Yearly Meeting.

JOHN D. CARTER,
Clerk.

The following is taken from the American Friend:

J. Henry Scattergood, one of the members of the American Friends' Service Committee, who was made a member of the American Red Cross Commission sent to France to study the conditions there among the people in civil life and to plan for relief and reconstruction work, is now making a trip across the country speaking in a number of the largest Friends' communities. He left Philadelphia on the twelfth of Second Month. His schedule calls for two lectures in Ohio, four in Indiana Yearly Meeting, four in Western Yearly Meeting, three in Iowa, one in Nebraska, and four in Kansas, concluding the itinerary on the evening of Third Month 4th. J. Henry Scattergood's gift of his time to carry the message of the reconstruction work to Friends is one of the most valuable contributions that could be made to this great enterprise at the present time.

NO. 1, VOL. 1, of The No-Tobacco Journal is at hand. It is the official journal of the No-Tobacco League of which Charles B. Towns, of N. Y., is President. The paper is issued from Butler, Indiana, and may be had for a subscription price of 25 cents a year. Some European countries have had no-tobacco leagues for years. In the main they have been based on grounds of human efficiency. The object of this little journal is explained in the opening paragraph of the first editorial:—

The No-Tobacco League had its origin in a great need. Americans spend five times as much for tobacco as they give for all religious purposes; three times as much as is spent for education, and eighty-five times as much as we give to foreign missions. When we are told that 93 per cent. of all criminals use tobacco and that the percentage of boys in reform schools who use tobacco is sometimes as high as 98 per cent., we get a glimpse of what this enormous expenditure of money is doing.

I NOTICE in this week's issue a plea for books for the French children. Very nice well selected small stories under the name of "Livres Roses de la Jeunesse" can be had twenty-four for one dollar at "Brentano's New York." This is all the name needed. Twenty-four of these are now on the way to the men working in France from our Friends. One of them, Louis Gannatt having spoken of the "wonderful opportunity given them of getting spiritually close to the people." Brentano also publishes a little serial called "Les Journals," and another, I know personally, is "Le Rayon du Soleil." Office in Paris. A monthly, illustrated, and with nice little stories. Price, one dollar a year. If any of the workers in Paris would like to get in touch with "The M-Call Mission" they might find good help in these little stories. Older Friends here may remember a visit years ago from Theodore Monod; I think he was a French Friend, but I am not sure. One of the same family is now here taking interest in French Protestants. They give out many French Testaments, being entirely Protestant. I do not know how our Friends would feel about that. It is done all over France without protest from the priests. But times have changed.

L. C. WOOD.

THE "C. O." SITUATION.—We are all feeling in greater or less degree the effects of the war, but do we sufficiently recognize the position of the men detained in the military camp as "C. O.'s"?

Conditions at Camp Meade, from facts gained in visiting, as well as from recent letters, indicate an increased tendency on the part of the military authorities to humiliate as well as segregate the one hundred and forty odd C. O.'s under their charge.

This group has lately been removed to D39 in the southwest part of the cantonment, which is occupied by colored soldiers. Negro guards make their rounds of the barracks, armed with rifles to which are affixed naked bayonets.

Provisions are furnished, but no cooks.—We can but hope that digestion will not be badly upset as a result of efforts of these untrained in the culinary art.

Cross country hikes are no longer allowed, and those who have not engaged in Y. W. C. A. of Y. M. C. A. work are closely segregated.

Dr. Edward G. Rhoads and James M. Moon visited the camp on seventeenth inst.; they had a satisfactory religious meeting with our young men.

The correspondence course of study is in progress; the work in French naturally claims most interest, as so many of the men hope to be able to engage in Reconstructive work in France.

The "C. O.'s" in Camp Dix have reason to be thankful for the considerate treatment shown them. So far as known there are but six such in the camp; all are engaged in the library.

George M. Warner and Wm. B. Harvey visited this camp on seventeenth inst.; they would have been glad to greet the whole number, though gratified to learn that four of the men were enjoying a week-end furlough. A comfortable meeting for worship was held in a small room in the rear of the library building with the two men in which particular interest centered.

The Exemption Committee of the Representative Meeting has recently sent a message to Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, urging that the religious C. O.'s be paroled for productive agriculture; offering co-operation in the service.

A delegation consisting of a member of our religious Society, a General Conference, and an Old School Mennonite, and a Dunkard is about to visit Washington in an endeavor to hasten the President's definition of non-combatant service.

It is likely that all Conscientious Objectors, religious and non-religious, will be treated alike; this complicates the situation; existing legislation provides for the religious "C. O.", but an Act of Congress may be necessary to care for both classes taken as a whole.

We would encourage more of our Friends to visit the camps; the men need the cheer of their comrades from without, and they need the ministry of the Gospel as way opens for it.

SECOND MONTH 19, 1918.

W. B. H.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

SPECIAL NOTICE—FRIENDS' SERVICE BUTTONS AND PINS.—Until the present we have not felt it advisable to give attention to a widespread demand for an emblem that can be kept as a durable reminder of Friends' War Relief Work. Owing to our present more adequate office staff we can now meet this demand without detriment to the work of the Committee.

We are ready to sell at a price of fifty cents, a gold-filled, enamel Friends' Service emblem. It can be had in two styles—either a lapel button or a pin with a safety catch.

Our earlier reluctance in issuing this emblem has finally been overcome of the thought that it is not an advertisement of ourselves, but a symbol in the principles of loving, international service which our young men are now seeking to express in the world. Many of us who have never worn an emblem before have found that it opens up valuable and often unforeseen opportunities to explain Friends' work.

The price of fifty cents covers the cost of production and distribution with a small profit that will go directly into the relief work. In justice to the work we have felt that we should not devote to this matter even the small attention necessary, without a return to the purposes for which our organization exists.

We shall be glad to fill individual orders for persons who call at our office, because we are glad to welcome Friends at the Friends' Service headquarters, and because such distribution can be made at a minimum expenditure of time and money.

We cannot, however, fill individual orders by mail except in cases where a person is not in close touch with a local meeting. We request that orders to be sent by mail be given to some person who will attend to the matter for the whole meeting. Such person should make collections in advance where possible and send orders with check or money order to our offices, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. Orders should state whether lapel buttons or pins are desired.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE FOR WEEK ENDING SECOND MONTH 23, 1918:

Received from 20 Meetings.....	$15,380.46
Received from 14 Individuals.....	802.75
Received for Armenian and Syrian Relief.....	150.65

$16,333.86

CHARLES F. JENKINS, Treasurer.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.—Many of us remember the cold and oftentimes rough trip to this Second Month session of the Quarterly Meeting when it was held at London Grove.

For the large majority of the members, and particularly for visitors, West Grove, on a line of railroad, is much more convenient.

The hour of ten in the morning of the twenty-second found the landscape once more enveloped in a mantle of white. Despite the storm in progress, the attendance was good for a winter meeting.

A reverential silence soon spread over the gathering and the felt presence of the Master of Assemblies was evident.

Visiting Friends were present from Canada and Ohio, as well as from points nearer home; the encouragement of their presence together with the spoken word from five of them, added much to the life of the meeting.

Naturally, the trying times through which we are passing, was reflected in the exercises of the occasion. There is much sadness and darkness, though we were reminded of the time of much greater darkness, when our blessed Saviour gave up His life that through Him sinful man might be redeemed.

Increased faithfulness was urged for a more diligent, earnest reading of the Scriptures, for the strengthening of our faith, and there was special emphasis placed upon the importance of prayer and communion with our Heavenly Father in season and out of season.

Jesus Christ, the Way and Only Way to the Father was preached—the importance was emphasized of a religion fit to live by as well as fit to die by. One Friend voiced the sentiment, in effect, that our hearts should be so attuned to the Divine Harmony, that we should be a little happier each day as our lives advanced, a little better prepared to join the Redeemed in Heaven.

A fervent appeal was offered to the Throne of Grace on behalf of our young people in foreign lands engaged in deeds of mercy, that they might be strengthened for the work and if in Divine ordering, returned in safety to their native land.

In the second meeting the usual business preparatory to the Yearly Meeting was gone through with; a letter of interest and sympathy authorized three months ago, and meant for the three young people, members of the Quarterly Meeting, engaged in service abroad, was read.

The report on intoxicants was perhaps the most encouraging one that has been presented since the personal inquiry was inaugurated quite a good many years ago.

A lunch in the upper room, following the meeting, gave opportunity for social cheer, after which the group of worshippers departed. Surely, any one could have rightly said that it was good to have been at the Quarterly Meeting.

SECOND MONTH 23, 1918.

W. B. H.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia (Penna. R. R.), at 6.21, 8.21 A. M., and 2.45, 3.35, 4.55 P. M., other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

THE CLOTHING DEPARTMENT of the American Friends' Service Committee is now prepared to supply patterns of foreign garments to any individuals or Monthly Meetings that wish to do relief sewing. Our patterns have been made according to directions received from English Friends by the Home Pattern Co., of New York. They represent the most accurate form of instructions for making foreign garments which we have been able to obtain. They may be had from Anne G. Walton, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

MEETINGS from Third Month 3rd to 9th:—

Kennett Monthly Meeting, at Kennett Square, Third-day, Third Month 5th, at 10 A. M.

Chesterfield, at Trenton, Third-day, Third Month 5th, at 10 A. M.
Chester, N. J., at Moorestown, Third-day, Third Month 5th, at 7.30 P. M.

Bradford, at Coatesville, Fourth-day, Third Month 6th, at 10 A. M.

New Garden, at Westgrove, Fourth-day, Third Month 6th, at 10 A. M.
Upper Springfield, at Mansfield, Fourth-day, Third Month 6th, at 10 A. M.

Haddonfield, Fourth-day, Third Month 6th, at 7.30 P. M.

Wilmington, Fifth-day, Third Month 7th, at 7.30 P. M.

Uwchlan, at Downingtown, Fifth-day, Third Month 7th, at 10.30 A. M.

London Grove, Fifth-day, Third Month 7th, at 10 A. M.

Falls, at Fallsington, Fifth-day, Third Month 7th, at 10 A. M.

Evesham, at Mt. Laurel, Fifth-day, Third Month 7th, at 10 A. M.

Upper Ewsham, at Medford, Seventh-day, Third Month 9th, at 10 A. M.

MARRIED.—At Friends' Meeting-house, No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, on Second Month 12, 1918, CLARENCE SELLERS PLATT and MILDRED ELIZABETH WEBSTER, all of Pennsylvania.

DIED.—at the residence of her son-in-law, Sydney E. Smith, West Branch, Iowa, Twelfth Month 16, 1917, REBECCA COOK, in the seventy-fourth year of her age; a member and Elder of West Branch Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, First Month 22, 1918, at his home near Colerain, Ohio, OLIVER S. NEGUS, in his seventy-first year; a life-long member of Short Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

—, suddenly, from fatal accident by falling tree, First Month 23, 1918, JESSE H. DEWEES, aged forty-five years; a member of Salem Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

—, Second Month 3, 1918, at her home in Kennett Square, Pa., SUSANNA E. (HALLOWELL) CHAMBERS, wife of James C. Chambers, aged sixty-eight years; a member and Overseer of New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pa.

—, suddenly at Tunassassa, N. Y., Second Month 10, 1918, HARVEY E. GARWOOD, son of Daniel G. and Anna M. Garwood, aged thirty-six years; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends N. J.

—, at Salem, Ohio, Second Month 12, 1918, JAMES E. MAYLE, son of the late James and Margaret A. Maule, of Colerain, Ohio.

—, at Moorestown, N. J., on Second Month 13, 1918, MARY R. MYLICK, aged seventy-six years; a member and Elder of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey.

—, at her home in Germantown, on Second Month 14, 1918, ANNE WISTAR HAINES, wife of Henry E. Haines and daughter of the late Thomas and Priscilla F. Wistar; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, in Tuckerton, New Jersey, Second Month 14, 1918, AMOS ALFRED RIDGWAY, son of the late Amos and Phoebe Ridgway, in his eighty-fifth year; a member of Burlington Monthly Meeting of Friends.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

Woolman School

A Children's School for Social and Religious Education.

Additional Announcements for Winter Term, 1918:

"The Teen Age in the First-day School." A course given by W. Edward Raffety, Editor of the publications of the Baptist Publication Society.

"Problems of the Rural Church and Community," by Bruno Lasker, of the staff of "The Survey," New York City, and by others, Friends and non-Friends, who have the authoritative knowledge of rural problems.

A special week-end Conference of Friends is planned for the Woolman School, Second Month 22nd and 24th.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 39 years; Medical 13

The stamp of quality on Plumbing Fixtures

The Hajoca trademark represents an experience of sixty years in making sanitary plumbing fixtures. It stands for a reputation earned by ever-increasing excellence of the product. It assures you of health-protecting designs, and guarantees Hajoca quality.

Come and see the advanced designs of Hajoca Plumbing Fixtures. Our showrooms are with in easy reach of City Hall. Write for Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES
& CADBURY CO.

1130-1144 Ridge Ave.

(at 12th and Spring Garden Sts.)

W. B. WEAVER UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

SUCCESSOR TO S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10.30 A.M. Any other time by appointment only

Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila., & Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

THE ESTAUGH

HADDONFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Two vacancies—apply to

ANNA EASTBURN WILLITS, Haddonfield, N. J.

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. - PHILA.

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.

Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE WESTONIAN FOR SECOND MONTH contains among other interesting matter:

A List of the Westtown Committee, arranged by Quarterly Meetings, with dates of first appointment of each member. Also, a Symposium on the size of the Westtown Committee. Subscribe now, $1.00 a year.

THE WESTONIAN,

Westtown, Pa.

Assoc. M. Am. Soc. C. E.

Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. : : PHILA.

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States

Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mineographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Typewriting, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FOR RENT—EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED COTtage, bath, open plumbing, hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several meals daily, half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are one or more invalids in family. Meals must be taken at Maplewood.

Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES,

Janestown, R. I.

WANTED—IN MEDIA, PA., BEFORE THIRD
Month 15th: three rooms, furnished or unfurnished, with board for three adults; good location, terms and size of family. References exchanged.

Address T. S. B., "THE FRIEND,"
297 Walnut Place, Philadelphia.

LANSLOWNE FRIENDS' SCHOOL WILL NEED for the academic year 1918-19 a teacher for the sixth and seventh grades. Experience in these grades is required. Application may be made to the Principal,
ELEANOR S. ECROYD,

Lanslowne, Pa.

Safety and Yield In Investments

MANY short-term notes of ample security offer, at present prices, an unusually liberal yield.

Well-known issues of such securities can now be bought at prices to yield from 5.60% to well above 7%.

Send for Circular PF-156

The National City Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.,
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

Philadelphia's Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS
FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL

will need for the academic year 1918-1919 an assistant secretary, familiar with bookkeeping and general office work, who will have some duties in supervising study rooms; and also an assistant in the Primary Department.

For this last position a teacher of some experience is needed. The duties will include assisting in the third year work; supervising writing; helping on the playground; and if possible conducting simple classes in sloyd and other hand work, and coaching irregular pupils.

Application should be made to

STANLEY R. YARNALL, Principal
Germantown Friends' School
Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -- PHILA.

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 -- Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL PHONE SPRUCE 1848

SELL WASTE PAPER

Anyone can operate our
Common Sense
Waste Paper Baler

Each bale worth from 30c to 50c.
REDUCES FIRE RISK.
Guaranteed for one year.

$16

Sylvester S. Garrett & Co.

Wrapping, Toilet,
Building, Towels
Paper

Paper Bags and Twine

259 South Third Street

GIRARD TRUST CO. BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian, Administrator, Assignee and Receiver. Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults. Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

Phone, Spruce 3082

Genealogist

Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 N. Stockton St., Tranton, N.J.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 7, 1918.

No. 36.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away."

—ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

THE VISIONS OF THE YOUNG.

It is a striking fact that great movements creating new epochs, be they in Church or State, have almost without exception been inspired by the visions of the young. Christianity, the great miracle of history, was in its inception a young people's movement. Like a volcanic eruption it arose in the East and overspread the Roman world in an incredibly short space of time. Our Lord chose for his apostles a band of young men. The young are artless, open-minded, buoyant, optimistic. Youth is the season of enthusiasm; and if sacrifice is called for in the accomplishment of great and noble ends, it is swallowed up in the thrill of high venture, and in the mysterious joy of the up-swelling tides of life. Age has often known disenchantments, and is therefore tempted to be cynical. A disappointed man lacks driving force. For the arising of a fresh testimony to God's everlasting Truth, commend me to the young, with the look of wonder in their eyes and the glow of hope in their hearts.

The pioneers of Quakerism were largely young people; but they had been touched by the selfsame flame from heaven that sat upon each bowed head in the Pentecostal upper room. Amidst the Babel-voices of wrangling schools of religious opinion that "still unfed, unwearied wrangled o'er the Bread of Life," they listened to the inward Teacher and soon surpassed in wisdom the learned scribes and rabbis of their day. Their message, and the life that went with it, spread like a contagion—the only way it can properly spread to-day. A heaven-born exhilaration puts to shame the joys of earth, and acts like a magnet on others. The young easily catch this spiritual contagion, while response to it anywhere proves the presence of undiminished youthful virility whatever the term of years. The hope of the modern Society of Friends is in its young life. If it comes under a fresh visitation, leading on to a serious dedication of heart and life to Christ and His cause, it will secure a continued succession of consecrated burden-bearers on whose willing shoulders the ark of the Lord will be carried forward.

By whom wilt thou save Israel? "Thus saith the Lord, even by the young men of the princes of the provinces!"

Not but that youth with its eagerness to go forward has not its own dangers. It seems evident from the ripe counsel given by "Paul the aged" to young Timothy that he shared the common tendency of youth to be impatient with "authority." To the glowing young the more cautious old are apt to be "back-numbers," if not altogether "in the way." But if youth has its temptations in this particular, it is a fault that mends every day. Therefore "Let no man despise" the youth.

Happy are the older who like Caleb, when a whole generation lagged behind the Divine purposes and fell in the wilderness, retain vision and vigor to the end. Caleb never lost the vision of the mount his eyes had seen in his youth. And that vision kept him young. After forty monotonous years, daily eating out his heart, he could say: "Yet am I as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out and to come in." And he was not afraid to tackle the giants that held the mountain. He chose a young man's task in his old age.

What a noble sight! A white-haired veteran keeping in sympathetic touch with the warrior-youth of Israel and marching with them to victory!

MAX I. REICH.

AN INTENDED STEP OF EXPANSION.

Growing families have two ways of expanding. The sons, and in these modern times often the daughters as well, go out from the home environment, seek new fields of life service and carve out new careers for themselves. In older civilizations, perhaps with increasing frequency now in our own country, children lend their energies to the perpetuation and expansion of a family business. Thus it becomes a matter of commendable pride (in Philadelphia at any rate) that a manufacturing or mercantile enterprise has been maintained under one name for a hundred years or more. This hereditary feeling is capable of much good in furnishing cohesion in human society, and in guaranteeing a certain degree of perpetuity to the necessary institutions of life. Very particularly is this characteristic believed to be valuable in the religious world. Too often the tendency in this domain is for the young to seek new fields of adventure and so to leave a parent organization to languish for its greatly needed young life.

We are most happy to look forward to an expansion of THE FRIEND, in the near future, that contemplates the admission of Young Friends to an active share in the responsibilities of our paper. For more than a year past the Young Friends' Committee has had under consideration the advisability of starting a new monthly to represent their interests. We have solicited their association with us as a means best calculated to serve their purpose. Such association is surely in the line of economy of outlay in time and money. We believe it may prove also most efficient in expanding their interest and in bringing the whole Society—older and younger—into a happy unity of purpose and effort.

The exact means proposed is to issue a double number of our paper, probably ten times in the year. Five or six pages of these numbers will be assigned to Young Friends. Their own caption and the names of their editorial staff will appear on these pages.

With the enlarged interest thus gained it is hoped the subscription list will be materially increased. Is it unreasonable to expect five hundred new names?

Naturally such an expansion has some very definite implications as to views and points of view. Censorship or restraint or repression are far from the mark in contemplating the proposed undertaking. There must be a clear understanding as to a unity of purpose and as to the value of certain methods in conserving the good in hand, and thus making this unity a growing unity. The present expanding life of our little journal, with its growing subscription list, emphasizes the value of certain aims which it may be well to review in the light of what is now proposed.

From the beginning in 1827 THE FRIEND has maintained a type of religious propaganda quite definitely characterized by catholicity. In technical religious parlance it has been broad. From time to time editors have received protests for going so far afield in religious periodicals for quotation and for illustrative matter. Our late beloved Friend, John H. Dillingham, used to reply to this criticism by a direct reference to Robert Barclay. At his hands the distinctive principles of Quakerism found confirmation from religionists of every faith. THE FRIEND has aimed to stand for this type of Quakerism rather than for any narrow denominationalism. Such a type has the great advantage of recognizing Friends in all folds of the divided Society, as well as outside of such folds. We take it our Young Friends sympathize with this breadth of view.

Along with this general breadth of view THE FRIEND has been definitely conservative in its sympathies. It has never been formally adopted as the organ of any meeting. It does regard the conservative meetings—larger and smaller—as its special field. There are marked differences among these, but together they make a rallying nucleus for real Friends of all kinds. It is a matter of no little significance that these conservative meetings, at least the two larger of them, London and Philadelphia, have been the growing meetings in the past five years. Our aim then is to grow within this circle and from this circle outward as such growth is possible without compromise. We take it that our Young Friends would feel hospitable to this program and unwilling to sacrifice it for anything less than a definite principle.

Finally, our paper claims to stand for a militant Christianity without the hampering influences of traditionalism or any unreasonable fear of change. The real Friend is not, as often represented, put into a position of isolation in the world by faithfulness to his principles. If he has rightly conceived Quakerism it is a position of freedom. It fits one for service with men and for man. We need a revival of this understanding. THE FRIEND and Young Friends can surely work together for this end.

If the two rather distinct parts of our projected double numbers can be united in this program of the larger unity, it should not be at all difficult for them to react upon each other for good in questions upon which there might be a distinct difference of point of view. It is not contemplated that these differences should be suppressed. Sometimes a candid expression of them is the very best way to clear the atmosphere for actual co-operation. Whatever else the movement may involve, it is on the part of both interests concerned a most distinct effort at co-operation.

J. H. B.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

In addition to the double number announced above it is expected that next week's issue will be double also. This is in order that some matter intended as preparatory to Yearly Meeting may have the attention of our readers.

DURHAM QUARTERLY MEETING.

The English Quarterly Meetings precede our own. They are not infrequently week-end occasions. Something of the Life in them may be gathered from the following as reported in The Friend [London].

The Quarterly Meeting, held at Sunderland on the 16th and 17th of First Month, was well attended, despite the very unfavorable weather.

THE SPRINGS OF LIFE.

At the opening sitting two subjects, "Divine help and guidance" and "The need for more careful religious training of our young people," were considered, the first introduced by L. Violet Hodgkin, who said Isaiah's message to Judah was an invitation to come up to the "mountain of the Lord" that He might "teach them His ways;" and the call was followed by warnings against many specific sins which find their counterpart in our own day. Our problems begin at the innermost centre of our being. The searchlight, slowly moving amongst the houses of a seaside town, is much more interesting when it illuminates every detail of our neighbors' houses than it is when its beams are concentrated on our own. If, however, instead of resenting its intrusion and trying to look outward we open wide our blinds and allow the light to come into our rooms, how it lights up everything therein. Similarly, we need to open our hearts to the searchlight of God's Spirit, and to surrender ourselves to His will. Such surrender may seem to be a "hard stile;" but it leads to a life of joy. If our meetings are falling short of the ideal, is it not wrong of us to get into the critical place and blame other people? No meeting is dead in which one member has had the "live coal" from the altar laid upon his lips; and a meeting where there is no such member, however big it may be, is cold and lifeless. We need surrender of heart and life, as well as unity of purpose, if we, as a Society, are to know and do the Lord's will. The Quarterly Meeting would never go ahead until it began to reach out to those outside its borders and to open its closed meeting-houses.

METHOD IN RELIGIOUS TRAINING.

Some discussion followed this address, and then Herbert Dennis, of Great Ayton, read a paper entitled, "A plea for more method in the religious training of our children." There was a great tendency to separate secular and religious education. People seemed to imagine that the Christian life could assert itself; but we did not treat history or other subjects in that way. Though we might not be able to teach Christianity directly, as a school subject, he thought it was possible to teach Christian principles, as the mind of the child opened to receive them. Children might be taught the possibilities of prayer; this would need prayerful and inspired teachers. He pleaded for the children belonging to our congregations to be sent to Friends' Schools. Out of two hundred and sixty children of school age in the Quarterly Meeting, only forty were at Friends' Schools. The tone and atmosphere of the home and school were largely responsible for the after life of the child. The paper concluded with some practical suggestions and was followed by a spirited discussion.

THE QUAKER FAITH.

The exigencies of the present time have doubtless pressed home to most of us the question, What is the ultimate principle for which we as Friends must either stand or, abandoning it, ignominiously fall! In short, what is the vital issue which throbs through our arteries and makes of us a separate branch of the Church? I confess for my own part that I have gone through what the old Friends used to call "deep searchings of heart." I have gone over, too, the causes of our numerous separations and I have not found one worthy of the strife and bitterness which have been engendered, not one able to outweigh the feebleness and enervation which has resulted. I remember a remark of Emerson, made to a friend of my father, in regard to some of the acrimonious discussions over certain mooted points in the Society of Friends. "You must be very rich to spend your time discussing those things," and I conclude that we must have been very rich to have been able to endure all of these separations and bitter doctrinal discussions and still survive. What we might have been and done for the world had we been able to lay aside the predominating personal element in these, and pressed for the goal of our high calling, none may tell. We have been rich because we have had that in all these things which has held us to an ideal of spiritual life and this is that vital thing which if allowed to fall into abeyance would not mean further separation, but annihilation.

If our faith is good for anything such times as the present will not only prove it, but will cause its roots to strike deeper and its branches to hold firmer because of the unseen, life-giving forces which are aroused afresh to meet the needs of the hour. The summary of the religious teaching of the Old Testament is dealt justly, love, mercy, walk humbly with thy God. That which was distilled through all those sacrificial years of Judah's life in exile and in sorrow culminated in the teaching of Christ—Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. By precept and example, by parable and by persuasion he impressed this truth upon His followers. It is futile to quote isolated texts as that about coming to send not peace, but a sword, to prove what His whole life and His death repudiated.

Through Him pulsed the love of God, not love for God as a separate entity as we speak of love of father or mother or friend, but the very spirit and power which is God was actuating His life and making Him one with the Father. This is the point that is the Quaker faith. Thus George Fox could say, "I live in the virtue of that life and power that takes away the occasion of all wars." It takes away not only the occasion of all wars, but of all injustice between man and man, all oppression, all deceit. It is an outgoing principle, promoting the well-being of others, harboring no ill, advancing the good, doing unto others as we would have them do to us. It is the love of God, the life of God, coursing through our souls, making us His children and co-workers, His spirit in the soul of every human being making this state possible for each. This is our inheritance. Are we not rich? Have we taken it? Have we put it out to usury? Are we willing to call ourselves heirs to such an estate? Are we ready to defend it by living it out? Let us rejoice that our vision is being cleared and our hands are being strengthened, and although a sense of our own short-comings is in our souls, the rubbish is being cleared away from our paths and we not only see failure as failure, but we also have a fresh revelation of our high calling. As we know of this Spirit of God in our own souls we recognize it as the gift of God to all mankind, hidden and hindered oftentimes, but there, ready to burst into bloom as the sunshine of God's love strikes through the surrounding darkness, making of every man the potential son of God—making us all brethren. Hence the only thing we can fight is the darkness and error which excludes the light and causes mankind to walk in darkness.

MARY MENDENHALL HOBBS.

GUILFORD COLLEGE, FIRST MONTH 5, 1918.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

GRUNY, SOMME, FRANCE,

FIRST MONTH 20, 1918.

DEAR LITTLE AMERICAN FRIENDS.—Wouldn't it seem strange to you to hear a clatter in the street behind you, and then to find, instead of several horses, a group of little French children coming down the middle of the street on their way to school? For there are no sidewalks in the smaller French villages, and the clatter is the sound of the wooden-soled shoes that all the children wear. It is really impossible for them to walk quietly, because these shoes are so heavy. But it isn't the shoes, nor the queer colored stockings, nor the little black pinafores that the boys wear while playing, that make the children interesting—it is their faces, and their names, and the way they live. For three years there has been no school for them to attend, and when many of their homes were partly destroyed about a year ago, some of them had to move away for a time, others lived with neighbors, and nearly all who were able to do so, had to work around their houses and in the gardens. One afternoon, a little girl came along the road pushing a large wheelbarrow; it was a very cold day but she had no gloves to keep her hands warm, only a sort of muffler around her neck, and nothing at all for a hat! She seemed quite cheerful in spite of the cold, and went on helping her grandmother who was nearly too old to push a wheelbarrow.

When so many of the homes were destroyed the boys and girls lost the few books they had had, and since they are all very poor now, they cannot have picture-books and games and dolls and toys to play with. You may be sure that they were surprised at Christmas time, when one of the American men helping over here gave them all some beautiful presents; every girl received a doll and a cap, and every boy was given a sweater and some stockings, besides some other useful things like gloves and little cakes of soap. It was the first time that they had had a happy Christmas for three years!

I wish you could all have seen to-day the little room where I live, because three of these little French girls came to pay a visit, bringing with them one of the men who is helping to build up their houses again. And they brought along a book that this man had borrowed for them—a book that you have probably enjoyed many times, called "The Adventures of Alice in Wonderland." How could French children read such a book as that? Well, it was translated into their own language so that they could read it, and they read it very nicely except one little girl who didn't change the tone of her voice at all, when she came to a question-mark or period, and it was hard to tell where one sentence ended and the next one began. The two older girls, Lucienne and Solange, enjoyed the story very much, but little Berte was too young to read, and what do you think pleased her more than anything else? Three paper dolls! Not the kind that have several different dresses for each doll, but just plain ones cut from a picture in a magazine, and they weren't even colored. Nevertheless, Berte's face was full of sunshine, and when she said, "Merci," which means, "Thank you," I knew she meant it. Very likely her Christmas doll was the only plaything she had, and if she played with that all the time, it would get soiled, and maybe lose its hair; now she can play with the paper dolls and keep the "best" doll for special occasions.

When all the children went to school last Tenth Month, they had to commence with everybody in one room that was really too dark and small for a school-room, but it was the best they had. And think how difficult it was for the teacher, who had no blackboard, no books for the children, only a few pencils, and not enough paper, there weren't any real desks at all, and the little writing that the children did, had to be done on flat tables. But they all struggled along and soon there came some new desks and benches, with new books for the various grades, a small section of blackboard, and the whole school moved into a larger, brighter room, that now has three bright new flags on the wall. Of course, it is not anything like some of the schools in America yet, because this is a small village. Instead of a nice cloak-room, these boys and girls have only a row of nails in a board, on which to hang up their caps and mufflers. Can you guess why the French word for muffler means "hide the nose?" It would also seem strange to you to go to school all of Seventh-day and stay home Fifth-day, but that is the custom here, and when the days are warmer, we will probably see all the boys bringing their Christmas sailboats on Fifth-day to try them in the queer little ponds that one finds in all these villages; but they will have to be careful, because it is very easy to fall in, and perhaps the boys wouldn't float as well as their sailboats.

After all, the French and American children are very much alike in spirit, and next time you play "hide-and-seek," or "tag," just remember there are hundreds of children away over here who may be doing the same thing.

Sincerely your friend,

P. M. R.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

A BRIEF REVIEW of the "temperance movement" as recorded monthly on this page of THE FRIEND during the past fifteen years may be helpful to us as we think of our approaching Yearly Meeting.

When the Temperance Association was granted the privilege of editing this page, the concession was regarded by many as a kind of innovation, and some were fearful that it might cause unprofitable discussion or open the way for the expression of "radical" views. The exercise of great caution is shown in the language used in the first issue, under date of Fifth Month 16, 1903. "It is not our intention," so runs the print, "to advocate herein any solution of the Temperance Question, or the broader question of temperance, other than the daily living of those virtues that compel the putting away of all intemperance in the individual." This, surely, is the right foundation to build on. Reform measures advocated on the ground of commercial expediency only, may collapse when the turn in the market comes, but such as spring from a genuine demand for right living are more sure to stand. We welcome, however, the unhampered way in which now we write and talk about "prohibition"—a word as provocative of contention fifteen years ago as single tax and socialism are to-day. We do not hesitate any more to say frankly that we do advocate a solution of the question. We recommend for the body politic the enactment of constitutional prohibition. Borrowing the words of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America:—

"We reaffirm our conviction that total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State and Nation is the path of wisdom and safety."

There may still be need, however, for the fear expressed in our first issue in 1903; "that many members of the Society of Friends are unequal to their opportunities because of ignorance as to the insidiousness and enormity of the evils of intemperance, and as to facts relative to efforts to promote temperance."

As stated in a letter issued in 1904 by the Temperance Association, "the public is ill-informed on this great issue. As followers of Him whose power will subdue all things unto Himself, can we admit that any evil is a 'necessary evil?' Dare we say, 'I have no responsibility in the matter?'"

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as a body has striven for total abstinence during the past thirty years. The method employed has been the "annual inquiry"—not a very agreeable method, but, on the whole, it has worked successfully. If we contrast the attitude of many Friends towards this inquiry in the eighties with the complaisance so prevalent regarding it now, we can explain the change only by the fact that practically every member is "clear" or nearly so. A brief, courteous, business-like letter from the Yearly Meeting to those who are "not clear," might help to make the record more satisfactory next year. A Committee appointed in 1914 made a careful study of the nature and effect of the annual inquiry, gathering their information from the answers to a series of twenty-one questions sent to all the Monthly Meetings in the Yearly Meeting. On hearing the report of this Committee in 1915, the Yearly Meeting issued a letter of advice to subordinate meetings on the subject and recommended the continuance of the inquiry, making it include young men sixteen years of age and upward. But,

New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth.

And so, this year, recommendations have been made in some of our subordinate meetings looking towards what may be the "new duties" of a changing social order. Should not the Society as a body declare its approval of the proposed Prohibition Amendment? Should not every member who has the right to vote feel it his duty to support such candidates only as are favorable to prohibition?

The development of thought on the so-called "temperance question" has been far more pronounced, however, outside the Society of Friends, during the past fifteen years, than it has been in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. In 1903, Maine and Kansas and North Dakota were the only States committed fully to prohibition. Oklahoma came next in 1907, then Georgia in 1908, and on New Year's day, 1909, prohibition went into effect in three more States, Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. Since then, eighteen more States have adopted the prohibition policy in addition to Alaska, Porto Rico and District of Columbia. When we consider that in every instance the passage of a prohibition law has been, not the beginning, but the outcome of an educated and aroused public sentiment, we begin to apprehend the vast body of conviction that is pushing this issue. In 1903 the economic aspect of the question seemed not to appeal very strongly to business men. Then followed in 1905 and 1906 a somewhat spectacular exposure of corrupt practices in business. Attention was turned to commercial agencies that made capital of human weaknesses. A certain non-partisan, non-sectarian, omni-citizen organization took the field, appealing to moral and economic instincts alike. Men of affairs began to see that the liquor business lowers the average of human efficiency and increases the load of taxation. The benefits of prohibition began to show in dollars to the credit of prohibition States, counties and towns. Business men then took a hand in helping the movement, and when "business" gets interested, things are sure to happen.

Constitutional prohibition for the United States is nearer, perhaps, than the citizens of "wet" states realize. There is good reason to believe that the Amendment will be carried by thirty-six States before the end of 1919. The legislatures of eleven States convene in 1918, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Rhode Island and South Carolina. The remaining thirty-seven will convene in 1919. Of the eleven, six already have voted on the Amendment and have ratified it by good majorities. The six are Mississippi, Virginia, Kentucky, South Carolina, North Dakota, Maryland. Montana endorsed the Amendment at a recent special session of the legislature. Two of these are not prohibition States. New Jersey has not voted on the Amendment, but has passed a local option law. This is a long step forward, giving the voters a weapon that the liquor interests have feared and fought to prevent for twelve years. It encourages the belief that later on this State, also, will ratify the Amendment. In New York State women will have a voice in selecting the legislature and it is altogether reasonable to assume that the first great eastern commonwealth to extend the franchise to women will not be the last to endorse the prohibition amendment.

Of the many agencies contributing to the progress of this great movement few, if any, in Philadelphia have been more helpful along educational lines than Friends' Temperance Association. The two experienced teachers, employed regularly to aid the school officials and teachers in carrying out the provisions of the law regarding temperance instruction, have found of recent years an open door for splendid service. Their work is regarded no longer as a useful kind of detective service. It is welcomed as a real aid in practical education. They are asked to speak at teachers' meetings and on similar occasions, and are allowed to give brief talks and illustrated lectures to many thousands of children. Essay contests among pupils are encouraged, and in this way the study of the problem is carried into many homes wherein a better knowledge of the subject is greatly needed. The total number of competitive essays written last year was 5591. Possibly no other line of social reform work yields a larger or more permanent return on the investment than the effort to discourage the use and stop the sale of intoxicating drinks.

From the Washington Star, Second Month 6, 1918.
Furnished by George Vaux, Jr.

LOCAL RESULTS OF PROHIBITION.—Local prohibition has now been in force for three months, and the effect has already been noticeable in a diminution of the cases brought before the Police Court, according to figures compiled at police headquarters. These statistics show a decrease in arrests, not only for intoxication, but for offenses which often grow out of the use of intoxicants. Comparing the first three months under prohibition with the corresponding period of a year previous, the results are striking. There were in that time 1,664 fewer arrests for drunkenness under the Sheppard law than before it went into effect, 2,406 having been made during the "wet" November, December and January, and only 742 during the "dry" period.

But the most significant effect of the new condition appears in the comparison regarding arrests for offenses other than intoxication. Cases of disorderly conduct fell from 820 to 337 in this period, a reduction of 552; cases of assault fell from 423 to 205, or 218 less; housebreaking cases were reduced by 85, from 156 to 71; cruelty to animals caused 148 arrests before the "dry" law went into effect and only 77 afterward, a reduction of 71; cases of carrying weapons fell from 47 to 39, or 8 less. The total reduction of arrests under these five headings is impressive—from 1,603 in the three months a year ago to 719 under prohibition, or 884 less. Combining all cases, intoxication and offenses often attributable to it, the result is a convincing showing of betterment—4,009 arrests under the "wet" conditions and 1,461 under the "dry" law, or a reduction of 2,548.

Considering that each arrest means work for the police, work for the court and usually work for the custodians of those sentenced to imprisonment, and that each arrest also means loss of employment, loss of wages and suffering for families, the net gain to the District economically is tremendous. Life and property are undoubtedly safer under the present conditions than before. If traffic in intoxicants from Baltimore were cut off this showing, on all counts, would, without question, be much better. As it is, Washington is distinctly the gainer through the enforcement of the Sheppard law.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA.

RECEIVED Second Month 20, 1918.

WRITTEN Tenth Month 21, 1917.

АМРУКАР МУЦЦИХ, Оpendyepkpaer Yer 27, Bызyдыкен roпoor, Coupeken рыд, Tenth Month 21, 1917.

DEAR MOTHER:—

Thy letter received about two weeks ago was the last that I've heard from America—please don't forget that letters are our one and only touch with anything outside of this immediate village. You know we're about sixty miles from the nearest railroad and never see newspapers. We get absolutely no information as to the war; except for the high prices of some commodities and the absolute absence of others, we wouldn't know a war was on. Cotton material of any sort simply can't be had.

This letter is being written in the interstices between frantic instructions regarding housekeeping, supplies, servants, etc., hurled at me by the departing nurse, who has also been housekeeper here. She leaves tomorrow, about a week before she had expected, and my mind is a welter of carrots to buy, pigs to kill, eggs to put down in ashes (who ever heard of keeping them that way?).

There are all sorts of curious ways of doing things here. The cellars of a house are out in entirely detached sheds, at about the distance of our barns. They are clumsy wooden structures, with great square holes in the middle which we fill with hundreds of pounds of potatoes, carrots, pumpkins, cabbages, etc. Straw is put on top and they are supposed to keep all winter and really until next summer, when things come again. It is really surprising how many things are still in the market every Sixth-day. We have red peppers, onions, baby watermelons, tomatoes. I'm just learning to go alone on these expeditions and, as a matter of fact, haven't bought things very often except as they have come to our kitchen door. However, it's great fun to go down to the ugly open square in the centre of the village and see all the people who drive in from the country with their carts full of raw meat, or huge cabbages or onions, strung about one hundred on a length of hemp rope. Each man specializes in one vegetable usually, and seems to sell nothing else. The wives usually come along with rolls of homespun linen (really crash) under their arms, cottage cheese, or huge glass jars of milk. Why the latter don't break after joggling so many miles over the rough roads in the open springless carts, I don't know. But the glass must be very good, as we pour boiling water directly from the samovar into them without their ever cracking. The priest moves around buying and having things presented to him, a patriarchal figure with long curling hair and a dress that buttons down the front. There are one or two foreigners, not native, with buttons to sell and laces very cheap and an old man with highly colored religious pictures and sometimes some homemade pottery; also there are always sheepskins, tanned and untanned, ready to make into the enormous coats worn here during the winter for driving. First you put on all the underwear you possess, then all your heaviest dresses, then a sweater and one's own ordinary winter coat. Then a "shuba," or light grey sheepskin coat lined with grey or white sheep's wool. The waist is tight-fitting, like an old-fashioned basque, and the skirt is this same sheepskin gathered onto it. I create a pleasing spectacle in this sort of garb, especially as the other women here are short and the "shuba" skirt comes a little above my knees! Then on top of that there comes an enormous "toolup," or sheepskin overall, like a motor coat, with a standup collar above your head, and sleeves long enough to act as a muff. Up to the present we have not had sufficient cold to need the last, and only one day of snow which did not collect to an appreciable amount.

The days are beginning to get cloudy and cold, however, and I suppose snow is in the near future. This will mean lighting the enormous stove every morning with "kiz-i-kee," or the dried bricks of manure and mud used about here for fuel. In the hospital houses the stoves are built into the walls something like corner closets and whitewashed over so that one cannot tell where stove begins and wall ends. They reach up to the ceiling and the only openings are out in the central hall around which the rooms are usually built. In the peasants' houses and in the houses occupied by our people in the smaller villages, the stoves are only about four feet high and about twelve feet square. As the masonry work, of which they are made, is very thick, the people use them as beds, while all up and down the front are little pigeon-holes in which everything is stored, from the family dinner to the family baby. The stove is the only certain furniture in a peasant's house. Usually there are also tables and benches running along the sides of the walls and beyond this nothing else, except skins and felt boots. "The windows are little crooked affairs of very poor glass and always double-framed and tightly closed, so that even now when the doors are often left open the atmosphere is thick. So far, however, I've done very little visiting. English people do not care to do so, and my ignorance of Russian makes me shy about going alone. My time is so well occupied just doing the things I must, that there is none left for studying. It is a great pity, too, as I feel that all of us would have more influence and would certainly understand what many strange Russian ideas and customs mean if we could only talk directly to the people. In France I see that Mary Duguid writes of a certain portion of the day being set aside for studying French, and I wish we had it thus. If I ever collect my time so that I see my way clear, I think I'll try some lessons with the teacher here who, I believe, is quite a nice and intelligent person and desirous of learning English.

According to the length of time taken by your letters I suppose I should wish you a Merry Xmas now.

My birthday comes within a week, but with the funny mixed up Russian calendar, I imagine I'll never notice it.

Some one is sending me THE FRIEND; please thank them if you know who it is. Tell Mary I'll have plenty of falling horse stories that will make her hair curl before I get home. The poor brutes are so starved they fall in their tracks.

ANNA J. HAINES.

WITH THE FARMERS IN FRANCE.

This morning the water froze in our wash basin, between washing and drying hands. All my week is spent at Evres far from this luxury (Sermaize). Each week, when out on the land, I think that you ought to know about this or you ought to see that in the mind's eye, but always letters get written here, so I am afraid that I neglect those good people at Evres.

As last week was the last of the threshing in Evres we had to close things up more or less, although we go back once more to the Christmas party that the Mission is going to have for the children of the place. Already they are all excited, because it is rumored that "Père Noel" will be there that night distributing presents and the like.

Recently we dropped in to spend the evening with the Caillots. Little Charlotte was there, grinning as usual, from ear to ear, Pierre in his weather-tanned school smock. The two elder ladies, Jean and Marcelle, were asleep in the great bed in the living-room, having put in a hard day pitching hay. Madeline grew very sleepy on her mother's knee, and finally, after an undressing, was carried away to bed—but, be it not forgotten, we each got a kiss, thrown by the flat of the hand, in a most fetching, winning way. Camille, Madame, Chettie (Carey) and I talked about the weather, the war, our threshing, how many men were mobilized in Evres (50) and how many had been "perdu" or lost (11), who they were, who was prisoner in Germany, and a hundred and one other subjects that helped to while away a most pleasant evening. Madame Trunpet was in with her sewing, for some reason—I know not why. The best talk was about Père Noel descending the stove-pipe in the school-room. Little Pierre's eyes most popped from their sockets when he learned of Saint Nicholas's approach. We concluded he was in the States now, but would make a crossing if not destroyed by the Bosch Avions, and that he would most certainly come in at a window for he would be much too fat for the stove-pipe. But Monsieur Camille felt confident that he would make an entrance all right, managing somehow, especially as he knew secretly that the writer was to be Père Noel himself.

After living in one village for some thirteen weeks one naturally becomes attached to it and to its people. I think that I shall never forget Evres, with its church on the hill, its blacksmith, its cobbler, its hundred or so families. And

I think that Evres will remember the Mission for a little while. In token of good-will one family, the Biechons, presented McDermid and myself with a great dog last week—a tremendous beast, standing at ease table high. Part blood-hound and part mastiff, she was a most gentle creature and very fond of me. So we received her partly as a gift for the Mission and partly as a protection. But Diane proved too big for the Source, so the poor dog was given or sold, I know not which, to a soldier—quickly come and quickly gone. Just what we can say to our good friends, the Biechons, I don't know, for they meant very well in their gift. All this last week we were threshing in the barn of one Jules Phelis. He is a most thrifty cultivator, owning some dozen horses, as many cows, and many hectares of wheat. His buildings were not among those that were burned by the Germans, so he has both house and barn intact, and they represent the best of the kind.

There are several things of interest connected with these French homesteads. The ovens consist of an orthodox vaulted recess—about two feet high and five feet deep. A fire is built therein, as yesterday. The smoke comes forward and out the chamber door, rising into the chimney place. After the oven is made sufficiently hot the embers are all dragged forward and out and the bread thrust in on a long paddle. A small ridge of embers is left just inside the oven door to "kill" the draft of cool air. When the bread is cooked it comes out as you well know, in great loaves, which we all hold against the chest, in orthodox French fashion. There is another fashion I have completely acquired—wearing sabots. They are so very warm compared with shoes I have abandoned the latter. I recommend them to you as they are so convenient and serviceable.

HOWARD W. ELKINTON.

(To be concluded.)

LETTER FROM E. HOWARD MARSHALL.

SOMEWHERE IN FRANCE, First Month 7, 1918.

"Meade Elliot and I are living in a ruined village near the front lines of last year. For almost three years it was in the hands of the Germans. There are about seventy people living here now, but no boys over thirteen and no men under fifty. Most of the houses were destroyed, so the people are living in the two-room wooden barracks put up by the army. It is a farmers' village, so they are altogether dependent upon the land for a living.

Our work has been plowing the fields for the sowing of wheat. There are only three plows here, besides our own, one of them pulled by oxen. We took turns "chaque jour retour" being plowboy one day and cook the next. We filled up shell holes, trenches and gun placements, removed barbed wire, dug up telephone poles, and replaced lost corner stones. We had the team in the field every day, hot or cold, rain or shine (mostly rain) from the day we arrived, Eleventh Month 1st, until the snow came, Twelfth Month 16th, and succeeded in turning over eighteen farms. A farm here usually is less than two acres, but the fact that the people here can make a living from so small a piece of land enables us to help more families than we could if each one required forty acres plowed as they do in the West.

"A few days before Christmas, Murray and Calvert came up from G— with a dainty Parisien doll for the little three-year old daughter of Madame Vail, the woman who cooks dinner for us. I wish you might have seen the look on the little girl's face as she reached out both arms and said, 'O-o-o-oa!' in plain English. We can hear her laughing and singing to that doll all day long now. The tree that Elliot loaded for the children here at Christmas was decorated by Murray at G— for their fête de the day before.

"A description of our cabin will give you some idea of how we live. It could well be mistaken for a hunter's shack in the mountains, for we have decorated it with souvenirs of the war, that we found in the dug-outs and trenches near the village. It is about ten by sixteen feet, with three solid brick walls and two windows and a door in the fourth wall opening into the court. It is much warmer than the French houses, for we have a tight plank floor instead of the usual tile, and we keep our little German trench stove red hot while cooking breakfast and supper. Our table we took from the old chateau which the Germans used for a Red Cross Hospital, giving it a good bath with soap and boiling water before trusting our food supplies on it. The rest of our furniture consists of two folding cots, two chairs, a bench, and some shelves along the wall. We are going back to the primitive as fast as possible.

"Our village is built on a curve of the paved road, from R— to P—. The road is lined on both sides with tall trees, and in places screened by panels of brush put up by the Boches. There are two kinds of trees here, apple trees and other trees. The former may be found along the roadsides, especially branch roads, or in orchards, or scattered just any place in the fields. The other trees are along the main roads, in the villages, or in large groves or 'Bois'. We got plenty of dry wood, though the apple trees have not been cut down so thoroughly around our village as in other places. The land is very level and it rains nearly every day, but the soil seems to be able to absorb any amount of water, and is very fertile. The soil is so heavy that we had a good deal of trouble plowing until we got rolling cullers.

"A few weeks ago Elliott and I visited the site of two villages about five miles away, which had the misfortune to be in No-man's land. Only two or three walls are standing now, nobody lives there, and there is not one building worth repairing. The farms around the villages are literally covered with barbed wire, furrowed with trenches, dotted with wooden crosses and naked tree stumps, and torn in bits by shell craters large and small, as thick as waves in a choppy sea. As far as one can see in any direction from the highest pile of bricks we could find, the trees which mark the surrounding villages are shattered and torn by shell fire, and jagged red brick walls show where houses formerly stood. It will be many, many years before the scars of war are removed from places like that."

(Home Address, Union, Ia.)

E. HOWARD MARSHALL.

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 113.)

I took a short stroll, after missing the train First-day afternoon, to decide whether to return by the morning train—expecting surely my quina-bark had arrived—or to wait till the afternoon. Again it seemed a waste of opportunity to return in the A. M., so I returned expecting to send a telegram. But everything was tight closed about the station, and the next morning, fully planning to return that afternoon, I sent none.

I had a splendid early start Second-day, for in spite of all my efforts to explain my desires for the day, they at the hotel had me up and breakfast over in time to have caught the 6.30 A. M. train.

It seemed as if my luck for Scrophulariaceae required my missing that second day's (First-day's) train. I had before found but one new species; I was to get four more, one on the short stroll just recounted. That was only the larger blue toad-flax, butter-and-eggs, Linaria taxana. I suspect here introduced, but interesting as being my first specimen seen from Colombia of a plant occurring from Carolina and California to Argentina.

The Birtchets had left for me to bring by train the knapsack in which was a considerable residue of Seventh-day's lunch. This gave me ample for First-day. But for Second-day I was reduced to starvation rations, one banana, unexpectedly discovered, black and very soft, a few stale rolls, and about three squares of a soft sweet guava dulce of which I'm not fond. This again I had the luck to piece out with strawberries.

Over the hills I tramped in a different direction, due west, to a second mountain range about four miles off. In Scrophulariaceae three new finds, another Castilleja, my tenth, another Bartsia, my ninth, and high on the mountain my second Sibthorpia, a genus of which I had seen no specimens from Colombia, nor had any record before coming here. This grew at the upper end of a clearing in the forest, and past that point I could find no trail to go. To enter a mountain-forest without a trail is nearly impossible. The upper portion only of the mountain was forest-covered, and when I had reached this height of course I was in the cloud. Across the clearing I heard sounds, and making that way through the drifting mist, I found a lumberman. Of him I asked if there was a trail. To my surprise he promptly took me a rough way up, cutting the way with his machete. It was a rough path to have followed barefoot.

The forest appeared the wettest I had yet seen and must be almost constantly in cloud. Mosses were the main growth; ferns were many, and on the trees Bromeliads by the hundred. I should have liked a picture, but the mist made this difficult. At the summit we came out to an open ledge, deeply moss-covered, and from there he assured me of the great extent of the view. Again I had but to believe, the mountain ahead seemed suddenly to fall into a sea of fog.

Feeling in my pockets I found my only small change to be five cents. This I felt was not sufficient reward, but one dollar would have been far too much. So I did what pleased him I think more than anything else I could have done. I took his picture, or rather his family's picture, himself, wife and two little girls, and promised to send him a copy. I was glad to get the group. I took his name, but now am much concerned to find that the sheet of paper on which I thought I had it is blank. I want to get it to him, but how is a problem. I left a standing invitation to bring me orchids, ten cents for larger, five cents for smaller kinds, and I am hoping he'll appear here. He took my address as if he intended to.

The orchids in the forest are beautiful, some as fine as I have ever seen, and even when dull, always interesting. I brought back quite a collection from Sibate, which I wish to send to New York. And I but touched the edge of the forest.

I took care (as on the previous day) to reach the hotel in abundant time. There they had a great time telling me about a train wreck and that there would be no train from Sibate that night. But this I scarcely believed, suspecting (to use the slang expression for which I know no other single word) that they were "kidding" me. There had naturally been considerable interest and speculation as to when I was going to catch a train from Sibate.

I had by this time so many plants that my press with its usual straps would not hold them. I had to get string and make a hasty tie. Then there was Birtchet's knapsack, filled with the camera and some other things. I put on my back, slung my camera over my back, too, and grabbing the plant press, with both hands, hurried across to the station. Perfectly correct, a wreck, and no train from Sibate; the train would start on schedule time from La Union, the next station about two miles down, but put my things on a hand-car, which I did, and two Colombians took me rapidly down to the wreck, a mile or more away. The wreck did not appear very serious, track all right, just one car damaged; it in position, but lacking one truck with its accompanying wheels. There were several passenger coaches just beyond and these I took, of course, for the train, but was motioned on; then told to put my things on a hand-truck. This I did, with perfect faith that this was going to take me on the half-mile or more further to where I could see the train standing at La Union station. Soon I discovered this truck did not go, and felt in despair about my load, the press being poorly tied. The man in charge kindly put it and Birtchet's knapsack in a freight car, locked them in securely and promised their delivery in Bogota. Then on the run, with just my camera, I started for the station.

(To be continued.)

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

(Continued from page 413.)

After being some time in the vicinity of New Garden, North Carolina, Amos Lee, finding his mind released from further prosecution of the journey, it was his judgment, that it would be best for him to return homeward; but being closely united in the bonds of gospel fellowship, and in that inward endearment which, through the love of Christ, connects the real members of his church, it was no easy matter for them to part. Yet seeing it necessary, with the tenderest desires for their mutual preservation, resigning each other into the hand of Him, who in great condescension, had hitherto preserved them in much tribulation, they separated. Abel, after this, not feeling easy to omit making a further essay towards the fulfilment of his prospects of religious duty, proceeded to South Carolina, where the trials of faith, and the remarkable deliverances vouchsafed to him, in this perilous travel, are in some degree set forth in the following relation.

"In a thankful sense of preservation by a strong arm through many dangers and deep conflicts, both within and without, which I met with in my journey through South Carolina and Georgia, do I write these lines, in order to encourage the weak, the poor afflicted people of God, to trust in his powerful arm, which doth work salvation and deliverance, by bringing strange and unexpected things to pass. He is greatly to be feared, and loved, and adored, by his afflicted children. They who know him, and do their endeavor not only to know but to obey, have no reason to distrust his care and great power to preserve, not only from being taken by the secret and subtle invasions of satan, but also out of the hands of bloody and unreasonable men. These things I have experienced in the great deeps, and do certainly know that the Lord's arm is not shortened that it cannot save, nor is his ear heavy that it cannot hear. When I consider my own weakness and inability as a man, and as a servant engaged in so great a work, and also the grievous besetments and terrifying storms in which the subtle serpent arose against me, my mind is humbled; well knowing who preserved me in the depth of distress, when my soul was taken with fear, and my body almost given to the wild beasts of the wilderness; then the language of my soul was, make haste, my beloved, for I am almost overwhelmed. I will make known to my brethren his wonderful works, and relate to them my travails and the exercise of my mind, and give the praise to the great God of power through his dear Son Jesus Christ who is worthy forever.

"When we came near South Carolina, we were told that the country was all in an uproar. Scouting parties from both sides were riding to and fro, killing one another, and also peaceable men whom they found traveling, except they knew them to be on their side: and that they had determined to take no prisoners, which we found to be in a great measure true. When I heard this sorrowful news, it took deep hold of my mind; for I had entertained a thought that I should die in that country, and as times were, I thought I should not die a natural death, but that I should be barbarously cut down by the light-horse. I searched deeply to know whether my concern was right, and my Master was pleased to manifest to me, that it was his will I should go forward. We travelled on, visiting meetings, and generally alone, inquiring the road. Friends were fearful. They were advised by the most moderate persons in power, to stay on their farms, except going to their particular meetings. We met with none of these cruel men, although we could hear of them almost every day, until we got within ten miles of the British garrison at Ninety-six. We then approached a large scouting party upon a hill. We could see them afar off, and when we came up to them, we found they were much afraid. We showed the major our certificates, and asked him if we might go forward. He said he would not hinder us, if we would venture our lives; for the rebels, (as they called them,) had got between them and their garrison, and were killing all before them. I told him that I did not trust altogether to man for preservation. We rode on, but had not gone far, until he and a negro came riding after us. He ordered his negro to ride on some distance before, and if he saw any man, to ride back and tell him. The major rode in between me and my companion. I felt uneasy in my mind while he rode there, and we endeavored to shun his company, but could not. His negro wheeled round his horse, and hallooed to his master, 'rebels! rebels!' The major stopped, and turned about to run; then calling to his man, asked, 'How many?' He answered, 'two.' He wheeled back again, and out with his pistols, and rode furiously towards them; but found they were his own men.

"We travelled on, lay in the woods not far from the garrison, and next morning passing through the town, were detained some time by the picket guard. Being conducted to the head officer, he appeared kind to us, and invited us to breakfast with them. I acknowledged their kindness, but told them I desired not to be detained then, for I expected to be called to an account for passing through that place. They, with sorrow, signified they would not detain us to our hurt; and we were told a few hours afterwards, that General Greene surrounded the garrison. We visited the meetings on towards Georgia, and were told, it was as much as our lives were worth to go over Savannah river; that the Indians and white people were joined together in their bloody designs. We had been so remarkably preserved hitherto, that we did not much fear them: rode the river in great danger, the water being so rapid, and the bottom so rocky, that I never rode in such a dismal place before. It was well we had a pilot who led us amongst the rocks; for I thought if our horses had stumbled, they must have been washed away by the rapidity of the stream; but we got over safe, and travelled on towards the settlement of Friends. While riding a small path in the wilderness, two men overtook us, and in a furious manner, with great rage, ordered us to stand, and with terrifying language were raising their guns to shoot us. I desired them to stop a little while, that we might clear ourselves of those high charges. They gave us a little time, but soon broke out in terrible rage, with blasphemous language, and one of them was cocking his gun. I desired them to have a little patience; I had something to say; and so we remained for about ten minutes. Then they turned round to consult between themselves privately. I heard one of them ask, if they should kill us; the other answered, 'I hate to kill them;' and after some more private discourse, turned to us, and ordered us off our horses; they got on ours, led their own, and so rode off.

(To be continued.)

A PROPOSITION FOR AN ANNUAL FRIENDS' MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

The Conference of the Foreign Mission Boards of all the Protestant Churches of North America, established a quarter of a century ago, and since regularly held, has become one of the most important annual events of the Christian world. No similar congress exists in Europe. The magnitude of the interests represented, the vast importance of the objects to be promoted, the hearty co-operation of the representatives of so many separate denominations, the delightful manifestation of unity and brotherly regard, the atmosphere of devotion and prayerful consecration, and over it all the consciousness of the presence and guidance of the Holy Spirit unite to make these annual gatherings notable occasions of blessing and profit, thankfully appreciated by those who attend them and efficacious in promoting the work of missions throughout the world.

The Conference held at Garden City, near New York, First Month 15th to 17th, was no exception to the rule and was a highly favored gathering. Among those who attended it were twelve or more representatives of nearly all the Foreign Mission organizations among Friends. These met in two sittings for consultation with a desire to further the work of our branch of Christ's Church.

Gilbert Bowles expressed an earnest concern that the missionary activities of Friends might be better known by our membership, that our mission fields might be better understood, that more concerted action might be taken to promote their interests and that more members of our several Boards might participate in the spiritual uplift, the broader vision and the efficient zeal which is experienced by those who attend the National Conference, made international by the inclusion of Canada.

After careful consideration it was concluded to invite the Friends of Canada and the United States who are interested in foreign missions to attend a volunteer conference to be held in the city of New York following the General Mission Conference next year for the purpose of better understanding each other and our work, and for taking such action as way may open for.

It was further concluded that much good might be accomplished by the appointment of a committee to carry on, through the year, a correspondence in the missionary interest with special reference to the Missionary Volunteer Movement, Missionary Education and the like. And to visit various localities at home where it may be found desirable. Gilbert Bowles, Charlotte Vickers, Charles M. Woodman, Ross Hadley and Willis Beede were appointed as such Committee with instruction to prepare a program for the proposed conference as they may find it advisable. The favorable consideration of Friends is invited to these undertakings.

JAMES WOOD,
Chairman.

Mr. Kisco, N. Y., First Month 20, 1918

NEWS ITEMS.

THE daily per capita cost of food at Cheyney for First Month was slightly in excess of twenty-two cents. This figure includes cost of fuel and all paid labor. Some labor, of course, is furnished by the student body as one item of their payment for board and tuition. Considering the high cost of all food and fuel this achievement is little less than phenomenal and should merit a response in liberal contributions to the work.

WE are especially grateful for home letters from our young men abroad. Were the letters written especially for THE FRIEND, they would probably be much more conventional. That they are intended by the writer for the home circle and a few close friends is explanation enough for the frequent references, in lighter vein, to the recreation side of life. We know full well that the boys are abroad for work of no trifling character, and we need often in these home letters to supply what could be written; the statistical parts of H. W. E.'s letter [in next number] will be of especial interest to our former readers.—Eds.

THE following is from our friend Daniel Oliver:

RAS EL METS, Eleventh Month 17, 1917.

I have not heard from you in a long time (I received) was written on Third Month 3rd. How I long and pray for peace! You will be glad to know that I am in very fine health, I can say perfect health. Everyone is kind to me and life flows on in the old channel for me.

My student friend left me at the opening of college; he was a real son to me and helped me in many ways and, of course, I miss him very much, but life is full of changes, it seems one long continuous change, and so we have to adapt ourselves to the changes as they come. My work keeps me busy all day, and in the long evenings I manage to read by a little olive oil lamp, and when my eyes get tired I go outside and walk up and down the courtyard for two or three hours and do my thinking that way. I never get to the end of my problems—life is all serious, indeed one long continuous effort to rise to the occasion and wisely carry the cares and responsibilities that each day brings. God is an ever-present help, His guidance and help are unfailing.

The cold weather has come suddenly with torrents of rain; both are very reasonable and all the farmers are rejoicing because they can sow their wheat and barley.

DANIEL OLIVER.

FRIENDS' SERVICE NOTES.—The variety of business that passes through our office may be of interest to Friends. The writer in one day signed eight requisitions upon our purchasing agent for the following: 1000 blankets; 2 cogs of nails; 50 packing cases; 12 rolls water-proof packing paper; 10,000 Friends' Service Buttons; one 3-ton motor truck; an assortment of drugs; 6 storage batteries for surgical apparatus.

The Mennonites through one of their treasurers have just sent us a check for $4000, for our war relief work. Only one of their men is on our Unit; their young men have been suffering more than ours in military camps, and this ready response to the needs of the world may be of wholesome inspiration to many Friends.

Friends' Maternity Hospital at Chalons-sur-Marne has received the following high tribute from Dr. J. Morris Slemmons of the American Red Cross:

"On September 4th and 5th I had the opportunity to visit the Maternity Hospital at Chalons-sur-Marne, conducted by the Society of Friends, and also to observe their work at Sernaize and Bettancourt. A distinctive feature of all this work is the ease with which it is carried on; the spirit of co-operation is dominant, and as a result all their efforts go smoothly. It is also noteworthy that the Friends have gained the confidence of the French, and therefore are in a peculiar position to render needed assistance.

"Thus far, the Maternity Hospital has treated approximately 500 confinements, and patients are now being admitted at the rate of 200 a year. The medical results which have been obtained are of a very high order. There has been but one maternal death in the course of three years. The infant mortality has been less than five per cent.—a figure as good as that obtained in any institution with which I am familiar. In point of fact, the infant mortality in American institutions of the highest order, as, for example, the Sloane Maternity, is seven per cent. It is also pertinent to remark that the infant mortality in the large clinics of Paris is, roundly, fourteen per cent."

Between Seventh Month, 1917, and Second Month, 1918, we spent $10,771.23 more than we received. We have been able to make large plans for the future only because of the balance built up last Sixth and Seventh Months before the work had developed. There is a very serious need for an immediate large increase of monthly receipts to cover the increasing rate of monthly expenditures.

THE RED CROSS CABLES FOR MORE FRIENDS—WILL YOU BE ONE?—As I was preparing our copy for this issue of THE FRIEND the following cable came to my desk and I pass it on to readers of THE FRIEND:

"One of the most serious limitations of Civil Affairs Work here is lack of labor for repairing, altering and equipping institutions; putting grounds in order; and doing provisional building and repairs on houses and barns in devastated area. Additional Friends will help. Signed Homer Folks."

Homer Folks is Director of the Department of Civil Affairs of which the Friends' Unit is a Bureau. The above cable is the latest word we have from him. His first acquaintance with the American Friends' Unit was at a meeting in Paris attended by representatives of the Red Cross and of English Friends just after the arrival of our first large group of men.

If you are hesitating about volunteering and wondering about the real value of the opportunity awaiting you in France read these words with which Homer Folks greeted our first Unit:

"The Red Cross looks on the Society of Friends as in a sense its expert leaders. There is no group of people from whom we have already learned so much or from whom we expect to learn so much as the Friends.

"This is the most tremendously fascinating, stimulating, developing opportunity human beings were ever called on to meet, and it can be met only in a simple-minded human way."

Read also the greeting of T. Edmund Harvey, member of the British Parliament, and head of the English Friends' Expedition in France,—a greeting which should be repeated to every additional volunteer to our work:

"We have been looking forward to this influx of new life and to the Red Cross making it possible for you to work along with us, with their guidance and help.

"The Red Cross's splendid motto, Inter Arma Caritas, stands for the constructive element, building up, conserving, re-creating, in the midst of war. It is a great thing to try to live up to that motto every day. By the very nature of the trust imposed upon us, we cannot speak as we might in times of peace of some aspects of our faith, but we can in our work demonstrate some aspects of Humanity and Brotherhood, lessen a little the terrible bitterness of war, and bring something of the spirit of comradeship and love into lives harassed and battered by the wrong that has been done. We have tried to make the ideals of service real in our work. We are all comrades and brothers working together. very democratically organized, ready—even men used to positions of responsibility—to accept in the spirit of comradeship, humble duties elsewhere called mental and lowly, but which have, rightly seen, a Divine meaning.

"You will carry with you the honor of the Quaker name and of the American Red Cross, and you will go as representatives of America into districts where no American has ever been before. You will go as representatives of a vision of a way of life. I am sure that you will every one be worthy of the call that comes to you from the need of France and the need of humanity." VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

EDWARD KELSEY and wife, Alice Whittier Jones and Rosa Lee were recently in Philadelphia. It is understood that they are on the way to Syria as members of a Red Cross Unit for relief work in those parts.

TO THE MEMBERS OF HADDFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING:

Dear Friends:—At our meeting in Medford last Ninth Month an earnest concern arose that the sessions of our Quarterly Meeting should be so held that the matters of most vital importance might receive the attention they demand, and that the greatest possible number of our members might be regularly present.

A committee was, therefore, appointed, who very carefully considered this subject, and reported to the meeting in the Twelfth Month a number of suggestions for simplifying the conduct of purely routine business, and also proposed that we try for one year having our meetings convene promptly at 2 P. M., with the usual meeting for worship, followed by the business meeting in joint session, and supper at its conclusion. This report was adopted by the Quarterly Meeting.

The Quarterly Meetings in 1918 will, therefore, be held as follows: Third Month 14th, 2 P. M., at Haddonfield, Sixth Month 13th, 2 P. M., at Moorestown, Ninth Month 12th, 2 P. M., at Medford, Twelfth Month 12th, 2 P. M., at Moorestown.

Any Friends who cannot arrange for their own transportation, and any who can offer conveyance for others, may communicate with the one nearest to them among the following Friends, who are appointed to attend to transportation for the Quarterly Meeting: Alexander C. Wood, Joshua S. Wills, Walter J. Buzby, Maurice B. Comfort, Clayton Wistar, Ezra Evans, A. Ernest Nicholson.

It will be evident that the change of hour is made for the benefit of those of our members who have not been able to attend the Quarterly Meetings, whose help and interest are much desired. The attention of such, especially of young business men, is particularly called to this new plan.

This is a time, when as followers of Christ, we need to draw together for each other's help, and waiting upon God, to be ready, as groups and as individuals, for any call that may come to us to serve or to suffer for His Kingdom among men. Let us, therefore, every one of us, make a special effort to attend our Quarterly Meetings, realizing that as we go in a spirit of loyalty, humility, and love, even the least member may definitely contribute towards the building up of the body of Christ.

By direction of the Quarterly Meeting,

JOHN HUTCHINSON,
WILLIAM E. RIBBADS,
EMMA CADBURY, JR.

CONFERENCE AT WOOLMAN SCHOOL, SWARTHMORE, PA.—The Week-end Conference of Second Month 22-24, was well attended. One hundred and fifty-six people registered. By dint of cheerful "doubting up," on the part of the present Woolman family of sixteen, seven guests were lodged at the School, while more took meals in the dining-room, and seventeen were entertained in Swarthmore homes.

Aside from local attendance, both branches of Friends were about equally represented.

The general subjects for the six sessions were: "The Relation of Foreign Missionary Work to World Peace, and Its Challenge to Friends;" and "The Meeting for Worship: (1) as a means of spiritual strength to ourselves; (2) as a means of helping others," which were seriously and variously developed.

The highwater mark of the Conference was reached in the addresses of Gilbert Bowdes, of Tokio, Japan, who showed himself well fitted by his knowledge of the history and significance of missions, and by his consecrated service in the field, to present the former topic; and of Rufus M. Jones, whose address, "Unsuspected Sources of Spiritual Power," on Seventh-day morning, sounded depths of spiritual life that gave up treasure of thought throughout the sessions following.

A noteworthy feature of the Conference was the leading part in the discussions which was taken by a group of young people, who do not usually take the leading part in such gatherings, and who showed unsuspected ability and interest in the discussions. The programs were purposely arranged to avoid overcrowding and to allow plenty of time between sessions for getting acquainted.

There were Friends present from points of the earth as distant as Japan, New Zealand and England, and common purposes led to conscious fellowship and a widening and deepening of outlook and purpose in the social, intellectual and spiritual communing of the Friends who attended.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, FOR WEEK ENDING THIRD MONTH 2, 1918.

Received from 23 meetings.....	$6,532.56
Received from 11 individuals.....	497.00
Received for Armenian and Syrian Relief.....	36.00
	$7,065.56

CHARLES F. JENKINS,

NOTICES.

A MEETING of the Council of Westtown Mothers will be held at Friends' Institute, Philadelphia, on Third-day, Third Month 12, at 2:30 o'clock. Dr. Rachel Williams will address the meeting.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia (Penna. R. R.), at 6:21, 8:21 A. M., and 2:45, 3:35, 4:55 P. M., other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE TO YOUNG FRIENDS.—Important meeting the Seventh-day afternoon and evening before Yearly Meeting, Third Month 23, 1918. Watch for notice of program and place. All who wish accommodations for Seventh-day night and all living in or near Philadelphia who will take guests for the night, write to Edith Stratton, 20 S. Twelfth Street.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING CONFERENCE ON "THE MINISTRY."—At Media Meeting-house, Third Month 17, 1918, at 2:30 P. M. PROGRAM.

Devotional Silence—Introductory Remarks.

- 1.—Living Silence in Worship, by Wilbur W. Kamp.
- 2.—The Resulting Ministry, by William C. James.
- 3.—A Symposium of Group Discussions, by Edith Stratton.
- 4.—An Address—The Ministry, by Rufus M. Jones.
- 5.—Devotional Period, 20-30 Minutes.

Adjournment.

We earnestly desire the attendance of all interested Friends.

THE FRIENDS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION will hold a meeting at Friends' Select School, at 2:30 P. M., Third Month 9th. After a brief business session there will be a presentation of a series of motion pictures, entitled, "How Life Begins," showing how new plants and animals come into existence. They begin with one cell plants and animals, picture various forms of lower and higher plant life and then the sea-urchin, butterfly, frog, chick and rat.

These pictures were shown at a recent meeting of the National Education Association and created a very favorable impression. They were also very well received lately at Lansdowne. Dr. Rachel Williams will make introductory remarks. Parents and teachers are cordially invited.

CAROLINE L. NICHOLSON,
Secretary.

DEED.—At the home of his parents, Leonard and Ruthanna C. Winder, at Dunbar, Ohio, Second Month 1, 1918, JOHN J. WINDER, aged twenty-four years; a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting, Ohio.

FOUNDED 1865.
THE PROVIDENT
 LIFE AND TRUST COMPANY
 OF PHILADELPHIA

Have you thought of the need of additional Life Insurance to cover Inheritance Taxes?

Write for Information

Fourth and Chestnut Streets

H. F. BRUNER S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.
COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
 PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: LOCUST 241
 RACE 661

Established 1870 Both Phones

Frank W. Taylor & Son

*Roofers in Tin, Tile, Slate,
 Copper and Slag,
 Manufacturers of Ranges
 and Furnaces*

FURNACES, RANGES & HOT WATER SYSTEMS
 installed and cared for by expert mechanics

259 S. FOURTH ST., PHILADELPHIA

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
 Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

ALBERT C. RIDLEY
 1714 SANSON STREET

Engraving and Printing
 FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY

Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting
 Cards. Die Stamped Writing Paper.
TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor
 ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2066.

Assoc. M. AM. Soc. C. E.

Bell 'Phone—Lombard 3412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
 prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. PHILA.

WINTER SPORTS

AT

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

Make reservations early for week-end parties.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager

(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for Spring Term, 1918:

"The Teaching of Jesus, History of the Hebrew People, and History of Friends," by Elbert Russell.

"An Introduction to Social Work," Frank D. Watson, of Haverford College.

"History of Religion," Jesse H. Holmes, of Swarthmore College.

"History of Foreign Missions," Elihu Grant, of Haverford College.

"Principles of Religious Education," Charles H. Fisher, of Pennsylvania State Normal School, Westchester.

Spring Term, Fourth Month 1 to Sixth Month 8, 1918.

Send Applications for information or for admission to

ELBERT RUSSELL, Director,
 WOOLMAN SCHOOL
 SWARTHMORE, PA.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

*Special Attention Given to Funerals
 In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
 Accommodations for Funerals.*

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire whole grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends, Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHLER

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10:30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only.
 Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1840. BELL 'PHONE

THE ESTAUGH
HADDONFIELD,

NEW JERSEY

Two vacancies—apply to

ANNA EASTBURN WILLITS, Haddonfield, N. J.

THE HOLMES PRESS

Printers

J. L. Engle, Pres.

1336-40 CHERRY ST. PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. COR. 16TH AND RACE STREETS

Special Attention given to Friends' Funerals

BELL 'PHONE SPRUCE 1648

APPLE BUTTER

WE STILL have a few dozen two quart Jars only, at 75 cents per Jar, by Parcel Post or Express in packages to suit orders. Send orders promptly, while they last. Past favors appreciated.

ELWOOD BALDERSTON,
 COLORA, CECIL CO. MARYLAND

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER and GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED

JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
 ESTIMATES

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest herd in biggest Shetland producing county in United States
 Established 1883

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
 Importers and Breeders

THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION OF Friends, of Philadelphia, needs a young woman teacher for the Girls' School, Tokyo, Japan, also a man, and wife to work among the young men and students from the Japanese Universities. Any who feel a call to either of these positions will please communicate with

ELLEN W. LONGSTRETH,

Chairman Candidates' Committee.

Penn St., Bryn Mair, Pa., Second Month 21, 1918.

FOR RENT—EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED Cottage, bath, open plumbing hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several meals daily, half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are one or more invalids in family. Meals must be taken at Maplewood.

Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES,

JANESBORO, R. I.

WANTED—IN MEDIA, PA. BEFORE THIRD Month 15th: three rooms, furnished or unfurnished, with board for three adults; give location, terms and size of family. References exchanged.

Address T. S. B., "THE FRIEND," 207 Walnut Place, Philadelphia.

JANSDOWNE FRIENDS' SCHOOL WILL NEED for the academic year 1918-1919 a teacher for the sixth and seventh grades. Experience in these grades is required. Application may be made to the Principal, ELEANOR S. ECHOYD, Lansdowne, Pa.

FOR RENT FROM SIXTH MONTH 1 TO NINTH Month 30, 1918, furnished home on Haverford College campus. Nine rooms, two baths, garage.

R. W. KELSEY, HAVERFORD, PA.

IT SAVES STOPS

TWO-THIRDS of the output lost by breakdowns is frequently saved by Tannate Belt. And two-thirds of the overhead charges and two-thirds of the idle wages and repairs. Tannate is so tough. And its flexibility and cling favor easy drives and save take-ups.

Live concerns from Maine to Australia are keeping down stoppage with Tannate.

A parcel post order proves its advantages.

J. E. RHOADS & SONS

PHILADELPHIA: 12 N THIRD ST.
NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.
FACTORY AND TANNERY. WILMINGTON, DEL.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of

RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL

will need for the academic year 1918-1919 an assistant secretary, familiar with bookkeeping and general office work, who will have some duties in supervising study rooms; and also an assistant in the Primary Department.

For this last position a teacher of some experience is needed. The duties will include assisting in the third year work; supervising writing; helping on the playground; and if possible conducting simple classes in sloyd and other hand work, and coaching irregular pupils.

Application should be made to

STANLEY R. YARNALL, Principal
Germantown Friends' School
Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY

MANUFACTURERS

PHILADELPHIA

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 40 years. Medical 13

Safety and Yield In Investments

MANY short-term notes of ample security offer, at present prices, an unusually liberal yield.

Well-known issues of such securities can now be bought at prices to yield from 5.60% to well above 7%.

Send for Circular PF-156

The National City Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.,
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

A COMPLETE LINE OF

NURSERY STOCK

FRUIT TREES,
ORNAMENTAL TREES,
SHRUBS,
SMALL FRUITS,
ROSES,
CLEMATIS,
HEDGE PLANTS.

The Rakestraw-Pyle Company
KENNETT SQUARE, PA.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 14, 1918.

No. 37.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"My prison shall be my grave before I will budge a jot; for I owe my conscience to no mortal man. I have no need for fear. God will make amends for all."

—William Penn, in the Tower of London, 1668.

HEAVEN.

If God hath made this world so fair,
Where sin and death abound,
How wonderful beyond compare
Will Paradise be found.

—J. MONTGOMERY.

Sometimes when the tired city worker at eventide leaves busy shop or mill there flares across the western sky the glowing splendors of the setting sun. The dull and noisy street is for the moment bathed in beauty. As his eye penetrates the translucent atmosphere, his thoughts are lifted above the things of earth and he involuntarily thinks of what is beyond. Do those mystic colors suggest the glories of heaven with its triumph and joy? Does God thus beckon to the eternal things?

Where is heaven? Is it behind the great stars, millions of miles distant, which never seem so near as when they smile upon the traveler in the tropic night? Is it closer to this planet than we are aware, invisible, resplendent, eternal? These things we can not tell. We know that we may have a foretaste of heaven on earth if we desire it. Obedience to God and heart-true faith in the integrity of His dealings with us will bring it within our grasp. Out of present Christian experience we may argue that the wondrous vision John saw assures us of a perfect felicity hereafter. We are persuaded there remains a deathless and splendid refuge for the righteous in the ages to come. Heaven may be nearer to some of us than we realize to-day.

When does heaven commence? Is it not in this present life when there is an outreach of soul after God? Is it not when once cold hearts have been suffused with a new appreciation of Divine pardon and love? Is it not when we have resolved to make Christ our comrade even unto death?

Can we even dream of the grandeur of the beautiful city?

We are told that it lies four-square. The foundations of its walls are garnished with precious stones. The twelve gates are of twelve pearls, and are never shut. There is the brilliant sea as of glass, mingled with fire. There are the streets of gold. The river of the Water of Life, clear as crystal, ever proceeds from beneath the Throne. This amazing city needs neither moon nor sun to lighten it. Midday or sunset splendor can not compete with the celestial abode. The glory of God lightens it and the Lamb is the light thereof.

There is no earthly nationalism in the country of the blessed, neither is any statement of belief required. I think it was William Penn who said, "There is but one creed in heaven: to love the Lord and to do His will."

There is no more curse in heaven. The redeemed of the Lord are there. The service at God's altar is magnificent beyond human concept, the anthems of the heavenly choir ascend in endless praises to the immortal King. The sweetest and most alluring promise associated with heaven is that granted to the tired children of their Father—it is this:

God shall wipe away every tear from their eyes,
And death shall be no more;
Neither shall there be mourning, nor crying,
Nor pain any more;
The first things are passed away.

Who does not want to strive after heaven? Is it not worth all the allegiance we can pledge to God? Shall we not be willing to bear Christ's cross that we may wear His crown? Shall we not joyously step out upon any rugged path He designates because it leads to the beautiful gates and the great white throne? Shall we not be glad because the valley of the shadow of death becomes less sombre as we think of the now unseen glory yet to be?

SAN JOSE, California.

W. C. A.

YEARLY MEETING IN PROSPECT.

"NEW VENTURES OF FAITH."

The main caption of this article had barely taken its place in line for this number of THE FRIEND, when it was supplemented by the sub-caption, "New Ventures of Faith."

This is the title of a little book from the Association Press, 124 E. Twenty-eighth Street, New York, kindly sent to us by a Friend. Some one has said, "The fact that good men are troubled in the present extremity contains the hope of the world." This little book, and another like it recently at hand, are amongst the signs that "good men" in their trouble are turning to the only resources that contain a ray of hope for the wide-spread darkness of the world malady. This is further defined on the title page of the book in the expression, "Suggestions for greater achievements through prayer." The book itself may be called a guide to meditation as well as a call to prayer. The two threads of what is sometimes called "the prayer life" are interwoven in its pages. The "vital communion with God" is given the paramount place. It is assumed that this is best sustained by a definite program of days and subjects for meditation and for prayer. Many Friends might find themselves hampered by the very elaboration of the plan. Let our difference of judgment in this matter be what it may, we can unite upon the necessity of devoting enough time "in actual communion with God to become really conscious of our absolute dependence upon Him." Thus shall we "change the mere energy of the flesh for the power of God." This part of the program seems to come as a challenge for the service of a prospective Yearly Meeting. Shall we be able through its sessions to "change the mere energy of the flesh" into "the power of God"?

F. P. D. O. 2

There are two very common points of view to take of a Yearly Meeting. One hears the question passed from lip to lip as the date approaches: "Will the Yearly Meeting do any unusual things this year?" Those who think in such terms are regarding the executive functions of the Meeting as paramount. They are in line with the present world movement for centralization of power through which by some alchemy it is expected to make democracy universal! In religious affairs this centralization of power in a hierarchy and even in a man is centuries old. Our inherited organization, by which Monthly or Preparative Meetings have a very wide scope of function should be a sufficient safeguard against any hierarchal tendency although some have professed a fear to the contrary. The pertinent question is whether the large body can develop greater efficiency than the smaller units, or than voluntary organizations in carrying out religious, educational or philanthropic work. Both the large and the small units work through committees. Our Yearly Meeting has latterly added two new standing committees to its organization. Do we then find the greatest efficiency in Yearly or Monthly Meeting committees? Most of us would hesitate to pronounce judgment in this matter. Other elements than that of efficiency would have to be weighed. Advantage and disadvantage seem pretty well distributed in our system between the functioning of large bodies and small. In general, however, is it not true that the large body in action makes it difficult to fix responsibility, to command initiative or to make the interest general? The individual member gets lost in the mass and shifts the responsibility to a somewhat intangible burden-bearer. Perhaps each feels discharged upon paying a fair share of the bills. We greatly hope the approaching Yearly Meeting will rise to its privileges of service under Divine leading, but we are glad to be reminded also that its highest function may be to lead us to the place of worship, "where the mere energy of the flesh" may be changed "for the power of God."

This function of service through united worship has been greatly emphasized in many notable gatherings other than those of our Society in modern times. The best known instance is that of the world missionary conference in Edinburgh a few years since, where the waiting upon God was a dominant feature. J. J. Mills told the last Five Years' Meeting that he had just come from a great religious conference in St. Louis, where the congregation had been bowed together in silence upon one occasion as long as twenty minutes, under the weight of the need of a revelation of God's power. In Robert Barclay's time this "power in the silent assemblies" was our distinct characteristic as a people. If ever in our history we needed to cultivate that inwardness of spirit thus expressed in power, the time is now. We should surely lament to see any right effort for service thwarted, but we can hardly believe that in the face of a heart-broken world we shall forget "the secret place of the Most High." We may do greater things by waiting upon God than by any form of activity.

J. H. B.

THE EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

Hardly anything that costs the subordinate meetings time and energy in the routine business of Yearly Meeting receives less attention from that body than the statistical reports on education. The assumption may be that the standing Committee on Education, and the Westtown Committee are to appropriate these statistics and to direct their policies to meet any special demands revealed by them. As a matter of fact does this actually occur? There seems reason to fear that the whole inquiry has come to be very largely a matter of form instead of a matter of life. Because we feel that there are vital considerations involved we are making a plea for a revival of interest in these "dry statistics."

Two points certainly are patent on the face of the reports. These may be two sides of one situation. First, Friends' schools in general are not multiplying and are not increasing very sensibly in public favor. Second, a very little research into the school history of Pennsylvania and New Jersey will disclose the fact that the original conception of Friends' schools represented a positive propaganda for "the truth as professed by Friends." Some of the records in Wickersham's History of Education seem almost amusing in face of the more modern reluctance to proselytize. More than one excited sectary of colonial times made frantic appeals to the mother country for support of their schools lest the Quakers should indoctrinate their children.

Historically this idea of Church schools for the propagation of religious tenets was monastic, and destined to failure in the face of a growing democracy. One wonders that the parochial school has survived so long. Friends failed with other denominations to make their schools training grounds for new members. Their failure, however, was not exactly the same kind of failure as others, and after more than one hundred years we have some schools left with a potency for public good that can not be gainsaid. It is a question possibly not unworthy of the consideration of the Yearly Meeting whether this fact does not conceal another,—whether there is not a way to create in these popular schools an atmosphere distinctly favorable to the growth of Quakerism. Undoubtedly in a degree such an atmosphere is created, but the telling point of method by which this could all be turned to good account for the Society has not yet been fully disclosed. Fear of a narrow denominationalism is general, but if we can conceive our Quakerism broadly enough we may be able to avoid this pitfall. If Quakerism is not to spread by a process of education, is it not a lost cause? Narrow denominationalism is not educative—the fundamentals of Christianity (primitive Christianity revived, if we choose to phrase it so) is the most educative force in the world.

The second consideration is specific and not general. Whether as suggested the two are different sides of the same situation may be judged differently from varying points of view. Relatively in the statistical reports the whole number of Friends' children not in our schools is very large. The public schools may not absorb the most of these, but this public school list we take it is a growing one. In some cases public school attendance is due to necessity—there is no Friends' school accessible. However, more frequently of late, one hears a defence of the relative merits of the public school system as compared with the Friends' system. Usually this defence is on two counts. First, the public school equipment, having large sums of State and local money behind it, surpasses anything we can provide. Second, the close articulation of the system with highly developed or developing departments of State Instruction gives the public schools a civic consciousness, and so a natural means of training in civic capacity beyond anything we have developed. The first of these points may seem quite insurmountable. When compared, however, with the right kind of teacher and the right moral atmosphere it is actually no very great advantage. The second item—that of civic quality and training, is one for which we may well strive. It was anticipated in William Penn's declaration that education is to train children for service in the State.

Without pursuing the subject into further detail there would seem to be ample reason for lining up the statistical reports, if we are to hear them at all, with the larger,—yes, with the very largest educational interests that claim the attention of the Yearly Meeting. With a very strong sense that there is little danger of exaggerating the importance of the whole subject, this is our plea.

J. H. B.

ALONE WITH GOD.

"And when He had sent the multitude away, he went up into a mountain, apart to pray; and when the evening was come, he was there alone." (Matt. xiv: 23.)

Alone the Master stood at eve,
Wearied and worn with all the toil
The closing day had brought. Thoughtful
Of His disciples, He dismissed them,
While He sent the multitudes away,
Whom He had taught so patiently
Through the long weary hours of day;
And mindful still of human needs
And limitations, blessed the food,
And gave it to the throng; unto
The hungry thousands who had come
And followed Him from day to day,
Hanging upon His words;—who, healed
Of their diseases, clung to Him
In thankfulness, unto the night!

It had been a strenuous day;
All the long list of human ills
Had been o'er-watched, and as He sent
The multitudes away, He felt
The infinite love and pity
Of His great heart pulsing through
The sentient arteries of life,
And leaving Him at close of day
Weary and worn, and needing rest;
And as the shadows lengthened out,
He sought the gloom and loneliness
Of the majestic mountains, there
To be alone with God!—to feel
And know God's sweet companionship,
To feel the rich and rare delight
Of close communion with the Father!

How oft He sought this intercourse
In the perplexing times of life,
When weariness prevailed, or when
The occult powers of darkness

Ruled the hour, and swept away
The barriers of sympathy
Which human love had built, or when
His friends would come and make Him king;—
In all momentous times, He sought
To be alone with God! To know Him
As His Counsellor and Friend! The Sweet remembrance of the happy hours
Spent thus allured to their return!
How sweet to thus renew their trust,
Father and Son! To feel again
The vital touch of oneness, in
The interminable purposes
Of Grace, and of redemption!
How the hours thus spent, renewed
His failing courage! How again
The "Angels ministered" to Him,
And from the gloom and darkness
Of Gethsemane arose
Glory undreamed of, saving
In the Omniscient mind of God,
Wherein the Gospel plans of life,
And of salvation had their birth,—
The glory of the Ages, and
The consummation of all love!
The crown of God's great Fatherhood,
And of our brotherhood in Christ!

If in this fellowship with God
Lies such a source of strength Divine,
And if to be alone with Him
Means so much added power for us,
Let us strive daily to be found,
As was our Christ, "Alone with God,"—
And, among the woods, or fields,
Or in the daily rounds of care
And toil, in city thoroughfares,
In field or factory, may we Still find avenues to Him,
Still daily be "Alone with God."

—JESSE EDGERTON.

DAMASCUS, Ohio, First Month, 1918.

TALK TO GIRLS AT WESTTOWN, SECOND MONTH 24, 1918.

ANNA MOORE CADBURY.

Who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, (Heb. xii: 2)
Whoever will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me. (Luke ix: 23)

I want to speak this evening about joys and crosses. Perhaps the subject of joy is more attractive than the other and we shall be glad to put the emphasis on it. A good deal has been said about crosses in our hymns and religious poems and sermons. Often the references have been to the supreme sacrifice of our Saviour, the wonder and love of which we cannot over-emphasize. But much of the allusion has also been to our own cross-bearing, and it is of that I wish to speak particularly just now. I used to wonder why so much was said about crosses, why there were so many to be carried on the Christian way, why we should have been asked by Jesus to carry one daily. It seemed such a dreary outlook to my youthful mind when I came face to face with it. And because I remember that early impression I have decided to talk about it to you.

We are quite used to the idea of crosses in other spheres of life—in our occupations and pleasures, but we call them by other names and often give them little thought. We are all perfectly familiar with the man who goes into football training. He takes up the burden of strenuous physical exercise every day and follows the strict orders of his coach. He denies himself any food or indulgence which does not make for the best physical condition. He keeps early hours even when strong attractions tempt him to break over the rule. In fact, for the joy of making himself fit to share in a great game and win for his team and his school, he endures daily self-denial or crosses.

You know men who think success or wealth or honor of men the highest joy and the great end of life and who make daily sacrifice to reach it. You have seen business men who go early and stay late and carry their business with them at night and on holidays, who haven't time for home life or friendship, who often sacrifice physical health and sometimes even character itself in the eager, anxious pursuit of so paltry a joy as business success. But they do not talk much of crosses.

You could think of many illustrations of men and women with noble and unselfish ideals who for the joy of a great discovery or invention or an unselfish purpose for their fellow-men have spent their lives. There have been scientists, explorers, philanthropists, preachers, missionaries, who for the joy that was set before them endured inconvenience, hardship, exposure, poverty, misunderstanding, persistent effort at great odds, seeming failure, even death—and have given little thought to the crosses because the joy was so strong in their hearts.

Columbus, for instance, fired by his great idea of finding a western route to India, spent years in study, wandered from Portugal to Genoa, to Venice, to Spain, begging for money to finance his great venture, was disappointed again and again through the seven long years he waited for Spain to help him, finally set sail in poorly equipped ships, met calmly and courageously the discontent and mutiny of his men, and bade them "sail on and on and on and on."

Do you suppose Dr. Grenfell spends much time thinking of crosses as he bears the bitter hardship of Labrador winters or works with little money and poor equipment and shuts himself off from association with men of his own kind? I'm thinking he is too much absorbed in his work for that.

Greatest of all examples is Jesus. "Whosoever will come after me let him deny himself"—it is no untried way He asks us to follow. In the days of His temptation in the wilderness, we believe there came to Him more fully than before a vision of the wealth and power which might be His if He would yield to the temptation of the selfish life and the glories of this world. In contrast with this came the vision of humanity's great need and of the Father's purpose to save the world through Him. He knew the choice He made then meant daily self-denial. He must meet loneliness, homeless wandering, misunderstanding of those he loved and trusted, daily discouragement, increasing bitterness and hatred from the nation he loved and had come to save. At last, with face steadfast toward Jerusalem, he went up to betrayal and denial by His own disciples, to spittings and revilings, ignominy and shame and the uttermost suffering of the cross—all this he met for the joy of fulfilling the Father's purpose, of showing us the Father and, being lifted up on the cross, of drawing all men unto Him by the force of His redeeming love. What were three years of even such self-sacrifice as His compared with such a joy.

In all great living then it is the joy of service that is uppermost, the crosses are lost to sight in the great end. Only when we are weak or wavering in purpose or lose sight of our vision do we turn our thoughts on our crosses and bewail the burden of them. Brave spirits translate crosses as duties, responsibilities, opportunities. Each duty and opportunity gladly and strongly met brings its own satisfaction and puts us one step further toward the realization of the final joy. You know the joy that comes from mastering a difficult problem in geometry or in successfully completing a long and difficult experiment in biology. You have gone out of your way to do a kindness to a new girl. You have gripped yourself hard and overcome the sudden anger or the temptation to cut some one with a sharp speech, you have worked over a difficult problem in self-government and helped to bring in a better condition, you have stood loyally by the school when you knew it was right even when you wanted to go contrary to the rules. And the reward came in your own heart's joy and strength. George Eliot says somewhere: "The greatest reward for doing right is the power to go forward to right action which is more difficult."

Gareth, in "The Idylls of the King," serves as a menial kitchen knave in order to win to service of the king. He dignifies the lowliest task by the spirit in which he does it, whistles "merry as any bird." When finally given the quest he asks, he ignores Sir Kay's rude contempt and Lynette's scorn and with the high adventure of youth joyously meets the first false knight, the Morning Star, then the stronger Noonday Sun, then the more dangerous Evening Star and last the grim and horrible figure of Night and overcomes them one by one, each time finding himself stronger to meet the next venture. So at last he gains his heart's desire to prove himself a knight worthy of King Arthur and his Round Table.

The bent of our whole life will depend on what joy we set before us and what our character shall be will depend on the choice we make now. We were recently discussing in our Bible Class the subject of the will and this thought was emphasized—that the decisions of each day or hour which go to make up our final result of character, are largely controlled by the guiding purpose we have for our lives. If we choose pleasure or self-indulgence or self-seeking as our aim, the little deeds and choices of to-day will be governed by that aim. If we seek unselfish service or strength or character or spiritual life, the seeming insignificant acts of our daily life will unconsciously pay into the high end we seek, till even our faces and figures will be stamped with the image of it. Our Father gives us difficult tasks because He knows that through them we grow strong. He asks high service of us because He knows the joy of overcoming. Out of His wisdom and love He would thus call out our best. The better athlete you are, the more you welcome the feat that puts your strength to the test.

I am very ambitious for you, girls, that you shall choose only the highest joys, that you shall not be satisfied with any but the finest purpose, that, like Gareth, you shall be willing to take any venture in the service of the King. I am ambitious for you not only for your own sakes, but for the good you can do. Each of us, whether we choose or not, is a little circle of influence, and if each of this group was striving to be her best for the sake of the whole, what an impulse upward it would give the school, and what a start for the future it would make.

We are living in very strange and wonderful times. "The old order changeth yielding place to new." The future is uncertain and full of grave possibilities for good and evil. None of us can tell what the next ten years may bring. The very foundations of our social world may be shaken, and it is certain that we can never go back to conditions as they were before this ghastly war.

You will be among the young women who will face whatever new conditions come and help to mould them into shape. One thing is sure—the need for Christian character and Christian leadership will be great beyond expression. God works His will through human lives and as Christian women you can fill a very high place, in some respects higher than men's. Some one has said that all civilization would have been lost through that period of European history known as the Dark Ages, if the women of the time had not conserved it. They lived quietly and inconspicuously guarded in their castles while their men went out to fight, but they kept the moral and spiritual forces alive. Women naturally love the home and hold and keep the influence that protects it and build it up, and, in the home, centre many of the highest moral and spiritual forces of our civilization, so you see why I said you could fill a high place. Women, too, are often quicker than men to see when laws or customs or social interests are good for social health and social uplift. It is a great opportunity to be a woman in these days, and I want you to feel the responsibility of leadership and the joy of trying to help the world out of its present blind struggle and desperate need. There will be so much reconstruction needed after this terrible war, whatever the outcome may be.

Certain ideals have come to us as part of our heritage which will be needed in this new social order, and you as women can be especially helpful in living them out. One of these is the ideal of simplicity. By this I do not mean a stiff or rigid form, but a fine instinct which sees the things that are worth while and holds to those because they are useful or beautiful or true. It is the kind of simplicity which makes culture. It hates luxury and show and excess and recoils from them as vulgar. It loves freedom of thought, beauty and spirituality. Stoughton Holborn told you something about it when he talked to you of living well-balanced lives with right proportion for beauty and thought and morality. Luxury is one of the corrupting influences in our modern life and one needs to be constantly on guard against it; for it is very easy for us, even with our inherited ideals, to slip into its temptations in these days of false standards. We need to measure by the standard of simplicity and culture and truth, our houses, our food, our dress, our furniture, our travel and vacations, our reading, and our social pleasures, and slough off the superfluous and ugly and untrue. It will be a worthy ideal for you to take into this new social order you must help to shape.

We surely need and shall continue to need, the sincerity and integrity of mind which go with this fine simplicity. Our lives will grow more simple when we come to seek first and love best those things which are pure and true. Especially in her social life can a woman be very helpful in setting standards of sincerity and honesty and truth. You can think of women who seem to purify the atmosphere when they come into a social group.

To women is given the gift of hospitality and of the helping hand. I do not mean by hospitality, merely the entertaining of guests in one's own home, fine as that may be, but the reaching out of warm sympathy and personal service wherever she may find the need and there will be need for all her home instinct of love and protection and tender ministrations in the world's great sorrow and suffering. May our sense of hospitality reach out with wide arms to the world's distress and may we do what is in our power to help and uplift.

We have been taught that all men are equal before God and many Friends have been ready to meet and help all classes and nationalities. We believe in democracy and brotherhood and as women we may do much to mould its ideals by our social influence, by our treatment of our servants, by our Christian attitudes toward those less fortunate, and by our faith in world peace. A great deal is said these days about democracy—it is the cause for which our soldiers claim to be fighting, but one wonders sometimes how much we truly understand what it means. It is the great ideal which will put an end to fighting when men really believe in it. It is the ideal of Jesus when He seeks to draw the world into a fellowship of the sons of God.

The world to-day, in its desperate need, is losing faith in worn-out creeds and church organizations, but is hungry for a simple living religion. You can help to carry the message of love and light to it, as you learn to live it in your own hearts.

We have been talking about the future, but the beginning of that future is here and now. School is not preparing for life, it is living; for as George Jones said recently, "Life is life, whether at fifteen or fifty." This is one of the most important times for you, because now your lives take their future bent. Decisions are made and habits formed which make or mar your character. If now you see the vision and follow the gleam, if now you set your young faces steadfastly to follow the Master and fulfil His purpose in your lives, the future will follow naturally and gladly. Then, from day to day, as you do your school work honestly and loyally, as you learn to conquer self, as you give unselfishly to your friends and your social group, as you carry your share of the responsibilities of the school, and as you open your hearts to goodness and beauty and love, you will be shaping your lives toward the ideal you have set and will become a co-worker with God. I believe He has a place for each life in His great plan for the bringing of His Kingdom, if only we are willing to fulfil it. Live life to the full, it is such a pity to cheat yourself out of the fullness of your life.

Keep steadfastly before you the desire to do the best work you can here at Westtown or at college or in the broader world. Be satisfied to fill no small place—it may be quiet and inconspicuous, but have on it the mark of large and noble living. You may go into the beautiful service of a home, you may go over to help build up a shattered Europe, you may do fine service for your country and God by teaching children, you may be a leader of thought by your pen. Whatever you do, may your work be so that great joy will be lost in it and your love of Christ so loyal and full-hearted that there will be no room for love of self.

I quote a paragraph from Rufus Jones: "Living in admiration, as we do, of Christ, and loving Him, as we must, if we see what He was and what He did for us, we cannot help coming into life contact with Him, and in some sense His ideals become ours and His outlook on the world and His desire for an altered humanity possess us and control us and unite us in one larger whole with Him, till we believe in His belief, and leap in some measure to His height of living. When in this intimate and inner way He becomes our leader, we are no longer our mere selves. We cannot now live for pleasure or for gain or for self. His will becomes in some degree our will and we go His way because love constrains us and a higher vision of an ideal world compels us. . . . Sacrifice of self is a feature of all rich and purposeful life. The moment a person cares intensely for ideals he has started on a way of life that makes great demands and yet it is also a way of great joy."

In the spirit of consecration to this highest of all ideals, fellowship and co-operation with Jesus Christ for the bringing of the Kingdom of God to men, let us read our text again: Whosoever will come after me, let him deny the base and weak and selfish in himself, and take up daily his duties and opportunities, and follow Me, who for the joy that was set before him endured the uttermost sacrifice; for whosoever would save his life to himself shall lose it, but who in the joy of service loatheth his life for Me and My Gospel, shall save it unto life boundless and endless—to life eternal.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

TUNGSHAN, Sze, West China, Twelfth Month 23, 1918.

DEAR HOME FOLKS:—

Here we are on the eve of another Christmas, the third that I have spent away from you. Time is flying fast. A few more years and I hope I may spend one with you again.

Our school girls are preparing to give a sort of dialogue the day after Christmas—children of many lands talking over their Christmas customs. Yesterday Mira and I spent the whole morning getting the representatives of the fourteen countries fitted out with costumes. Such a task! I gave practically all of the skirts I possess besides lots of other pieces of clothing. You see in all the countries except China the women wear skirts, so all but one of the number needed them, and they have none of their own. One of the little tots represents Holland and she does look too cute rigged out in white cap, kerchief and apron, and some big "wooden" shoes which I made out of pasteboard. We also have a good outfit for our Swiss girl. The American wears one of my middy blouses and skirts.

Last third-day I went with Margaret Vardon to see the Government Girls' School and invite them to come and see this affair. It was a most interesting afternoon. They have only six boarders there, but about eighty day scholars—little girls who can still go out on the streets. (Girls beyond a certain age are not allowed to travel without suitable escort.) The two teachers who entertained us seemed very pleasant.

I should like very much to see more of them and exchange ideas with them. We found that they are breaking up school the day before our entertainment comes off, so cannot all come over together, but all live here in the city and we hope many of them will get their mothers to bring them.

Zwelfth Month 28th.—Christmas festivities over, and one nice part about it was that the Chinese did a great deal of the preparing and planning themselves. All day Second-day the girls were busy making presents for the children in the day school. There was a Christmas tree, from which some eighty little folks received presents. The children who had been coming most regularly received dolls made and dressed by our girls. For less regular attenders there were Chinese pens, balls, and handkerchiefs, also made by the girls, and post-card pictures. The latter I supplied from those sent me by the Guild and some others and they were much appreciated. So I'll be glad to have more this year. The children liked the ones with children on them, but some of the others were good, too, for their educational value. Besides these presents each child received a small paper box of nuts and candy and two small oranges.

The afternoon the girls gave the dialogue was very disagreeable, so that the women did not turn out very well. It was excellent practice for the girls though, in speaking out. You see they have little chance of doing things before folks, never before men and boys.

To-day I've had a most interesting experience—attending a Chinese wedding. The husband is an inquirer and so they were married in our meeting-house. It was not a Friends' wedding exactly—the girl would not even answer when asked if she was willing to take this man as her husband. It is the custom for Chinese brides not to speak at all on their wedding day and she did not intend to violate the custom of her ancestors. She was brought to the meeting-house in a closed chair in the midst of a blare of trumpets (Chinese music and flag waving). There was a red cloth over her head so that no one could see her face and this was not removed till the meeting was all over. A little of the ceremony was borrowed from the Chinese, when they were pronounced man and wife tea was poured into two cups and each drank, then it was mingled and the cup containing the mixture offered first to her and then to him.

About an hour after the meeting we attended the feast at his home. The bridegroom was busy hustling around and waiting on his guests, but she was nowhere to be seen. After we had eaten we were allowed to go into the back room and see her. There she sat alone on a wooden stool, with no back. She rose and bowed to us as we came in, but did not lift her eyes or speak to us at all. If she had any feelings of happiness inside her she certainly managed to conceal them utterly. I suppose she had never before seen either him or his family with whom she was henceforth to live. She is only a girl of sixteen and a very nice looking one. An old lady, her foster mother, was with her, but she leaves her and goes back to her old home to-morrow. She looked so sad I must say I felt sorry for her. Chinese girls are trained from babyhood to conceal their feelings; you seldom see them bubbling over with happiness or anything of the sort. This girl may have been really pleased.

JANE C. BALDERSTON.

WITH THE FARMERS IN FRANCE.

(Concluded from page 462.)

THE OLD COMMON ROOM, Sernaize, France, First Month 13, 1918.

DEAR FATHER:

Prior to the holidays I completed my thirteenth week on the land. Threshing continuously at the village of Evres we had, at the end of that time, threshed all the grain in the village which could not be done by a horse thrasher. Thus we relieved those suffering actual loss from the war and refugees fleeing from distant homes, of whom, fortunately, there were only a few in this village. Evres has only suffered slightly compared to the surrounding villages, as but one row of houses was burned. Those, to be sure, were the largest and set fire to by hand after the enemy had spread a quantity of gasoline about. The result was, in a way, happy, as those burned out, instead of being forced to find refuge in some distant village, were able to squeeze into the unfilled rooms, stables and shelters of their more fortunate neighbors. By now most of those burned out have rebuilt little wooden houses on their land. Our patron saint and saintess, Monsieur and Madame Calliet, intend to move into their house early this Spring.

During this time our little thrasher has threshed a total of approximately 350 tons of wheat, oats and a very little barley, on an average of 87 tons per month. Last month we did rather better—113,205 kilos. As a matter of fact, the last week out before Christmas we beat our weekly average by doing some 136 sacks. If it had been a full week we should have passed our weekly tonnage record, but oats weigh less than wheat—about 80 kilos of oats will fill a 100 kilos sack—which set the record flag spinning up the staff, for our highest before had been 44. One day I did 43 by myself, with Brother Bowerman on the sick list.

The thrasher consumes on an average two gallons of gasoline a day, which costs us $2.00 and for which we charge the people 1 franc a litre or, on an average, of 10 francs ($2.00) a day. This is our only charge as our labor goes free, for the "love of the work," etc. The gasoline is bought by the Mission for slightly less than 1 franc a litre, but the charge is supposed to cover oil, belt repairs and the small incidentals. Surely this is quite reasonable, considering that the same outfit of thrasher, with personnel, could not be had before the war for less than 50 francs ($10.00) per day and now, aside from the Mission, is an absent quantity on the land.

The charges "on the land" such as "bottling" (a term used for binding the "bots" or sheaves of straw into bundles) is two francs a day (40 cents), which does not seem giddy to us.

In a week's threshing we can easily thresh over $1000 of oats and something over $1250 worth of wheat, which is not [little], considering the [employer] for whom we work pays out only about 75 francs, at least less than $20, for labor and gasoline.

The total market value of the grain threshed at Evres by us is accurately 16,701.50 francs at the present price of 50 francs the 100 kilos. This grain can either be sold to the market at that price or over, or sold to the miller at Triacourt, as there is a law in France compelling the offer of grain to the miller at something like 48 francs per 100 kilos. If the miller does not accept, or if he is tardy about fetching it, then, after a certain period, it can be thrown on the market.

As compared with the work of an American steam thrasher of the type used in the United States, the work which we have done in three months could be got through with by a large machine in three weeks, calculating 60 tons a day. Of course, the cost would be quite different to operate a large thrasher in these parts. The people complain about our threshers because they go too fast, with a great machine their hands fly up in horror. Madame Ceredos, the Catholic lady who does relief work among the Catholics of the New Meuse, has such a machine, but it lies idle. It not only chops up the straw in good old American style (per 110over) and "abominable partout," its speed is far too great. So it has stood quite unused this whole season, with the spiders fastening its wheels more securely by their webs.

The total tonnage threshed by the Mission this season is about 2,000,000 kilos. But the thistles and the dust and the toil and the sweat are all poetry.

HOWARD W. ELKINTON.

THESE are days of mighty shaking-up, but days when "things which cannot be shaken shall remain." And for such "things" no insurance policies are needed, for they cannot be destroyed. "And now abideth faith, hope and love, these three, but the greatest of these is love."—The Friends' Messenger, Guilford, N. C.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF THOMAS HODGKIN.*

It has been sometimes said, and unfortunately with only too much truth, that notwithstanding the excellent general education and high average intelligence of Friends as a whole, the Society has produced comparatively few real scholars. This has been even more the case in this country than in England. The energy required for material advancement in developing a new country may in measure be ascribed as the reason for this condition here. It is none the less true, however, and in looking over the field of scholarship certainly Friends are noticeable, neither for their numbers nor for their unusual attainments. The exceptions to this generalization are therefore the more welcome.

Possibly in our day no one has reached a more exalted position in the world of letters and historical research than Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, whose "Life and Letters" has recently appeared. Its author, Louise Creighton, is not a Friend, yet her treatment of her subject is wholly sympathetic, notwithstanding her bias to ecclesiasticism. She is the widow of Mandell Creighton, a prominent Bishop of the Church of England. He was well known as a historian through his authorship of the "History of the Papacy", etc. The Creightons were intimate personal friends of Dr. Hodgkin for nearly forty years. His broad-mindedness and deep spirituality doubtless were not without making their impress upon these close associates. It is unusual to find one who has not a background of Quakerism able to deal with the delicate situations respecting our Society as does this author. Whilst differing from her on more than one point, her treatment as a whole is highly satisfactory.

Coming of an old Quaker family, Thomas Hodgkin was born in 1831 at Tottenham, a suburb of London, the son of John and Elizabeth Howard Hodgkin. When he was only four years old, his mother died. His childish memories of her were vivid and never faded. Seventy-seven years later he could write of his early sense of bereavement in this sad loss. He never ceased to cherish that memory, although the period immediately following her death was a complete blank to him.

His early education was in Friends' schools, but Oxford or Cambridge was denied him. He was a dissenter and as such ineligible to their classes. How times changed is shown later, when universities vied with each other in conferring honorary degrees upon him, or in securing him as a lecturer on special occasions. Thomas Hodgkin attended University College in London. Ill health and his youth necessitated five years for his college course, he receiving his degree in 1851.

It was his intention to follow his father's footsteps and become a lawyer. He entered the chambers of Joseph Bevan Braithwaite and started his legal education. It is interesting as showing his mental strength to find him at this time delighting in "Fearn on Remainders," perhaps the most abstruse of all legal text books, and one that is understood and grasped by but comparatively few of even well-read lawyers of today, though it is still the leading authority on the involved subject of which it treats. The hopes and ambitions of the young man were destined to receive a cruel blow. After but three months his health completely broke down, and it was necessary for him to become an enforced invalid, and devote all his attention to trying to regain his strength. The shock to a man of his delicate sensibilities can be imagined. His splendid will, however, and high faith were brought to the fore and he could write in retrospect of this experience:

"I am afraid that I had been for a long time practically living without God in the world. Now the Father drew unutterably near to me, told me that He loved me, told me that it is true that whom He loveth He chasteneth, and yet that like as a father pitieth his children so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. All the real happiness of my middle life and old age, all the help, far too little—that I have ever been able to render to the faith of my brethren comes from that fierce fire of chastisement. And these long years which I looked forward to with such indescribable dread, wishing that they could be blotted out of the number of the years, have been rich in blessing, full of overflowing happiness."

The succeeding years were full of doubts and distractions. Finally it seemed as though he might enter upon a business career, and banking appeared to offer the best opportunities. After some preliminary experience, in 1850 in partnership with William Edward Barnett, John William Pease and Robert Spense, Thomas Hodgkin opened the bank in Newcastle which made a fortune for those who participated in it. But it did more than this. It brought a new influence—that of high Christian character, into the business life of the smoky town of the North. Our author quotes an unnamed authority, whom she says was "well able to judge" as saying of Thomas Hodgkin and J. W. Pease: "These two raised banking from a matter of rule and formula to a high profession, in which they not only showed originality, courage and resource, but they brought high Christian principle to bear both on broad arrangements and on questions of detail, and they certainly raised the commercial and financial life of Newcastle to a much higher and purer level."

During this period his health had steadily improved, and he felt finally that so complete was his recovery that it would be proper for him to proceed with what had long been his cherished desire. At Falmouth, Eighth Month 7, 1861, Thomas Hodgkin and Lucy Anna Fox were married.

In the meantime much had been transpiring among Friends, Dr. Hodgkin's faith was severely tested. In the swirling currents of thought following the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species", the revival movement, so-called, and other similar controversies, it is not to be supposed but that he would be involved. With his mind beset by doubts he re-examined the foundations of his faith. He considered leaving Friends entirely, but found that in such a course there was no peace for him. More and more the beliefs and practices of Friends in worship became dear to him. Early in 1861 his voice was first heard in meeting. This was under the direct leading of something within him which seemed to say, "If thou dost not make confession now when the remembrance of God's chastening is fresh upon thee thou never wilt." This first public expression was soon followed by others, and the encouragement of Friends in his meeting did much to strengthen him. Always modest he was fearful of offending any, and felt there might be some lack of unity with his ministry. At this period he wrote to John Pease of Darlington:—

"If any of my elder brethren . . . think that I have perhaps mistaken the time at which this confession should be made, and that it would be better to wait a few years longer or to keep silence altogether throughout my life, and if they will in all openness and faithfulness tell me so, I will gladly hold my peace; for though of course I do not believe in the Romanist theory of an infallible church standing between the soul and God, and taking upon it the sins of the former, still I do heartily accept the Church's sole right to judge of all offerings made in its name, and if the Church said 'Keep silence' I should never feel that I had incurred the woe pronounced upon him who looks back after touching the plow of the Gospel."

This sweet reliance upon the judgment of his friends and willingness to abide by their decision lasted with him through life. It was his ability to see and weigh diverse views and then endeavor to arrive at the truth that qualified him as the truly great historian which he became later. It was not till 1866 that Newcastle Meeting recorded him as a Minister. His biographer says of him in this connection:

"His voice and manner added much to the impressiveness of what he said, but above all none could doubt that he spoke from his heart of what he himself felt and knew. He dwelt repeatedly on the thought of the Saviour's loving companionship, and at times spoke feelingly of his longing for more religious fellowship with the members of the meeting. His was no austere religion, remote from the things of daily life. He wished to bring Christ into everything. One who heard him often wrote: "I know no minister who seems to feel so much the exceeding love of our Heavenly Father."

*Life and Letters of Thomas Hodgkin, by Louise Creighton. pp. xii-445. London and New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Doubtless his father's influence was no small factor in his finding his spiritual and religious bearings. Though one lived in the north and the other in the south of England, so that they did not see each other except at intervals, their frequent correspondence kept them in close touch.

With widening experience Dr. Hodgkin's Christian life deepened, and this rendered him ever more broad in his sympathy with those who were not of his household of faith. At Barmoor, his residence in the north of England, which he occupied for a number of the last years of his life, he was fifty miles from a Friends' meeting. Here he used to join in fellowship with others in worship, but wherever he went his simplicity and devotion to perceived duty made him at once a most powerful influence. Possibly on account of his isolation he was not used as much as some others on Society appointments, but he frequently had a large share in the preparation of London Yearly Meeting Epistles. His limped style of expression may often be traced in them. In the main religious questionings were a thing of the past as he approached middle life, and he was able to use his full powers to the help of others. Two or three brief extracts from his letters will show how firmly Thomas Hodgkin's faith was embedded in his very nature. Referring to the word "vicarious," he says in 1877:—

"I should prefer if possible to follow the advice given us to keep the use of sound Scripture terms. But as to the thing signified by the term, the idea conveyed by the texts, 'He hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin,' 'He died for our sins according to the Scriptures,' and by so many other similar utterances, I feel that I cannot disbelieve this and still call myself a Christian. I know not why it is, but the doctrine of the Atonement (simply stated and not eked out by shallow men's attempts to make a religious mystery quite clear to 'common sense') causes me no trouble or difficulty at all."

Again in 1883 he writes: "I have no temptation to think, and can scarcely understand the temptation to think, [that matter called itself into being, and has moulded itself into its present shape." And again in 1885:—

"The great danger, I think now, of our Church and of some others, is that upon the true and right foundation we shall be building edifices of wood, hay, stubble, which will not stand the fire. It is so easy to preach what is called a Gospel sermon, setting forth one particular phase of Christian truth and piling text upon text in support of it, without troubling oneself about 'the proportion of faith,' or considering what relation one's broad, slap-dash statements bear to the facts of human consciousness, or even to other passages in the Bible itself. Yes it is easy, as it is to 'build hay' in a hay-field, but will the work endure?"

In his home life Dr. Hodgkin was delightful. To his children he was always a companion and playfellow. Whilst his letters at times show a degree of seriousness, often seeming to border in his earlier years almost on melancholy, this side of his nature seems to have been reserved largely for his correspondents. A man of affairs, interested in all that was going on in the world, an inveterate punster and joker, he enjoyed the sunshine which pleasantries can bring into life. All associated with him in a business way delighted to come in contact with him. His servants and employees were his most devoted friends. Their reverence for him as shown by their letters as published, was almost pathetic, and indicates how deep a hold his spirituality had upon them all. He had unusual ability as an accountant, and for half a century himself kept the private ledger of his firm. It was a serious struggle for him to give up this cherished activity—recreation almost.

Northern England is dotted with remains of the Roman occupation, culminating in the wall constructed as a defense against the border incursions of the Scots. Living in this region Dr. Hodgkin soon had his attention turned to these antiquities, and he entered enthusiastically upon their excavation, examination and study. Not infrequent trips to Southern Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land tended also to stimulate his historic tastes. Possessing a pen which he wielded with great ease and fluency, from his youth he produced much prose and verse, which were published in the journals issued by Friends. His sister Mariabella Fry, and her husband Edward Fry (Lord Justice Fry) urged him to undertake some continuous work, instead of devoting his energies to rather ephemeral articles. By 1868 we find him concentrating his attention on Italian matters and soon his reading and studies were all devoted to what had now become a fixed purpose. Finally "Italy and Her Invaders" was chosen as the title of his monumental work. The first volume was published in 1880, the eighth and last of this series in 1899. Twenty-eight years of labor were devoted to this one undertaking. He read omnivorously and made himself master of his subject. This involved an enormous amount of labor and often the translation of much that is not accessible in English. But Dr. Hodgkin was a linguist. He was familiar not only with classical languages, but with those of modern Europe as well. Even a brief stay in a new country would start him at getting an understandable use of its language. Finally, when he was thoroughly saturated with the particular period and characters of which he was about to treat, with a first-hand knowledge of localities involved and an analysis of all available material, his pen would run gracefully and easily as "he poured out what he had in the form that it presented itself to his imagination. He lived with the people about whom he was writing, and talked about them so graphically that he made them real to others also. . . . He enjoyed his work intensely, it was his hobby and not his business."

During the period that he was producing this great work he was not idle in allied historical directions. He gave many lectures on subjects requiring much research, and published separate histories of Theodosius, Theodor and Charles the Great. A little later he produced "The History of England from the Earliest Times to the Norman Conquest," being Volume 1 of Hunt & Poole's Political History of England. He was also the author of scores of papers on a wide range of subjects, published in magazines, reviews and the Friendly papers.

Whilst never actively engaged in politics, Thomas Hodgkin, like all good citizens, was deeply interested in the welfare of his country. The defection of Gladstone and many of his dearest friends to the Home Rule policy about 1886 caused him the deepest pain. He considered it "the most utterly immoral thing that he had ever seen done in politics." He left the Liberal party and threw in his weight with the Unionists, and was a good deal chagrined at the outcome of the ensuing parliamentary election in Newcastle where he then voted. The Boer War was another and natural subject for great concern. At its outbreak in 1896 he was inclined not to condemn, in fact rather to justify it. It is an interesting speculation how far his views may have been biased in favor of war, by the atmosphere in which his historical researches had kept him so thoroughly immersed. Certain it is that as time went on, his views shifted so that he was more and more inclined to the pacifist position. In 1911 he delivered the Swarthmore Lecture. Here were expressed what were probably his final views on war:

"Can we really imagine men renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created them, devoting the best energies of their minds to the perfecting of machines for the destruction of their brethren, devising artillery which shall crush out of life an unseen foe some ten miles distant, a torpedo which shall pierce the hull of a stately vessel and sink a thousand men suddenly beneath the ocean, or an aeroplane from which a bomb may be dropped upon an unsuspecting enemy? Are these the works of the children of light or of the sons of darkness? I do not forget the many hearts full of love for Christ that have beaten beneath the soldier's ... jacket. . . . But though these men did not perceive the essential incongruity between Christ and war, we do, and I believe the present and the coming generations will perceive it yet more clearly. There is nothing in all these arguments against war for him who does not believe in God's revelation of Himself through Christ. . . . It seems to some of us, pondering on the future of the world, that Christianity must destroy war; if not, war will destroy Christianity."

He pictures the vision of the Delectable Mountains:—
 "But between us and them lies a craggy, cruel ravine of impenetrable darkness, from which at intervals arise the cries and groans of men, women and children sacrificed to the Moloch of war. Till that ravine can be spanned, till the misery and the waste, the folly and the bestial ferocity of the war system can be put behind us, the Delectable Mountains cannot be reached. . . . Is it possible that this dream, which all men praise as a dream, can ever become reality? No! It is absolutely impossible if God is not, if there be no righteous Governor of the Universe, but if He is, and if it be as we assuredly believe, His will, He will bring it to pass."

Whilst Thomas Hodgkin had been an extensive traveler, his journeys outside of England had not been of the character usually denominated by Friends as "religious." It remained for him in the closing years of his life to take a great missionary journey. In the autumn of 1908, together with his wife and two of his children, he was liberated by English Friends to visit Australasia. The party left London First Month 22, 1909. It was just a year later when they returned. Tasmania, New Zealand and Australia were all visited, not only meetings, but isolated Friends in remote localities, requiring the expenditure of much exertion and the exercise of much faith on the part of a man then seventy-eight years of age. The conditions in these new sparsely populated countries were a revelation to Dr. Hodgkin, and we find him sorrowing for a historic background, even among the Southern Alps of New Zealand. To him the human touch and the human association meant almost everything. Much that he saw and heard was the subject of commendation, and the following extracts show his views concerning matters which are not without interest to us in America.

Referring to the admission of non-Friends to the School at Hobart he writes:—"I can truthfully say that though I went out believing in the School, I came back believing in it far more. And less than ever am I disposed to regret that some non-members' children get their education there, for I think one thing that we want to cultivate in Australia is that kind of general knowledge of 'the ways of Friends' and respect for their character as a religious body, which is generally diffused in [England]."

In New Zealand particularly he felt the importance of organisation. In a loving farewell letter to Friends there he says: "I see that if a Christian Democracy such as ours is, is to endure at all without a paid ministry, without an elaborate hierarchy, and without large endowments or state-paid salaries, it must have an organisation of some kind, and that organisation cannot be upheld without some sacrifice of time, convenience, and money on the part of the members. The query that I have heard again and again for more than seventy years, and often in my younger days with weariness, 'Are meetings for worship and discipline kept up?' assumes a new meaning in my ears, for I see that without much patient labor on the part of many obscure individuals, in order to return an affirmative answer to that query, the Society of Friends could not have existed for 250 years, and much good work which it has been able to do for humanity would have been lost to the world. With organisation Quakerism has been able to make its voice powerfully heard on behalf of truth and righteousness, without organisation it would long ago have been what chemists call 'a deliquescent salt,' losing all the appearance of a solid body." He deplored the lack of eldership, the idea of which had either died or was dying out. Its survival seemed to him to be one of the great needs of Friends in the Southern hemisphere.

After his return to England Dr. Hodgkin's time was full of many things. The new interests aroused by his journey, the lectures and reports to the Yearly Meeting and elsewhere of what he had seen and done, the critical conditions in his own beloved England, gave him engrossing employment at every turn. He could, as always, find time, however, for things of the spirit, and to keep up his varied correspondence. In all his later years we find the fruition of his thoughtful experience. In early years he had found it difficult to get the full spiritual advantage from silent worship. Contrast with that attitude these words taken from an address delivered at Manchester in 1907:—

"This silent worship, which has often perplexed and sometimes amused those who judge us from outside, we feel to be a most precious possession. Something, I believe, of the same feeling which animates devout recipients of the Eucharist, is often felt by us when we thus gather together, 'with one accord in one place,' for the worship of our Almighty Father. We constantly feel that the Saviour Himself thus fulfils His promise 'where two or three are gathered together there am I in the midst of them.' But the silence is not only precious in itself, it also makes possible that many-sided, many-voiced congregational worship and ministry of which I have spoken. No doubt 'one good custom' here, as elsewhere, may degenerate into something useless or even harmful. There may be a form of silence as dead as the prayer wheels of Thibet. Nor can it, in my opinion, ever be right that the worship of a Christian congregation should be habitually and entirely a silent one. When that is the practice, there must be something wrong in the spiritual state of the members. In my conception of the matter, Silent Worship is a beautiful, still lake. It is studded with lovely islands—the vocal utterances of members of the congregation. In these islands grow the harvests of spiritual food, in them the forests of praise are waving, from them the fountains of prayer rise on high, but all are surrounded by the fair still water, and that water reflects in its surface the pure blue of the Eternal Heavens above."

He was equally clear in his views respecting a paid ministry among Friends, remarking that behind the paid home missionary loomed in the sight of many, the vision of the "pastor," "and behind him again a chain of hierarchies, each more arrogantly claiming lordship over God's heritage, till at length we are invited to prostrate ourselves in the presence of Leo XIII."

With his increasing years he became very sensitive lest impaired memory might cause him to do or say or write something inappropriate, or that might wound one of his fellows. Yet he lost none of his interest in what was going on around him. The rigorous climate of the North was not agreeable, and it was arranged in Second Month, 1913, that Dr. Hodgkin should leave Barmoor and go to a new house near Falmouth. "On one of the last days at Barmoor his neighbor Bishop Neligan, then vicar of Ford, came to see him and wrote of his visit: 'I can never forget the uplifting joy of that hour I had with him. Then, as always, I came away from him with higher thoughts and the feeling of having breathed purer air. His walk with God was so real.'"

On his way to Falmouth, Dr. Hodgkin stopped over a First-day at his brother Jonathan's house at Darlington. At meeting he "spoke on the message of Habakkuk, given in a time of stress when God seemed to hide Himself. He bade the old have courage and in spite of difficulties still to rejoice in the Lord. Then addressing the young, he warned them that they would have to face much greater times of difficulty than their elders had known; things would not grow easier. But though God might hide Himself, he bade them wait for the vision. 'Though it tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come, wait for it.' He ended with a strong note of hope for the future. Those who heard him were deeply moved by the solemnity and beauty of his words."

A day or two later the new house at Falmouth was reached, and he delighted in the presence of some of his children and grandchildren. First-day came. The usual morning portion of Scripture was read by him at family worship. At ten the carriage came to take him to meeting. His wife was waiting to accompany him when like Enoch he was not, for God took him. Without a groan or struggle the end came and Dr. Hodgkin knew the realization of his cherished wish as expressed in 1868 in his beautiful poem "Emoro Noli."

Father! I live or die in this confiding,
That Thou art King;
That each still star above me owns Thy guiding,
Each wild bird's wing.

O, Son of Man, if Thee and not another
I here have known,
If I may see Thee then, our First-born Brother,
Upon Thy throne;

How stern soe'er, how terrible in brightness
That dawn shall break,
I shall be satisfied with Thy dear likeness
When I awake.

It is not easy in a review such as this to bring out with real vividness the satisfying character of such a man as Thomas Hodgkin, or to give a fair idea of such a book as his "Life and Letters." The author has permitted him to speak much for himself. Fortunately his voluminous correspondence has afforded the opportunity to make copious extracts from his own expressions on many subjects. His letters have been freely drawn upon and much ability shown in their presentation. The book is one that will have a most valuable and lasting place in Quaker biography.

BRYN MAWR, PA., Second Month 1918. GEORGE VAUX, JR.

HIDDEN.

I cannot see the mountains,
For the valley is filled with mist.
The pines and the winds are silent,
And even the waves are whist.
From far-off Eastern fountains,
The Carmel gushes its rills,
And pours its bounty westward,
Between its sheltering hills.
But the sun is above the mountains,
Above the mist and the sea,
And God is above the shadows,
That hide His meanings from me.

—EMELINE HARRINGTON, in the Christian Register.

MEMBERSHIP IN THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

JOHN S. ROWNTREE.

[Discussions in connection with the proposition to modify the requirements of admission to Westtown School, have revived questions of membership in the Society of Friends. It is believed the following article will be interesting in this connection. It is considered as the authoritative utterance as regards the historical and Scriptural grounds of membership. It appeared in 1872.—EDS.]

Ecclesiastical, no less than profane history repeats itself. Fifteen hundred years ago the Christians of North Africa were keenly debating a question akin to one that now interests us. The terms of membership in the Society of Friends, and the manner of determining those terms, have recently been discussed in the pages of this Review (Friends' Quarterly Examiner). The terms of Christian association was the matter in debate between the Donatists and the Catholic Church in the fourth century. Accidental and personal subjects were imported into the controversy and embittered its progress; but the substantial matter at its root was difference of view between the advocates of a restricted, and a comprehensive membership. This was defended by Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, with characteristic acumen, that, by his antagonist Petilian, and by Donatus, who gave his name to the controversy. Few persons would now endorse all the arguments used on either side. The sympathies of the English Protestant are alternately enlisted by the more spiritual conceptions of the Christian Church entertained by the Donatists, and by the more catholic views of their opponents. I do not propose to enter on the history of this great controversy; but to remark, that in connection with the subject before us, the existence of such a chapter in Church history is worthy to be remembered. We learn from it that the difficulties now felt in fixing the limits and defining the requirements of Church fellowship are not new. The generations that preceded us were familiar with them. The perplexity they experienced in dealing with these questions may serve to moderate our expectations of finding their easy solution.

For the perspicuous consideration of the subject, I propose —1, to define the existing practice of Friends in this country in relation to their membership; 2, to indicate the nature of the changes, commonly advocated by the opponents of birth-right membership; and 3, to discuss the expediency of such changes, in the light shed upon them by the teachings of Holy Scripture, and the experience, past and present, of the Christian Church.

1. Membership in the Society of Friends is acquired by adult persons through their own application to a Monthly Meeting; and by children through hereditary descent, the offspring of members being registered as members at birth, and the connection continues for life, unless severed by resignation on the part of the individual, or by disownment on the part of the Society. Children not possessing membership with Friends by birth frequently obtain it whilst in infancy, their names being placed on the registers of the Society at the request of parents or guardians.

2. It is the acquisition of membership in infancy, or rather, perhaps, its retention in after life, without the necessity of making a formal profession of faith in Christ, and expressing a desire to remain in Church fellowship with Friends, that is deemed by many an injurious provision. Its abrogation has often been proposed. The way in which this should be done is frequently left undefined. Generally, the care extended by the Society in the education of its young people is approved and any change of regulation that should diminish this care deprecated. It would appear therefore that little or no alteration is advised in the relations between the Society and the children of its members during the years of boyhood and girlhood. Its public schools would be open to them; so might meetings for discipline. But on attaining manhood and womanhood, membership would cease unless personal application for its continuance had been made and acceded to.

3. Such, briefly described, are present regulations and recommended changes. Before entering upon the examination of them it will be convenient to glance at the historical aspect of this question of membership. It has sometimes been stated in general terms, that the Society's present arrangements differ much from those which existed in the first eighty or ninety years of its history, and that birthright membership is a modern institution. The terms members and membership are modern; or, at least, they were not in very common use amongst the first generation of Friends; though the readers of Sewel's history will meet with instances in his pages. "Of the persuasion of," "belonging to," "professing with," were the terms commonly used in the seventeenth century to signify what is now meant by membership with Friends. The more exact lines of a clearly defined membership date from first of Fourth Month, 1737, on which day it was directed by the Yearly Meeting that "all Friends should be esteemed Members of the meeting within the compass of which they then inhabited or dwelt." The gradual operation of this rule has been to define membership much more rigidly than had before been done, and in time to divide the congregations of Friends into "members" and "attenders of meetings," or "non-members." The line of demarcation between the two sections is now well understood and felt. In some districts of Great Britain the members are less numerous than the attenders; in others there are few of the latter class. It is clear there is a marked diversity of practice between the nineteenth and the seventeenth century in the existence of this strict line of membership, separating the congregations of Friends into members and non-members. But when we come to inquire what is the difference in the relation of the Society to the children of its members at the two periods, but little change is apparent. There is, as already stated, a change in the terms used, not so much in the things signified by these terms. Let us contrast the relations of the Society to two young persons in the years 1672 and 1872, and mark the points in which the two epochs agree and those in which they differ.

1672. A young man, twenty-one years of age, the son of Friends, and uniting with his parents in their attendance of public worship, would be said to profess with or belong to Friends.	1872. A person similarly situated as to parentage is a member of the Society of Friends.
If he marry a Friend the ceremony would take place at meeting, agreeably to the usages of the Society.	The same.
The names of his children would be enrolled on the registers of the Society.	The same.
If he committed a flagrant offence, a "paper of denial" might be issued against him.	He might be disowned.
If he fell into poverty Friends would probably relieve him.	The same.
He might attend meetings for discipline, if he had been invited so to do.	He can attend and take part in meetings for discipline [without any special invitation].
If he died he would be buried in the Friends' Cemetery.	The same.

The points of agreement between the two periods exceed those of difference. The only important difference is in the right possessed now, and not two centuries ago, to attend meetings for discipline uninvited. There can be little doubt that in the constitution of the early meetings for discipline, which were to consist of "true and faithful Friends," and of "weighty, seasoned, and substantial Friends that understood the business of the Church," an attempt was made to draw the boundaries of an inner circle, whose members possessed greater responsibility, and consequently greater power, than those who were outside it. I am not aware, however, of any conclusive evidence indicating that, in the view of the early Friends, this inner circle included all, or nearly all, of those who worshipped in their meeting-houses, who might be truly converted to God; or that it drew a line of demarcation in congregations, at all equivalent to that now existing between members and non-members. It seems rather to have been an endeavor to keep the administrative affairs of the Church in the hands of those who had qualifications for such service.

It is a touching and suggestive incident in the early history of the Society, that when persecution had consigned to prison all the adult Friends in Bristol, meetings for worship were kept up by children under sixteen years of age. Nineteen of these were on one occasion carried away to jail. This occurred in 1682. It illustrates the power of those children's faith, and indirectly their relation to the religious body to which their parents belonged. Speaking generally, therefore, we think the statement that birthright membership is a modern institution is not sustained. From the rise of Friends, the children of its members have always been deemed to belong to it, until separated by the action of themselves or the Society. It is not necessary to pursue this historical inquiry further. The main question before us is not the practice of past generations, but what will most meet the wants of the present.

The arguments for making membership in all cases dependent upon personal application, and a public profession of faith in Christ, fall under a few principal heads:—

I. The churches of earth, professing to be companies of Christian people, associated by Divine appointment for the advancement of varied ends, should be made to correspond in their membership, as closely as is possible, with that of the spiritual body of which the Lord Jesus Christ is the living Head. The Religious Society of Friends is, by its very title, bound to see that its members are religious persons, and this, it is held, existing arrangements fail to secure.

II. The retention of lifeless persons, members by the accident of birth, is injurious to the Church, preventing her discharging her right functions, from the opposition these offer to the action of the spiritually-minded members, and also from the reproach which the conduct of the ungodly may cast on the body they are associated with. The Society has sometimes been compared to an army paralyzed in its movements by the presence of soldiers in its ranks not submitting to the general discipline, nor animated by a like spirit to that which inflames their comrades.

III. The mixture of true and nominal members in one Society is thought to interfere with that fellowship of the spiritually-minded which they desire, and the promotion of which seems one object of all Church association.

IV. The effect on the indifferent or only nominal member, of being classed as a member in a Christian Church, may be to lull the conscience, and prevent his realizing his true position as a sinner needing repentance.

V. Application for membership in a Christian Church would be a public avowal of faith in Christ, part of that "confession with the mouth unto salvation," that is called for from the followers of the Lord Jesus, and the benefit of which is largely lost in existing arrangements.

VI. Membership, when acquired by personal application, would, it is believed, be much more highly valued than it now is.

VII. The knowledge that a time would come when the connection between its young people and itself might terminate, would, it is argued, stimulate the Society to greater zeal in instructing its youth in the truths of the Christian religion; such action would be helpful alike to old and young.

We apprehend the most influential motive with many minds for changing the manner of admission into the Society, is drawn from their conception of the ideal character of a Christian Church, as consisting solely of a company of spiritually-minded persons, consciously redeemed from sin through faith in Christ, and quickened into a new life by the work of His Spirit. In connection with this view, it may be observed that the word Church is used in Holy Scripture in two principal senses (1) for the whole company of the redeemed, militant on earth and triumphant in Heaven, (2) for a company of professing Christians in one locality. This distinction is worthy of note. Much confusion results from drawing our ideal of earthly Churches from declarations only true of the universal and invisible Church of Christ.

In the consideration of this subject, the larger question is involved, What are the ends and aims of Church association? It is conceivable that the spiritual life in each individual heart might be entirely independent of external influences. Such manifestly is not the Divine appointment. Association with others, so powerful in furthering the common aims of men, is found to be most influential in relation to spiritual life. This life may be retarded in its progress by continued intercourse with evil; it is advanced by association with the good. Wherever the Apostles found an entrance for the Gospel message, they gathered their first converts into groups and gave them a simple organization, ordaining elders in every city. Feeding the flock, confirming the souls of the disciples, edifying the body, are the expressions that meet us in the record of the planting of the Christian Church. The mental constitution of man demanded help from his fellows, not invariably but generally, as an element in the growth of spiritual life. Mutual help is evidently one of the great objects proposed in Church association. The growth of spiritual life in the heart of man is oftentimes slow. A long interval separates the first appearance of the green blade from the full corn in the ear.

It will hardly be disputed that the nurturing of this Divine life through the years of its slow progress is an object of Church association. It is one that should be steadily kept in view in the consideration before us. Without some conception of the objects for which an institution exists, it is futile to try to determine the terms of its membership. The help of the Church is to extend to people of every age, as well as of every station in life. The message of the Gospel goes forth to all. Laborers are invited into the vineyard early in the morning and at the eleventh hour. Boys and girls playing in the streets no less than old men and old women, every man with his staff in his hand for very age, constitute the population of the spiritual Jerusalem (Zech. viii: 4, 5)—the true Church of Christ. The little children, the young men, the fathers, all filling their respective and appropriate stations, should be found in the churches of earth now as they were formerly. We are now concerned with the children. Is there anything inconsistent with the essential constitution of a religious society that children should enter it by virtue of their descent from Christian parents? It is a truth—one full of consolation to those who have been bereaved of young children—that of such is the Kingdom of Heaven. The offspring of Christian parents enter this world, inheriting indeed a nature prone to sin, but nevertheless sharing in the benefit of the redemption which Christ purchased when He by the grace of God tasted death for every man. When infants are removed by death, relatives are often comforted by this view of God's love towards these little ones. Is it not equally true of those who do not die? The inspired Apostle reminded the believers at Corinth that their children were "holy," even though only one parent were a Christian. We hold, therefore, that the practice of the Roman Catholic and Anglican Churches and of the Society of Friends, in admitting children into their communions in infancy, is amply supported by Scriptural authority, and commends itself to the instinct and judgment of those who have had practical occasion to consider the position of children in the fold of Christ. I do not overlook that the Romanist and Anglican priesthoods attach an almost miraculous efficacy to the rite of water baptism, by which infants are initiated into their respective communions. This need not divert our attention, however, from the fact that these two great sections of the Christian Church unite with Friends in admitting the children of their members into Church membership in infancy. The manner of that admission is a separate question, with which we are not now concerned; nor yet with the expediency of the subsequent rite of Confirmation. The view that the children of Christian parents are born members of the true Church of Christ, and therefore that it is reasonable they should enter into earthly Church association in infancy, is supported by the defence of infant baptism made by some eminent men in the Church of England, who say this rite simply declares the fact, before existing, that the unconscious infant is God's redeemed child, as the coronation of a king or queen declares the previously existing fact that the person crowned is the nation's lawful ruler.

It is a notable feature in our Lord's teaching how He holds up the childlike character for the imitation of his followers. In connection with this teaching there is surely a blessed reflex influence on the elder members of a congregation, in having children sitting amongst them, during the hours of united worship, recognized as forming an integral and most important part of the Church. And not less happy is the effect on the children. If there is an elevating and an ennobling power on children in their consciousness of being citizens of a great empire,—if the knowledge that the highest office of the Church, the Christian ministry, is open to women equally with men, has had a marked effect on the female character amongst Friends, there must, we believe, have been a great power for good, on the youth of the Society, in the knowledge that from childhood they were its members—that they inherited its prestige—and that no limitation of age barred their taking part in its concerns, when qualified by the reception of the Heavenly anointings. Some have been called like Samuel of old, and James Parnell of later times, to be preachers from their early days; a much larger number have been introduced into useful training in the mere secular duties of church life, as door-keepers, librarians, collectors of subscriptions. The influence of these things on the young women has probably been more marked even than on their brothers; and in England and America alike has qualified them for posts of administrative leadership when associated with Christians of other denominations.

These considerations seem conclusive in favor of the present usage, whereby Friends recognize their children as members of the Society from birth. But the question remains, how long should the connection thus formed exist, what should under it, what should be required to maintain it? When infancy has been succeeded by manhood, should not the bond entered into unconsciously, as regards one of the parties, be renewed and ratified afresh?

The days of infancy and childhood are soon passed. But too certainly, in spite of early training and all the influences of Christian education, will some choose evil and refuse good; and, as years pass, will depart further and further from the fold of Christ. Others will rise to manhood and womanhood, without having made a decided choice between allegiance to Christ or to the world. Shall the connection between such and the Church of their infancy continue?

In attempting to reply to this question, we are not aware that any specific directions in Holy Scripture can be adduced. We are, therefore, thrown back upon the teaching of experience. The apparent results of the various regulations now in force in different branches of the Christian Church, would seem to be the data from which a right conclusion is to be deduced. One qualification must be observed; that no system be approved, even if apparently successful, if it run counter to any of the underlying principles laid down by the Lord Jesus for the government of His Church.

The answer of the Society of Friends through its present arrangements to the question how long the connection between itself and its birthright members should subsist, we take to be somewhat as follows: Agreeably to that great object of Church association—mutual help—it seeks the help of its people from infancy; by giving counsel to parents in the training of their children; by inviting such children to join in congregational worship as soon as their years permit; and by making provision that every child has the opportunity of receiving a Christian education; experience having indicated that the education of the young is the most powerful means which a Church can employ for that edification, that building up, so insisted on by the inspired writers. In a word, then, the Society labors, that the conditions under which its young people grow up may be those most favorable to their progress in the Divine life. But it knows full well that this desired result will not always follow. It is but too well assured that the work of grace will be frustrated in some hearts, and that not all who entered its fold in infancy will be found in the fold of Christ in the years of adult life. Nothing can be more explicit than the official declaration of the Society on this point.

On attaining manhood and womanhood, then, the Society in effect, says to its young people, We do not attempt to say whether you are really Christ's or not. We urge you to be in no doubt on the subject yourselves. As a Society we have given you what help we have been able. If you desire, we shall gladly retain you as members on certain easily understood conditions: continued association in public worship, conformity to the requirements of Christian morality, and a general agreement in practice with Friends in those matters wherein they differ from other Christian professors, such as abstinence from swearing and fighting. Whilst asking for no subscription to a creed, we refer to the official expositions of doctrine and practice, as embodying the sentiments of the Society on the fundamental truths of the Christian faith. Those who seriously demur to this exposition will naturally retire from the community that issues it. Though wisely jealous of human creeds, the Society from its rise has not hesitated to separate by disowment members who publicly impugned, by speech or overt action, vital truths, like the deity of Christ and His atonement for sin. It is apparent, then, that retention of membership in manhood and womanhood by those who acquired it at birth is not an act free from conditions. Many of these conditions are substantially the same as what would be required in all Protestant bodies possessing a system of Church discipline. The Methodists, the Congregationalists, and the Friends, would unite in separating from their respective communions members guilty of open immorality. The great difference between the denominations just named and the Friends is, that the latter require no declaration of faith from those who enter into Church membership in infancy: The expediency of asking for this profession of faith is the real question at issue.

Most would admit, certainly the writer is prepared to do so, that the asking for a profession of faith from a young man or woman has much to recommend it. The solemnity of the circumstance would often be deeply felt. In other Churches this has not seldom proved to be the case. There is a distinct personal fixing of responsibility in such an act that has proved, and would continue to prove, again and again, the crisis of the spiritual life. Yet in spite of these weighty considerations we believe it was not an accidental oversight in framing the economy of the Society of Friends that it has omitted to ask for this profession from those born within its communion.

We apprehend the omission had its root in the deep sense entertained by our predecessors that religion is essentially a life; that this life is a hidden thing, very imperfectly expressed in spoken or written words, often hardly gauged by human agency of any sort. This life may be hindered in its progress by being subjected to human scrutiny, as the shooting seed is harmed when children turn up the earth to see if it is growing. So whilst there are cases in which the direct putting of the question, "Art thou at peace with God through Jesus Christ, and is thy judgment satisfied to remain in communion with those amongst whom thou wast born?" would be salutary from its very directness, there are many others—timid and sensitive natures—that would shrink from disclosing the secrets of their spiritual life, and who would be greatly harmed by being required to submit to a process of spiritual examination at the hands of their fellow-men. But if there be life, fruits will result in outward conduct that will be cognizable by all men. It seems to us that it was one of those things in which the early Friends were remarkably before their age, that they sought the outward bonds of fellowship in agreement in action, rather than in signified agreement in matters of opinion. We are aware that unity in practice sprang from unity in belief. Yet, recognizing this, the test given by Christ Himself for discovering false prophets was, "by their fruits ye shall know them." It was this principle, we believe, that lay at the foundation of the provisions affecting membership in the Society of Friends. It may often have been misapplied. Agreement in too many things may sometimes have been expected. Yet we submit that this endeavor to base membership on agreement in practice has been one of the strong features of the Friend system. The drift of thought amongst the other Churches now sets strongly in this direction. A further reason why Friends may have the more safely dispensed with asking for a formal profession of faith is, that their whole system is so eminently successful in stamping the sense of personal responsibility upon those who come under its influence.

We turn now towards the more definite objections against making membership dependent on personal application. Each application would have to be referred to a committee, who would seek an interview with the individual making it, and would endeavor to form a judgment from the character of such interview. The best of men are often imperfect judges of the spiritual condition of others, and we should anticipate that the committees appointed to confer with applicants would frequently err in their judgments; that a good deal of what would be rejected by this ecclesiastical sieve, whilst some chaff might pass. Does not the experience of other bodies warrant this apprehension? Is it even necessary to go beyond the experience of Friends' own committees for visiting those who do apply for membership, to anticipate that numerous difficulties would present, when so much larger a number of applications than at present would have to be dealt with? How frequently does the report of a committee on an application for membership depend on whether there be on that committee any one having spiritual and mental affinities with the person visited. We should anticipate that two classes of persons would frequently fail in their applications for admission into membership—one, the simple and the timid, having little power of expression on religious topics; the other, men of great force and marked individuality of character, who might express themselves unconventionally. There was one tribe in Israel defective in its power of pronouncing a certain test word, and now there are tribes amongst the divisions of human mind that seem to have an insurmountable inaptitude in the pronouncement of theological formulas. Yet what an incalculable loss it would be if that variety of character were diminished which now, within certain limits, characterizes Friends, and is partly due at least to the absence of subscription to creeds verbal or written. Nor would it be only on matters of doctrine and spiritual experience that the difficulties we have indicated would arise. Difference of practice would be almost certain to spring up between different meetings in regard to points of conduct. In congregations where total abstinence principles are strongly in the ascendant it is pretty certain that this would be made a test of fitness for membership, whilst in others the matter would not be mooted. What then would be the effect on those whose application for membership might be declined, and on those who did not make such application, and so severed their tie to the Society? Would it be more or less helpful than existing arrangements? Less helpful, I cannot doubt, in the majority of instances. To the extent that this might be the case would the Society cease to discharge its function of affording help to those within its influence. To the large class who might be halting between two opinions, the severance of the tie joining them to an outward Church would, we anticipate, be the last weight in the scale determining them for the world and not for Christ. Some would no doubt continue to attend meetings occasionally. The position of these borderers is not a favorable one for growth in the Divine life. It has been said such might still, in degree, be under the oversight of Friends. In practice we fear this would amount to very little. The degree of oversight now exercised over the attenders of meetings is but slight. Of the thousand attenders of meetings in Yorkshire only three per cent. join the Society annually; the larger part of this class die as they have lived, borderers only.

The weight of these objections will be variously assessed by different readers. Some will recall circumstances that have come under their own observation, justifying the anticipation of such difficulties. Others will hold that the value of the end to be attained outweighs hypothetical objections. But it is not needful to confine our attention to apparent or anticipated objections applying to the proposal before us. Let us look round and see if the working of existing institutions can assist our judgment. Is the visible standard of holiness of life higher in those Churches where membership is dependent upon personal application and profession of faith in Christ than it is amongst Friends? It is a question for individual consideration rather than dogmatic assertion; but the author has no hesitation in expressing his own judgment that there is nothing in such a comparison indicative of any peculiar advantage in the system of personal application. Low as the tone of spiritual life may be amongst Friends, compared with what could be desired, yet, in proportion to their numbers, we believe no other body can be credited with more fruitbearing in matters of obvious piety and holiness of life. Again, referring to the two classes of persons who constitute the Society at the present time, those who have entered it by birth, and those who have entered by personal application, it would be invidious to draw a comparison between the average type of Christian character in the two classes. But no objection can be taken to the inquiry whether the one class or the other contribute the largest proportionate number of delinquents to the books of our Monthly Meetings. I have no general information; but in the district where the author resides the proportionate number of resignations of membership and disownments, during the last thirty years, has been considerably larger from those who have joined Friends through conviction than from those who have been united through birth. So far as this single instance goes, it does not point to stability of Christian character as being specially associated with a personal application for membership. The same conclusion has been come to by some who have had opportunity of tracing the history of considerable bodies of men, consisting both of those who have been Friends from birth and those who have been educated as such, and have subsequently joined the Society.

Probably the most pronounced attempt that has been made of later time to draw a strong line of demarcation between believers and others is that made by the Brethren. Has the attempt been attended with such success as to invite its repetition? Has it secured unity of faith and absence from internal dissension? If there be any evidence drawn from palpable and tangible facts, indicative that the making personal application for membership is a highly desirable thing in its effect on the character of Christian communities, it has not come under the writer's notice.

In the inquiry we are engaged in it is desirable to gather whatever evidence may exist that shall assist us in reasoning from the known to the unknown, even if it seem at first sight rather foreign to the subject. In this connection the working of Meetings of Ministers and Elders amongst Friends may be worthy of consideration. These meetings are eminently based upon the principle of a restrictive membership. Probably few arrangements, civil or religious, in this country, are more elaborate in their machinery than that which is required for the appointment of Elders. A similar remark applies in degree to the recording of Ministers. What is the outcome of this elaborate machinery? Valuable and favored as Meetings of Ministers and Elders may often be, personal observation and the opinions of others lead the writer to the conclusion that, comparing Meetings of Ministers and Elders, Monthly, Quarterly and Yearly, with the Monthly, Quarterly and Yearly Meetings open to the whole body, the latter are far more edifying than the former. If such be the case, the inference, so far as it goes, is again unfavorable to the policy of a restrictive membership.

But over and beyond all these considerations drawn from the practical working of ecclesiastical machinery amongst Friends and others, it should never be lost sight of, that were it possible to secure the formation of a Church entirely constituted of living members, it would not long remain so. Amongst the first company who received part in the Christian ministry and apostleship (Acts i: 17) was Judas; from amongst the company whom the Holy Ghost had made overseers of the Church at Ephesus, the Apostle foresaw that corrupt men would arise (Acts xx: 30); the Epistles to the Seven Churches in the Revelation indicate much of mixture in those communities. Leaping over long centuries all illustrating the same truth, how much of the earthly element showed itself in the first generation of Friends—the names of James Naylor, John Perrott, George Keith, recall troubles for which birthright membership cannot be made answerable. The same experience was repeated on a larger scale in the gathering of the first Methodists. Doubtless it was to prepare his Church for this ever-recurring story of spiritual defection, that the Lord Jesus likened the Kingdom of Heaven to a field sown with good seed in which tares sprang up. How significant is the zeal of the servants who would have gathered up the tares! How has past experience illustrated the deep wisdom of the Saviour's words: "Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest." (Matt. xiii: 24-30).

The instance of Christian discipline afforded by 1 Cor. v.,

shows that this teaching was not directed against the excision of open, and notorious offenders from the Church. We apprehend the great danger of rooting up the wheat is in the endeavor to discriminate by human, and therefore finite, instruments before the fruits, whether of piety or sin, have become palpable.

Reviewing the whole subject, we are brought to the conclusion that the present plan of the Society of Friends in conferring Church membership at birth is not opposed to the inspired teaching bearing upon the condition in which infants enter upon life. It has been shown that the system, or absence of system, by which no profession of faith is asked for from those entering manhood or womanhood, is defensible on various grounds. It has been shown that this absence of profession does not imply a membership without conditions. It has been freely conceded that such a change of arrangements as would require a definite profession of faith in Christ and an application for membership, would probably secure some advantages not now possessed—but the presumption amounts almost to a certainty that with these we should lose some very real benefits that the Society now enjoys, and that we should call up many very serious evils. Incidentally it has been shown that the children of Friends have been deemed to belong to the Society from its rise. The experience of Friends in the admission of members on their own application, and of existing institutions within the Society based on a restrictive membership, as well as the example of other Christian communities, appear in various ways to be unfavorable to the proposal of making membership dependent on personal application. Ecclesiastical history, through sixty generations, demonstrates that no perfectly pure Church, visible as such to man, ever existed upon earth. The words of Christ Himself preclude our looking for wheat unmixed with tares. They strongly caution us against any attempting to gather tares that may uproot wheat.

These considerations are to the writer decisive against what is termed the abolition of birthright membership amongst Friends. It is a conclusion different from what he once held. This personal matter may be dismissed with the single remark that the change of view has not been lightly made. The reader will judge whether the reasons for the change are adequate.

One further question remains. If the grounds for altering the practice of Friends in relation to their membership, in the direction of making it more restrictive, are insufficient, is any other change possible or desirable? We think it is, and that the true policy will be found in the opposite direction. The care bestowed during the last forty years in the education of the children of non-members by the establishment of schools and the opening to them of others from which they were formerly excluded, the opening of the Society's marriage ceremonial to the same class of persons, and the appointment of committees charged with their special care and oversight, have proved very useful in some localities in softening down the line of demarcation between members and others. We should rejoice to see this line of action extended, and that more effort were used to develop a healthy congregational fellowship in each meeting akin to that which existed in former times; still, as then, retaining a marked difference in the attitude of the body towards those who had been disowned for overt acts incompatible with the Christian life, until such acts had been condoned by confession and amendments of life.

In the instance of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii: 37), amongst others, we see how the early Church opened its arms to converts in the first stages of Christian experience. We need a simple flexible machinery, having its mainspring and motive power in love to Christ and His people, that shall bring the Church's help to those who are in the outer courts, it may be, both of the earthly and the heavenly temple. A Church so laboring is twice blessed. It is blessed in the help thus given to those who are weak and out of the way, and it is blessed in the increase of Christian fellowship amongst its own spiritually-minded members through their baptism into unity of spirit, when engaged in this branch of their Master's service. In an early page of this article the desire for more of Christian fellowship was referred to as one of the objects which some hope to obtain in larger measure through a restricted system of membership. Christian communion, like earthly friendship, is a thing so delicate and subtle in its manifestations, that its direct pursuit often fails. It is often but feebly felt in the most select companies of even saintly persons, if assembled without a distinct object; but it is largely enjoyed by fellow-laborers and fellow-sufferers, whose hearts are warmed by love to Christ, and who seek in their service or their suffering the glory of His name.

WHERE WE MAY KNOW GOD.

I wandered o'er the hills to-day,
Far from the city's smoke and din,
Far from the walls that shut me in
I yearned to know. I longed to see,
I hoped that He would speak to me
But only one small bird sang sweet,
And grasses whispered at my feet.

Was there a God above my head?
And might I then his face behold?
But just a sky of blue and gold
Was all I saw—and wondrous sight
Of fearless birds in circling flight,
The blossoms of a cherry tree
Came sweetly drifting down on me.

As I lay stretched upon the earth,
I closed my eyes that I might hear
The sound of footsteps drawing near,
The gentle breeze that kissed my cheek
Seemed trying, oh, so hard to speak.
The trees were whispering overhead,
I wonder what it was they said?

But now that I am back again
I somehow seem to know that I
Saw more than just the earth and sky.
I feel as if my soul had heard,
Although there came no uttered word,
But I no longer doubting go,
Because I know. Because I know,
—MAYD MORRISON HOEY, in the Youths' Companion.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SOCIAL ORDER COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, 1918.

"Divine love which enlarges the heart toward mankind universally is that alone which stops every corrupt stream and opens those channels of business and commerce in which nothing runs that is not pure, and so establishes our goings that when in our labors we meditate on the universal love of God, the serenity of our minds may never be clouded by remembering that some part of our employments tends to support customs which have their foundation in the self-seeking spirit."—JOHN WOOLMAN.

"In every bargain that I make, in every article that I use or consume, I traffic in human energies as well as in things. I relate myself to the health and happiness of men and women whom I have never seen, I take part in making their children what they become. To assume full responsibility for these acts of mine, to form a habit of seeing society as it is, and of tracing social causes and effects, and to think my very own moral life in community terms—these are the rudiments of an awakened, mature Christian conscience."—GEORGE ALBERT COE.

The Social Order Committee appointed by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting last Third Month has entered into its deliberations under a deep religious sense of the importance and weight of the matter entrusted to its consideration; namely, "the present day application of efforts to promote the kingdom of God on earth, particularly, as it relates to social, political and industrial conditions." We believe that when Jesus taught the prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," he was not thinking of some far off event, or some future state of being, but of a kingdom on earth, which could be established by the working out of Divine love in the relations of men, one to another.

The term Social Order, as here used, comprises all business relations, including those between buyer and seller, employer and employee, borrower and lender, owner and renter, and the relations of each of these to the community and to the State. It also includes relations between what are commonly called classes of society.

The Society of Friends has been slow to question the righteousness of the economic system as at present constituted. While a high standard of personal integrity has been upheld by the Discipline, and individuals in positions of industrial responsibility have done much to improve conditions, but little thought has been given by the body as a whole, to those aspects of modern industrial life which are detrimental to society.

Recognizing fully that it is easier to formulate ideals than to carry them into practice, the Committee is not prepared to put forth, at this time, any statement of definite conclusions. Yet, as a first step and as a basis for progressive thought and action, we recommend a consideration of the following principles, asking for the full co-operation of the Yearly Meeting in our efforts to apprehend the duty of Friends in this crisis in human history.

1. A true interpretation of the Christian religion will lead those who profess it not only to try to live out the teachings of Jesus, but to do all within their power to help create a Christian order of society.

2. A social order, based on the teachings of Jesus and controlled by His spirit, will give every individual full opportunity for the development of body, mind and soul. It will not permit lives to be crushed by economic pressure or warped by evil environment.

3. The Christian ideal of service will lead employers and employees alike to look upon the business or industry in which they are engaged as a method of service to the community and to one another, rather than merely as a means of private profit, or of making a living.

4. True simplicity involves more than the elimination of non-essentials in the ordering of the outward life. It means freedom of the spirit from bondage to material things, from all desire for that power and influence which the mere possession of wealth often gives, and from the fostering of class distinctions having their root in material possessions or exclusive privileges.

5. The Christian spirit of trust, sympathy and helpfulness can be applied not only in family and social relations among equals, but in economic and industrial relations as well, where it will finally overcome antagonism among the various elements of the industrial order and prepare the way for the more general working out of the principles of justice and humanity.

The Committee further commends to the consideration of members of the Yearly Meeting, the following initial steps toward a partial realization of these ideals:

1. A sympathetic study of the conditions of labor and the causes of poverty, with a desire on the part of employers of labor, whether in office, industry, or household, to learn whether the life of their employees be only a monotonous struggle for existence or whether their income and circumstances be such as to afford healthful recreation and adequate means for mental and spiritual development.

2. Investigation of schemes for the democratization of industry, for the replacement of competition by co-operation, and of all methods by which an equitable distribution of the products of industry may be achieved.

3. The making of investments in the spirit of service rather than of self-interest, investigating, as far as possible, the industrial conditions lying back of securities and favoring those investments that have a social motive, even if returning a low rate of interest.

4. A re-examination of the Quaker testimony for simplicity in the light of modern conditions. This may involve, for some, the voluntary renunciation of the acquisition of wealth in the interests of brotherhood; for others, the application of surplus to remedial rather than to ameliorative measures for social re-adjustment, and for all, an avoidance of expenditure which may give rise to envy or unworthy emulation.

5. The daily practice toward all of that sympathy and good-will, which is more than mere indiscriminate kindness, involving, as it often will, risks to personal security and ease that can be taken only in the spirit of faith and love.

Copies of this Message can be obtained at Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

CHRISTIAN IDEALS, QUAKERISM AND THE SOCIAL UNREST.*

EDWARD A. WRIGHT.

[It seems interesting that Friends of California as well as of Philadelphia, are entering vigorously upon the study of social problems.—Eds.]

We may take the social unrest for granted; it is a matter of common knowledge, a subject of continual comment, a theme of innumerable articles in the press, and is ever in the mind of our thinkers, leaders and statesmen. It is like a cloud at the background of modern civilization, at any moment it may begin to thunder, and who knows, it may even develop into a flood, which once more will sweep this old earth clean!

True, social unrest is perennial—like the poor it is ever with us. At times it breaks out into French revolutions and the like; at other times its rumblings are distant and not so ominous. Yet we feel that it is especially our question, one of them anyway, and if we fail to find a solution it is at our peril.

We can no longer accept the easy optimism of the eighteenth century:

"Oh, yet we trust that somehow good,
Will be the final goal of all."

We should like to know how!

To the Christian one would think the answer is not so very obscure. By example and precept Christ taught the path of life. The enemy is always tempting us to believe that His principles, though excellent, cannot be carried out just yet; that we must wait until the world is ready; that we might do more harm than good by being premature, and that we should be terribly handicapped if we bound ourselves by rule which the world feels free to break.

Yet what can be more obvious than that it is because the patient is sick the remedy is given, to refuse to take it until he is well would be little short of an act of insanity.

Let us then take courage and lay hold with renewed faith on those unchanging Gospel truths and allow no one to persuade us—even if he has a string of letters to his name—that our Lord meant exactly the contrary to what he said, and that so far from the wisdom of this world being foolishness with God, they are in complete agreement and harmony.

To quote the teaching of the New Testament bearing on the question of social unrest would practically mean to read from Matthew to Revelation. That we are all children of one Father, equally the objects of His love and care; that there are no higher and no lower; that we ought not to seek worldly wealth; that we should rely on God for the future as well as the present; that if we have wealth we should account ourselves but as stewards for Him; that we should treat all as we would wish them to treat us; that evil should never be repaid by evil, but by good alone, in these and countless other passages we have the best of guidance, which we should follow in dealing with social unrest and all other problems of life.

So far I think we are agreed. We cannot regard the teachings of the Master as mere "counsels of perfection," but as practicable and to be practiced, as the key to all difficult places, the way to solve all perplexities and as leading into the true path of life, which mankind is vainly trying to find by other means. Nor ought we to forget that many of the ancient sages and philosophers taught their followers practically the same things, showing the unchangeableness of all that is really true.

We may now address ourselves to the question how far the Society of Friends is holding to the ideals of Christ Jesus and endeavoring to follow them. For we may be sure that its influence for good or evil in the world will be in exact proportion to its faithfulness or lack of faith.

The message of Quakerism as originally delivered by Fox and his fellow-workers, has sometimes been spoken of, I think rather inadequately, as the doctrine of the Inner Light—"the light which lighteth every man which cometh into the world." Inadequately, because it was no mere doctrine, but the living presence of God in the soul, giving Light indeed, but much more than that word conveys, for the Life was the Light of men, or as George Fox expresses it himself, "That image of God, that righteousness and holiness that Adam was in before he fell . . . The same power and spirit that the apostles and prophets were in."

And the message was for no sect, race or nation, it was to be preached, Fox says, "To every creature under Heaven," and so also his followers understood it. Penn refers to Fox as "the blessed instrument of God in this day;" and Margaret Fox speaks of her husband thus:—"The instrument in the hands of the Lord, in this present age . . . to preach the everlasting Gospel which had been hid from many ages and generations."

This message was carried over land and sea by those first Friends in a great burst of devotion and power, reaching many lands and turning multitudes to that Living Presence. It was not primarily a social movement, nor one of reform, as we understand the word. It was something much deeper, a great primordial upheaval, to leave its mark on generations that knew not Fox and peoples who had never heard his name. So much so that Thomas Carlyle, two hundred years after, speaks of it as the greatest event of modern history!

But alas, the fervor and enthusiasm of those early days soon subsided, and a second phase of Quakerism came in. There was now a Quaker sect, distinguishable very much from the pioneers who were to preach the Gospel to every creature. Gradually the Society became largely self-centred. They came to look on themselves as a small body of highly-favored souls, custodians of the faith once delivered to the saints, living in spiritual isolation from an irresponsible world.

It became an act of treachery to marry a non-member, a venial sin, to use the common form of speech, and a highly commendable achievement to be well read in the history of the Society. "Let every thing be done decently and in order," had become the motto.

We had our Queries both answered and unanswered, our Discipline, Advices and Admonitions, our rules, regulations and principles, and we went faithfully through the category year after year, never varying a word if we could help! How many times I have heard that: "Our meetings for worship are regularly held, those on First-day morning are, in general, well attended; on the afternoon of that day they are but thinly attended, and on week-days a considerable deficiency is apparent. The time appointed is well observed by some Friends, but others are deficient in this respect, but little admonition has been imparted!" or this:—"We believe Friends generally are just in their dealings, punctual in fulfilling their engagements, and clear of defrauding the public revenue." One of the queries, or perhaps it was an advice, I recollect warned us against "the snare of accumulated wealth," but I cannot recall we ever ventured to answer it!

Let I be thought to exaggerate, let me quote from a letter written by an English Friend in 1811, who says, "It would be difficult, if not impossible, to find Friends willing to make the sacrifices necessary in a missionary, because the love of money and the love of good things, and the comforts of the world so prevail amongst us." ("Friends Beyond the Seas," page 30).

*Read at a meeting of Friends of College Park, California.

Yet it would be very unfair to give the impression that the Quakerism of what we may call the Middle Ages was spiritually quite dead. It had made to a large degree "the way of God of none effect through its traditions," but those of us whose memories go back, say fifty years, can gladly and thankfully testify that there were still those whom Charles Lamb had in mind when he said, "they shone like troops of the shining ones".

There is a principle in Quakerism very hard to kill—it is that of direct personal responsibility to our Maker. Thus, while the largeness and power of the pioneers were lost, there was still sincere piety of a quiet and beautiful type.

We are now living in the third phase of Quakerism, merging into the second as the second did into the first. We can and need not pay no date for its beginning, but it is unmistakably here now. There were always individual Friends whose love and interest were broader than the Society—John Woolman, for instance—but it was only slowly and cautiously that Friends generally emerged from their isolation. First, one branch, then another, of religious, social or philanthropic work crept from toleration to recognition, and then to approval: anti-slavery, prison reform, temperance, education, home and foreign missions, war relief, etc., in an ever-increasing and widening stream.

Now a law of Christian life is in giving and service. "Getting and spending" (on ourselves) "we lay waste our strength." But our Lord says—"Give and it shall be given to you again," and again, "I am amongst you as one that serveth."

The worldling believes in getting—not to say grabbing—and holding and accumulating. He is like a man rowing against the stream, which I know by experience is very hard work. No wonder he looks old at forty! But the soul that has learned the secret of giving is rowing with the tide. He is in harmony with the underlying principles of life, for the Lord Himself is the great Giver, and we, in our measure, must become like Him. Of such a soul we may say, "He shall be fat and flourishing. He shall still bring forth fruit in old age."

Therefore, with the true spirit of service awakening,—may I not say in proportion to its awakening, the stirrings of new life were felt in the Society. But we must always remember the injunction, "Let your light so shine amongst men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in Heaven." For if we let our light so shine before men that they glorify us (our Society) we are not living in the spirit of this teaching.

With all our limitations and imperfections we may, I think, hope that the Friends of to-day, generally do stand for the spirit of service; for honesty between man and man; for conciliation; for the returning of good-will for suspicion and dislike. If this is so they stand on a vantage ground, and ought to be able to do their part in allaying social discontent and throwing oil on the troubled waters. Even as things are, the exercise of these qualities smooths out many a rough place, as those can testify from their personal experience, who have tried it.

But we must remember that while charity, good-will and forgiveness are Divine qualities, so also is justice, and the claims of social unrest are for the most part that justice is not done.

It is, therefore, proper to consider what stand we take in this matter; and if we find these claims substantially true, to show by our example the better way, and this although we perceive that social unrest is by no means an unmixed evil; for if we were all satisfied, contented and prosperous, where would be the incentive to progress?

Space and time forbid that we should go at any length into the vexed and complicated questions—economic, social and political—that bear on present-day unrest. But I scarcely think there will be dissent from the statement that (leaving for the moment the deeper spiritual causes aside) the modern social unrest lies mainly in the enormously unequal distribution of wealth and opportunity, coupled with the conditions under which labor is often carried on, and those conditions also of home life of the laborers.

The urgency of this problem in its present aggravated condition is, we know, of very modern growth. Let us then be neither surprised nor disappointed that satisfactory and complete remedies have not yet been found. Think of those centuries and centuries that elapsed before the trade and property in human beings was abolished in civilization. And if many of our forefathers were pioneers in the abolition of slavery; may we not hope that their mantle may descend on some of their sons of this generation?

The immediate and remote causes of the glaring inequality of wealth are, of course, many: personal ability, frugality, sobriety, education, environment, etc., all play their part, but undoubtedly, our system or want of system, in regard to land and money are the great underlying causes, and I cannot doubt that all thinking persons realize more or less that they are essentially unjust.

To be sure, we are so used to these things that we may not question them, and even if some questions do arise, we may silence them with the thought of our inability to mend matters. Yet if we were asked as an abstract question, whether it could possibly be just that certain men should have the power to live on the labor of others, without giving any equivalent, either of a physical or mental kind, we should all say most emphatically—no. And if we were told not only was this done, but that the power to do it could be handed down from father to son, in theory at least, forever, and furthermore, that this injustice was allowed whether in the first instance acquired honestly or dishonestly, we should certainly cry out against such a monstrous, not to say, silly proceeding.

Now, granting that this is an extreme or unusual illustration, there may have been but few Legrees in the Southern States, but the possibility of a single one was enough to condemn slavery.

Again, if we were told, having never heard of such a case before, that a wonderful discovery had been made, or a wonderful machine invented, which would enormously increase the productiveness of labor in a given field, should we not throw up our hats and say, that now at last all troubles for the workers will be over, at least so far as money goes? And later, when our informant replied that there was no necessary connection at all between the productiveness of labor and wages, but that the workers might even be worse off than before, we should perhaps mistrust his veracity or our ears!

Now, if we only regard what reforms are at present practicable, we may well be discouraged. A little tinkering and patching here and there, perhaps, but no going to the tap-roots—hardly a recognition that there are tap-roots—yet nothing is more important than that we should see clearly. The opinions, maxims and practices of the world are like a hypnotic spell under which we grope and stumble; it takes an effort, and a strong one, to get our eyes even partially open; but it is quite certain unless we do so we shall not be able to help our fellow-man much.

We have seen that this social unrest is a menace to civilization. We subscribe to the doctrine that in the life and teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ is a complete remedy for this menace. We have expressed the hope that the Society of Friends, as it stands to-day, is in a position to lubricate the social machinery a little. But if we should be asked how near we come to the Pattern shown us, we should pause awhile, and if we did answer our answers would differ.

Let us then interrogate afresh the teaching of the Master, As our Quaker poet has it, let us "test our lives by Thine." Let us be frank to acknowledge how far we have fallen short of the statue and be ready to change into a nearer copy of the image. Remembering that the letter even of the Sermon on the Mount avails little, but the Spirit much. What is that spirit as it bears on the present inquiry? Is it not this—that we should live free alike from the desire for worldly riches and the fear of worldly lack? That we should know ourselves His children, Who provides for us in the present and in the future; and if despite our not desiring them, riches do come our way, that we should regard them absolutely and entirely as a trust, and not in any sense as our own? Think of the freedom and joy this would bring into our lives and the example it would be to others.

Here is the true cure for social unrest, but the world will not believe until they see it demonstrated.

Can Quakerism make that demonstration?

WHAT DOTH THE LORD REQUIRE?

[This article is reprinted from the Freedman's Friend at the suggestion of Agnes L. Tierney. The author is the valued Principal of Christiansburg Institute.—Eds.]

At this time when the nations of the world are filled with the spirit of blood-lust and red-handed war crushes the finer sensibilities of men it takes a brave man to raise a voice to suggest a more sensible way of settling national misunderstandings. Such a man is Professor Leon Whipple of the School of Journalism of the University of Virginia. In an address before Sweet Briar College recently, Professor Whipple said:

"I am a pacifist very practically and logically because war just does not work, and it is common-sense to try peace. War does not destroy autocracy, make the world safe for democracy, or even preserve our present democracy. War does not get us anything we want, or remove the German menace. That must be removed by a change in the spirit of the German people and we must seek means to produce that change. It is hard to say what means, but let us try every means with faith and honesty.

"Russia has the courage and vision we did not display. She was not afraid to try new hopes in her own country and towards other countries, and she will be the spiritual leader of the new generation. No real catastrophe can happen to Russia—her spirit is too strong. Her ideal will defeat the threat of militarism. Germany is not more dangerous to the Russian freedom than the danger of infection with softness and conventional ideas.

"No cry of treason, or suppression of the right of free people to free speech can stop the labor for peace. Compare the spirit of Jane Addams, Oswald G. Villard, David Starr Jordan, dedicated for years to the noble service of democracy, with that of sudden patriots among politicians, steel kings and exploiters, who were the gravest peril to democracy and now cry loudest for it. Which spirit will win?

"Can democracy be really safe while this can happen? In America a woman is asked to give up her son to go and fight for democracy in Europe. While he is risking all for this, his mother is thrown into prison for asking the first of all democratic rights—the right to vote. Women are already facing the possibility. Pacifism cannot be neglected or ridiculed—unless you are too lazy to think. It is here, fighting and beautiful.

"Pacifists believe there is good in Germany. They believe that war is wrong morally, biologically, economically, to the woman's heart and to her head, that it achieves no end it seeks, injures its own believers, and that what it gets can be secured in nobler ways. It believes you cannot conquer Germany save by changing her spirit—and you cannot do that by annihilating the people or imprisoning them in a wall of steel and soldiers. We can protect ourselves from Germany by freeing the good that is in Germans.

"That is the international task waiting the world—it will be just as hard and difficult after the war as now. Why not begin that work now for peace? Win, lose or draw, the hope of making the world safe for democracy is just what it has always been—to purify ourselves, then to act toward all others."

It takes a man of high moral courage to say these words in the face of the present temper of public opinion. If the advice of over-zealous newspapers is to be followed the Professor stands in grave danger of losing his chair at the University. And yet is there a man who can read those words and not feel deep down in his heart that the Professor is right? After all what is causing the war? Is it not born of the people? It is as logical to expect to put out a fire by pouring oil on the flames as to try to kill the spirit of war by more war. The thing can't be done. The writer holds no brief for any Pacifist organization, but common-sense and all the teachings of Christianity seem so utterly opposed to the course which the world now follows.

It would be interesting to have some historian tell just what the world owes to war for its progress. Her finest literature, her noblest art, her greatest inventions, her most important discoveries were all made in time of peace and all the things which have carried the world farthest on its march of civilization have been those things concerned with the pursuits of peace. War has ever been reactionary and one year of it is enough to kill what it has taken a century of painstaking effort to build up.

To say that this country is at war and peace talk is out of order is begging the question. Men can be loyal and patriotic without surrendering their private opinions. If Pacifists believed war was wrong before the country declared war, they still believe it, if they are honest, now that it has declared war. The same freedom of speech which guarantees the expression of opinion by the veriest war lord also guarantees to one less belligerently inclined the right to express the hope that the spirit of Christ will finally rule in the hearts of all men, including even the Germans. It is to be questioned whether a man who publicly advocates war is not doing much more harm to the country than one who advocates peace, and certainly the one has as much right to be heard as the other. We may or may not agree with all that Professor Whipple has said, but one thing is sure: he says it certainly worth careful consideration. In our saner moments would we not do well to propound Micah's query to nations as well as to individuals:

"Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams or with ten thousands rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul.

"He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God."

E. A. LONG.

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

(Continued from page 464.)

"Our pilot riding a mean beast, his habit also being mean, they said but little to him, and took nothing from him. Being now left in the wilderness, we soon came to a conclusion to return to Friends at Longcane, from whence we came; but how to cross that large and rapid river Savannah, we could not conceive. It looked unlikely that we could ride two at a time on so weak a creature, neither could we wade it. We sought for a canoe, and seeing one on the other side, called, in order to get over. A young man came to the canoe, and inquired who we were—asking if we were rebels. My companion told him we were friends to the rebels. He then said, we were ———— tories, and should not come over. We then went down the river to a place where some had forded in low water. My companion and pilot stripped themselves, and being good swimmers, they got on the weak beast, with their clothes between them, intending, if the creature sank, to swim out, and if they got safe over, one of them would come for me. I could see but little of the horse until they got to the other side, which was, I suppose, about two hundred yards; sometimes the water ran over the saddle, and my companion coming back for me, we also landed safe, then travelled on to William Miles's, from whence we came, and a kind friend he was to us.

"This was a trying time to me; not so much on account of the loss of my property, as for the absence of my Beloved, who had been my preserver and conductor. I was afraid I had offended Him in going so far. I endeavoured to keep still and quiet in my mind, and soon perceived I must return to that bloody place again. When I made it known to my companion, it was grievous to him, and after a time of silence, he told me we had been so remarkably preserved whilst we were within our prescribed limits, he thought we had no business there; if we had, it appeared to him unlikely that we should have been stopped; and further, that I had not liberty by certificate to visit the meetings in Georgia. This discourse from a valuable friend, so highly esteemed by me, and also by his friends in general, struck me deeply. I told him I desired to look more deeply into it. This was the next morning after we came to the aforesaid friend's house. I inquired for work, and kept closely at it for two weeks, my companion not being able to do much; my desire was, to keep him and myself from being chargeable. At that time I could see no way home, nor the time to go back again. For several days I was in great distress, and there was none to help me; often looking towards my dear wife and children mourning for me, and I not knowing how long I should be detained there, or whether ever I should see them again.

"One night as I lay bemoaning my sad condition, as though I had offended my Master, whom I had loved above all, I cannot express the anguish of my soul at that time; and in the depth of distress, a language sprang lively in my mind, 'Stand still.' A language which I understood at Camden when a prisoner there, was now with life revived and renewed, 'Fear not, my servant, I will be with thee.' O, how was my troubled soul revived! All doubts and fears vanished away, and in this pleasant and favoured state I said, 'It is enough, Lord! I want no further confirmation; I will go or will stay at thy word, only be with me.' Indeed, the place where I was seemed so pleasant for some time after, that I thought I could live there all my days, if it was his will, without being much concerned about home. I soon informed my companion that I intended to travel towards Georgia, and that, as by his discourse a few days before, he thought he had no business there, I should leave him at his liberty; but desired he would stay here for me a certain time, and then return, if I came not. After serious consideration, he told me he could not be easy to let me go alone, and if I went, and died, he would die with me. A day soon appeared for me to travel on, and also to write a letter to General Greene, who was then about thirty miles off, fighting against Ninety-six. He soon read my letter, and granted my request, as follows:

"Mr. Abel Thomas, and Mr. Thomas Winslow, Long-cane Camp, before Ninety-six, June 7th, 1781.

"GENTLEMEN,—Your letter of the 6th is before me. From the good opinion I have of the people of your profession, being bred and educated among them, I am persuaded your visit is purely religious, and in this persuasion have granted you a pass; and I shall be happy if your ministry shall contribute to the establishment of morality and brotherly kindness among the people, than which no country ever wanted it more. I am sensible your principles and professions are opposed to war, but I know you are fond of both political and religious liberty. This is what we are contending for, and by the blessing of God, we hope to establish them upon such a broad basis, as to put it out of the power of our enemies to shake their foundation. In this laudable endeavour, I expect at least to have the good wishes of your people, as well for their own sakes as for ours, who wish to serve them upon all occasions, not inconsistent with the public good.

"I am, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servant,

NATHANIEL GREENE."

HEADQUARTERS, JUNE 7th, 1781.

"Abel Thomas has General Greene's permission to pass and repass through this country, behaving with propriety.

NATHANIEL PENDLETON,

Aide de Camp."

(To be concluded.)

NEWS FROM ARMENIA AND SYRIA BY STORY AND CABLE.

FURNISHED BY EMILY OLIVER.

In the town of Caesarea, in far off Asia Minor, there stands a house which was the scene of a sad tragedy many months ago, and yet from that little house shone forth the light of firm faith in Christ and loyal witness to Him.

Many another house could tell the same story, for it was in the days of the deportations and Armenian Christians were being slaughtered by the thousand. A house to house search was being made by the Turkish soldiers for any who might be in hiding and for the rich plunder which they knew could be found in the homes of these industrious people.

In this particular house we are concerned with, an old man was lying helpless on a mattress spread on the floor, and by his side sat a little girl. As the search drew nearer they could hear the coarse jokes of the soldiers and their loud laughter and they knew their turn must come very soon; but flight was impossible.

The old man whispered words of encouragement to the child, "Remember, my daughter, whatever happens, we must not deny our Lord." At last, after what seemed like an endless age, the door opened and a fierce-looking soldier entered. He made short work with the old man, then, turning to the horrified child, said, "If you will come with me and become a Moslem you shall be safe." "No, no, I cannot become a Moslem, I will not deny my Lord," she answered and turning fled from the room.

But where could she go, poor child? Escape was impossible, but still, through the house, she ran up onto the roof, her little heart beating with terror as she heard the steps of the soldier gaining on her and finally felt his hand grasp her shoulder.

In his right hand was a drawn sword, but still she persisted, "I will not deny my Lord." Down came the sword and pierced through the frail little body, then it was thrown away as useless, and with a muttered, "Praise be to Allah, may all Infidels perish so," the man turned and went down stairs and out of the house to continue his work of destruction.

Not long after an American doctor, from the mission station near by, entered the house to see if any there needed his help. He quickly saw that all was over with the old man, then he too passed through the house, searching for what he might find, but with what a different object! Nothing met his eye till he came out onto the roof and there, under the beautiful blue sky, with the sun shining down in all his glory as though there were no sin or suffering on earth, lay the apparently lifeless body of the little girl. The doctor saw the cruel wounds, one in her hand, another sword-thrust through her lung, but he quickly found that her heart was still beating faintly, so, lifting her up tenderly in his strong arms, he carried her to the Mission Hospital, where she was nursed back to consciousness and finally cured. Her first words, when she opened her eyes and saw friendly faces around her, were, "I didn't deny my Lord, did I?"

On the high road outside another town in Armenia, during the same days of persecution, was gathered a band of women. They were a strange-looking group! Some were young and beautiful, others old and frail; all carried bundles, as though prepared for a long journey, and in the faces of all shone a strange glad light.

Who are those fierce-looking men, standing impatiently by while the women say good-bye to their friends? They are Turkish soldiers whose cruel deeds have struck terror into the hearts of many a strong man. And the ladies? They are American missionaries who have stayed with the women as long as they could, their hearts bleeding with love and pity for the poor wanderers, who were being driven out into the desert because they would not accept life and safety and freedom, as their husbands had done, by denying Christ and acknowledging "there is no God but God and Mohammed is His prophet." The time had come when the two groups must part, the Americans to return with heavy hearts to their Mission station, their Armenian sisters to meet the fate which all knew awaited them at the hands of their cruel guards. As they embraced one another the American ladies broke down utterly and wept bitter tears, realizing afresh how impotent they were to help and how much their friends must suffer for their loyalty to Christ. The brave Armenian women were the ones now to speak words of comfort to those who had been their loved teachers. "You must not weep for us, we have taken up the Cross of Christ and follow Him." "Yallah, Yallah," broke in the impatient soldiers, with a curse. "Move on, we can't lose time like this any longer," and with firm steps and shining faces these brave martyrs walked down the road, resolutely turning their backs on home and friends, and were soon lost sight of in the distance and never heard of more.

These were two of the many true stories told by American missionaries at the Annual Meeting of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee last month and all spoke of the courage and patience of these poor people, the absence of all complaint, and the eagerness with which they are ready to start life again. Given a few tools or a little grain an Armenian will quickly become self-supporting, under favorable conditions. One very encouraging feature of the relief work in Asia Minor is the success which has followed the industrial work among the Armenians; but this cannot be started on a large scale till the country is in a more settled condition. Cablegrams lately received from Turkey in Asia, Persia and Egypt, show that there are three new developments in the state of affairs in the Near East which call for renewed sacrifice on our part and greater energy in raising funds to meet the increased need. The first is the direct result of the political situation in Russia, as the present government has entirely cut off the grant of six roubles a month, which was formerly given to all Armenian refugees in Russian territory. This throws the whole burden of caring for these people on the American Committee. Consul Smith cables from Tiflis, "Committee besieged by appeals from all districts, working with renewed energy to cope with situation. Good hope of success if backed by American people—unless this is done promptly numerous orphanages caring for twenty thousand children and many asylums for old people will have to close—innates homeless and destitute."

From Consul Richards in Western Persia, comes the following: "The food situation is desperate here now and with it has come the inevitable sickness and death. More fresh refugees are coming into Urumia and the villages near by and there is not nearly enough food to feed the people already there. By the time you get this letter the conditions will be frightful and the people will be dying like sheep. I sincerely hope our cablegram will wake up things back there in the States."

The second point is the deportation of the Greeks in Asia Minor. "The Greeks constitute the most numerous Christian element in Turkey. At the beginning of the Armenian troubles they were spared the horrors of deportation, although commanded and heavily crushed by various military measures. Recently, however, the Greeks in large numbers have been deported from their homes along the Black Sea Coast, suffering, many of them dying, from hunger, exposure, hardship and resultant diseases. Many thousands of them have escaped to Trebizond, where they are now ministered to by our relief agents; a quarter of a million Greek refugees from Asia Minor are now in Thrace, Macedonia and Greece proper, where they are practically homeless and in urgent need of food and clothing, others are being cared for by our agents in Asia Minor."

The third development is one which will gladden the hearts of all friends of Armenia and Syria and concerns the relief work already started in that part of Palestine now under British rule. The following night lettergram has been received from Cairo: "Long awaited opportunity relief Palestine has arrived. Sickness, destitution serious, especially in cities. Estimate fifty thousand sufferers directly accessible. Funds in hand very inadequate. Refugee hospital established near Gaza crowded. Three more required. Seed, grain, clothing, medical supplies, can be secured in Egypt for Palestine relief. British military authorities offer all possible transportation facilities and urge immediate action. Bishop MacInnes (English) Committee well organized with representatives already in Palestine. Fox (member of English Friends' Foreign Missionary Association), manager American Red Cross sharing responsibility. Conditions in Syria appalling." "Probably twenty thousand destitute in Jerusalem, medical relief established, our five doctors working incessantly. Borton, military governor, asks our financial co-operation." An American Red Cross Unit is to sail from New York this week, for relief work in Palestine, under the command of Dr. E. St. John Ward of the American College, Beyrout; as the British army advances new relief stations will be opened in the occupied land, and it may not be long before the way will be open for relief to enter Syria, too.

Five months ago it was estimated that the total number of absolutely destitute Armenians and Syrians in the whole of Turkey in Asia amounted to two million one hundred and forty thousand, now the number has increased to nearly three million.

The treasurer's report shows that the total receipts of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee from Tenth Month 1st, 1915, to First Month 21, 1918, were $7,400,233.09, whereas $10,000,000 are required monthly to adequately meet the need. With food growing daily more scarce and more costly these figures speak for themselves and we cannot wonder that the Committee is appealing for larger contributions to meet the increased need. "Over-the-Top—to Save Lives" is the title of a new pamphlet published by the Committee, telling how one city raised eight times as much as the amount allotted to it. It is hoped that every city and State will go beyond the sum assigned to it by the Committee in its earnest endeavor to save lives.

Shall not we, too, as individuals and as a Society take this as our motto, and strain every nerve to go beyond anything we have yet done to reach the many sufferers, in different parts of the world, whom a little more self-denial on our part might save. "Over-the-Top—to Save Lives."

NOTES FROM THE SOUTH.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

The mocking bird, robin and jay are having their festive holiday here with the mercury 60°-80° F. The orange and grape-fruit blossoms fill the air with their sweet fragrance, while the roses bloom and the new leaves have quite removed any trace of the severe frost about the first of the year. The long-needled pine at my side sends up its fascinating "candles" of prospective needles from the end of every branch. These are quite light colored and contrast with the dark green foliage very pleasantly. The camphor trees also have their new growth of bloom and leaves decorating their top-most branches.

Florida has an able Governor and one thousand intelligent, appreciative citizens gathered to hear him speak on Lincoln's birthday in Orlando. Many of these were visitors from the North, East and West, but all were apparently in sympathy with his views on prohibition and equal suffrage. Governor Catts is a genuinely wholesome, progressive man, who gladly signed the bill giving 100,000 acres to the Seminoles of the Everglades a year ago. This act of tardy justice has given these Indians heart to develop their own civilization with a sense of security which they have not had for one hundred years. Indeed, their future and that of their red brothers elsewhere in the United States is brighter than it has ever been. Florida is increasingly popular and one can but notice how the houses go up, more than one a day, in this city. The Fire County Fair, held this month in Orlando, exhibited a marvelous display of fruit and vegetables, especially considering the frosts earlier in the winter. Joseph Middleton remarked that he had never seen finer poultry, even in New York City fairs. The emphasis is placed on raising hogs and castor oil beans during this year. A serious effort is being made to get rid of the ubiquitous tick by "dipping" the cattle in a bath. There are a few very good herds of graded cattle, but the native stock is forlorn enough. The whole effect of the present time in Florida is promising of steady improvement in almost every direction. We have a little colony of twenty-five families in our corner of this thriving ing borough—who represent the solid citizens of nearly as many States.

Joshua Hurley has very kindly opened the Osceola to Friends on First-day, and the meetings for worship held there are true solemnities. Yesterday Emma Sellew Roberts (the sister of the late editor of THE FRIEND) gave us a striking illustration of the efficacy of prayer. Some twenty years ago, when in London, England, she felt constrained to pray very fervently for the girl widows of India. At that time there did not seem to be any way in which she could help them, although she greatly longed to relieve their sufferings. Within a year seven of these widows came, with the Pandita Ramabai's daughter, to the school with which she was then connected in Southwestern New York and she had the great comfort of teaching and mothering them for several years. They have all returned to India now and are helping Ramabai in her great work of uplift among their own class. Benson Roberts also pointed out the great difference between ecclesiastical and experimental religion, while another speaker quoted from Whittier's "My Psalm":—

No longer forward nor behind
I look in hope or fear;
But, grateful, take the good I find,
The best of now and here.

.....
Enough that blessings, undeserved
Have marked my erring track;
That whoso'er my feet have swerved,
His claspings turned me back.

That more and more a Providence
Of love is understood,
Making the springs of time and sense
Sweet with eternal good;—

That death seems but a covered way
Which opens into light,
Wherein no blinded child can stray
Beyond the Father's sight;

That care and trial seem at last,
Through Memory's sunset air,
Like mountain-ranges overpast,
In purple distance fair.

.....
And so the shadows fall apart,
And so the west winds play;
And all the windows of my heart
I open to the day.

ORLANDO, Fla., Second Month 25, 1918.

NEWS ITEMS.

The letters of Anna J. Haines which we are so kindly permitted to print by the family are deservedly popular with our readers. In addition to the inherent interest of subject matter the sprightly and somewhat playful style certainly adds to their charm. It is intimated to us that the expression in a recent letter in regard to smuggling a maid might easily be misunderstood in these sensitive times. To us it was a very objective way of saying that the inherent domestic difficulties of life in that far-away part of Russia were much lightened by the cheerful, devoted service of a native helper. We feel assured and can assure our readers that no other meaning was intended by the expression.—[Eds.]

At Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, held at Burlington, on the twenty-sixth of Second Month, we were again reminded of the constant need for rededication throughout the Christian's life. One who has not always been a Christian contrasted for us the harsh severity of a god of law with the tender fatherhood of the God of Love.

Even as Christ was sent into the world to minister unto others, so does He send us to serve our fellow-beings, but our lives should first be moulded by His touch. We must become changed men and women if we would bring others to Him. If our individual Christian influence upon our neighbors is not positive, how can we expect our corporate life as a meeting to be felt as it should be in the community? An individual, hungering and thirsting for righteousness, will be so filled with the Spirit of God that he will have a dynamic Christian influence in his community.

A concern that we should more frequently and systematically extend our service and fellowship to the conscientious objectors in the training camps, particularly Camp Dix, was presented in our business session. The meeting approval of the concern and steps were taken to co-operate with Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting for this service in conjunction with the exemption committee of the Representative Meeting.

J. C. M.

FIRST REPORT FROM FRIENDS' WORKERS IN ITALY.

CARTIERA, Chitravalle, Prov. di Ancona.

A fortnight ago Captain Lothrop came to this little place for the first time and found about 900 refugees, some of them wanting help very badly and about 600 living under very bad conditions in this old paper-mill. They are in the enormous galleries of the paper-mill, men, women and children all mixed together, without work, the rooms are generally full of smoke, as they cook on small braziers and there are no chimneys,—he sent me here nearly a fortnight ago, to see whether I could help at all and in the hope of my being able to start a work-room for the women and girls. He is making great improvements with the help of the Prefet of Ancona—the large wards are to be divided up into rooms for the families. There are a number of women and girls who have got separated from their families in their flight from the North—they are to have separate quarters. A refugee grocer's shop is being started to-morrow, at present they have to go into the town, three kilometres off, for everything except bread, and as shoes and cloes are scarce, it is difficult for them in bad weather. I found that some of the men could make "zoccoli" (clogs), and as these are badly needed, a workshop is to be started for making them.

A great many of the women are knitters, and we have got a contract for a thousand pairs of socks to begin with. There is a little house, called the Palazzino, where the owner of the paper-mill used to live. I have installed myself in it with an English girl who was sent from Rome to nurse some of the children with measles, but really the nurse came rather late as the outbreak was nearly over. We got ready two rooms in the Palazzino, and have only four children there at present. The rooms were quite empty, but we got just enough furniture to manage with.

We have just taken the empty cinema theatre in the village of Chitravalle in which to start a work-room, and I wanted to start one here, too, in an empty room of the Palazzino, but don't quite see how I could manage them both.

The refugees are very nice peasant people; they are much poorer than the French refugees, partly because there is no work to be got,—many of them have not changed their clothes since they came here, as they have nothing to change into. I have begun to give away some clothes.

(Signed) RACHEL F. ALEXANDER.
(English Friend.)

COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING.

The following is from Charles T. Hallinan, Executive Secretary of the American Union Against Militarism.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1918.

Members of the Society of Friends who have been fighting the introduction of compulsory military training in the public schools will be interested in the artless remarks the other day of Major General George Barnett, Commandant of the U. S. Marine Corps, before the House Committee on Naval Affairs. Usually when the army experts talk in public about military training for boys, they emphasize the physical benefits which the "lads" will get from it and they carefully conceal all other aspects. Not so General Barnett. His remarks, which escaped the newspapers, are recorded in the Committee Proceedings, Section 7, page 249, and read in full as follows:

GENERAL BARNETT—"Speaking of recruiting, I wish to bring to the attention of the Committee that we are doing one thing in the way of recruiting that is a little out of the ordinary.

"Congressman Butler, of Pennsylvania, brought to the attention of headquarters the fact that the authorities at West Chester, Pennsylvania, had made it obligatory for all male attendants at the public schools to be instructed in military warfare, and at the request of Congressman Butler a sergeant was detailed for this duty. In this way, there was inaugurated, for the first time in American history, compulsory military education at schools. There is no doubt that if this was followed by other communities much good would result therefrom, as it would lay the groundwork for universal military training.

"These headquarters are willing to co-operate in all respects with communities, so far as it is practicable to do so, to provide instructors for this purpose. We expect to get quite a large number of recruits from this school. I know of no better way to forward recruiting than this, because these young men, if they get the military training, when they get old enough you may reasonably count on fifty per cent. of them entering the service. Whether they enter the Marine Corps, the Army or the Navy is immaterial, but they will have the military training and they will be better potential soldiers as well as better citizens in every possible way."

MR. BRITTON—"What is the average age of those pupils in West Chester?"

GENERAL BARNETT—"I understand from sixteen to nineteen years old."

THE CHAIRMAN—"I am not speaking now in criticism, because I approve of that personally, but I want to ask for information, so that it will be in the record. Under what authority of law do you do that?"

GENERAL BARNETT—"Under the recruiting regulations. . . . We are doing it under the general provision for doing everything possible to stimulate recruiting. . . ."

The following is from the Ledger of the eighth. It gives widespread publicity to a valuable testimony:

WASHINGTON, March 7th.

Joshua L. Baily, Jr., of Haverford, Pa., a conscientious objector, who was caught in the draft, mustered into service in the National Army at Camp Meade and then discharged because of physical disability, has refused to retain $155.27 as pay for his military services, it was learned to-day at the Treasury Department. Baily is a member of the Society of Friends.

Following his discharge on the recommendation of army doctors, Baily was forced to accept his pay under the threat of being detained indefinitely in camp. He felt he could not keep the money, because he objected to military service and because he had not earned it. His first thought was to devote it to the Friends' service committee, but he concluded he could not use "even in a good cause money that had been acquired in a questionable way."

Baily sent his pay check to Secretary Baker. It was sent to the Treasurer of the United States and credited to the "general fund."

In a letter which accompanied the check, Baily said:

"My reason for not accepting pay is that I am a conscientious objector and did not military work while I was in camp and so do not feel free to take remuneration for no service rendered, and so did not sign the payroll at all."

The Friend (London) of Second Month 1st (delayed in reaching us) announces the safe arrival home, First Month 24th, of our dear Friends, Alfred Kemp Brown and W. Blair Neatly. The number of the following week received at the same time reports their attendance at the Meeting for Sufferings in London.

NOTICES.

"The Westtown Oral English Exhibitory," which now takes the place of the "Weston Contest," will be held Third Month 16th, at seven-o'clock, at the School.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE TO YOUNG FRIENDS.—Important meeting the Seventh-day afternoon and evening before Yearly Meeting, Third Month 23, 1918. Watch for notice of program and place. All who wish accommodations for Seventh-day night and all living in or near Philadelphia who will take guests for the night, write to Edith Stratton, 20 S. Twelfth Street.

MEETINGS for Worship regularly held at Mansfield, N. J., both on First and Fifth-days, at ten o'clock, will now be held until further notice at the home of John B. Comfort, in Columbus. Monthly Meetings will be held as heretofore at the Meeting-house.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia (Penna. R. R.), at 6.21, 8.21 A. M., and 2.45, 3.35, 4.55 P. M., other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING CONFERENCE ON "THE MINISTRY."—At Media Meeting-house, Third Month 17, 1918, at 2.30 P. M.

PROGRAM.

Devotional Silence—Introductory Remarks.

1.—Living Silence in Worship, by Wilbur W. Kamp.

2.—The Resulting Ministry, by William C. James.

3.—A Symposium of Group Discussions, by Edith Stratton.

4.—An Address—The Ministry, by Rufus M. Jones.

5.—Devotional Period, 20-30 Minutes.

Adjournment.

We earnestly desire the attendance of all interested Friends.

THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP CIRCLES OF PHILADELPHIA will be held in Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on Third-day, Third Month 19, 1918, at 2.30 P. M.

Short addresses on subjects connected with our Christian life and work will be given by Rebecca N. Taylor, Emily Oliver, Sarah B. Leeds, Mary H. Rhoads, Rebecca Carter, Minnie P. Bowles and others.

All women Friends are invited.

LUCY B. ROBERTS,
Chairman.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:

Banks—Boys' Motley.

Coc—Social Theory of Religious Education.

Deep Calleth Unto Deep.

Fabre—Story-book of Science.

Kellogg—Women of Belgium.

King—Ethics of Jesus.

Longstreth—Admirals.

Peake—Critical Introduction to the New Testament.

Wallace—Greater Italy.

Whyte—World's Wonder Stories.

LINDA A. MOORE,
Librarian.

MEETINGS from Third Month 17th to Third Month 23rd:—

Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Western District, Twelfth Street below Market Street, Fourth-day, Third Month 20, at 5 P. M. Business session at 7 P. M.

Muncy, at Greenwood, Fourth-day, Third Month 20, at 10.30 A. M.

Frankford, Fourth-day, Third Month 20, at 7.45 P. M.

Germanstown, Fourth-day, Third Month 20, at 8 P. M.

Haverford, Fifth-day, Third Month 21, at 7.30 P. M.

DIED.—Third Month 1st, at Haddonfield, N. J., ANN FOTHERGILL, aged eighty-seven years; a member of Wilmington Monthly Meeting, Delaware.

—, at High Point, N. C., First Month 1, 1918, CALEB BARKER, son of the late Daniel Barker, in his seventy-sixth year; a member of Deep River Monthly Meeting, N. C.

—, First Month 22, 1918, at his residence, near Tacoma, Ohio, JOSEPH W. PLUMMER, son of Robert and Jane Baily Plummer; a member of Stillwater Monthly Meeting of Friends, Barnesville, Ohio.

—, on Second Month 7, 1918, at the home of her son, Hubert C. Beardsley, Montour Falls, N. Y., MARY C. BEARDSLEY, widow of Stephen R. Beardsley, in the seventy-ninth year of her age; a member of Germanstown Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at the home of her son-in-law, E. J. Hadley, on the third of Second Month, 1918, LYDIA ROBERTS, in her ninety-second year; a member of Hickory Grove Monthly Meeting, Iowa.

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

SPRINGTIME in the Pocono Mountains is ever a delight to those who admire and study nature. The Birds and Flowers are numerous and varied, and the Trout Fishing in the Swiftwater is wonderful.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for Spring Term, 1918:

"The Teaching of Jesus, History of the Hebrew People, and History of Friends," by Elbert Russell.

"An Introduction to Social Work," Frank D. Watson, of Haverford College.

"History of Religion," Jesse H. Holmes, of Swarthmore College.

"History of Foreign Missions," Elihu Grant, of Haverford College.

"Principles of Religious Education," Charles H. Fisher, of Pennsylvania State Normal School, Westchester.

Spring Term, Fourth Month 1 to Sixth Month 8, 1918.

Send Applications for information or for admission to

ELBERT RUSSELL, Director,
WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

WM. H. FILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL PHONE: Baring 2084-X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL PHONE: Filbert 2666.

Assoc. M. Am. Soc. C. E.

Bell Phone—Lombard 3422

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped,
prompt and efficient

338 S. LAWRENCE ST. : : PHILA.

Hajoca

Pedestal Lavatory

Simple and beautiful in design. Its plain, smooth surfaces are easy to keep clean. Equipped with the Hajoca Waste, which prevents backing up of residue from previous ablutions.

Come see our model bathrooms. Our showrooms are within easy reach of City Hall. Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES
& CADBURY CO.
1130-1144 Ridge

Ave.

(at 12th and Spring Garden Streets)

W. B. WEAVER

UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST., PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10:30 A. M. Any other time by appointment and Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila., and Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE

THE ESTAUGH

HADDONFIELD,

NEW JERSEY

Two vacancies—apply to

ANNA EASTBURN WILLIAMS, Haddonfield, N. J.

OUR aim is to make our customers feel that the Holmes Press is their plant. We have room for a few more such proprietors.

THE HOLMES PRESS

J. Linton, Engr. Pres.
1336 Cherry Street, Philadelphia

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. Cor. Sixth and Race Streets

Special attention given to Friends' Funerals

Bell 'Phone : Spruce 1646

APPLE BUTTER

WE STILL have a few dozen two quart Jars only, at 75 cents per jar, by Parcel Post or Express in packages to suit orders. Send orders promptly, while they last. Past favors appreciated.

ELWOOD BALDERSON,
COLORA, CECIL CO. MARYLAND

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest Herd in United States

Established 1883

Specially attractive prices just now owing to change in business arrangements

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO

Importers and Breeders

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mimeographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Type-writing, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION OF Friends of Philadelphia, needs a young woman teacher for the Girls' School, Tokyo, Japan, also a man and wife to work among the young men and students from the Japanese Universities. Any who feel a call to either of these positions will please communicate with

ELLEN W. LONGSTRETH,

Chairman Candidates' Committee.

Penn St., Bryn Mawr, Pa., Second Month 21, 1918.

FOR RENT—EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED COTTAGE, bath, open plumbing, hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several meals daily. Half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are nine or more invalids in family. Meals must be taken at Maplewood.

Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES,

Jamestown, R. I.

WANTED—IN MEDIA, PA., BEFORE THIRD Month (July): three rooms, furnished or unfurnished, with board for three adults; give location, terms and size of family. References exchanged.

Address: P. S., "THE FRIEND,"

207 Walnut Place, Philadelphia.

JANSDOWNE FRIENDS' SCHOOL WILL NEED for the academic year 1918-1919 a teacher for the sixth and seventh grades. Experience in these grades is required. Application may be made to the Principal, ELEANOR S. ECROYD,

Lansdowne, Pa.

FOR RENT FROM SIXTH MONTH 1 TO NINTH " Month 30, 1918, furnished home on Haverford College campus. Nine rooms, two baths, garage.

R. W. KELSEY, Haverford, Pa.

WANTED—A COMPANION FOR AN ELDERLY woman Friend in a nice home.

Apply P., "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—BY ONE OF EXPERIENCE, A POSITION as companion nurse for invalid, or managing housekeeper for elderly person or couple. Some desk work, sewing or other light duties might be included.

Address M., "THE FRIEND."

Safety and Yield In Investments

MANY short-term notes of ample security offer, at present prices, an unusually liberal yield.

Well-known issues of such securities can now be bought at prices to yield from 5.60% to well above 7%.

Send for Circular PF-156

The National City Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.,
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

Cheyney Institute

offers an opportunity each year to one hundred picked colored youths to train themselves in leadership. No people have a more just claim on the sympathy and help of others than those colored people who have faith in the future of their race through wise training.

Cheyney Institute offers this training and has proved by its graduates that it merits generous support.

The Managers endeavor to administer the Trust they have assumed, but must look to Friends and others for financial assistance in the work for these one hundred young men and women.

The Institute also offers a unique course for teachers in its Summer School. Most of the Eastern and Southern States are represented at this School and testimonials of the advantages gained from the Summer courses would satisfy the most skeptical.

Leslie P. Hill, Principal, is always ready to offer timely suggestions to any who have it on their hearts to assist in the laudable work that is carried on at Cheyney.

Because of the conditions which must be met, if the School is to continue its good work, the Board of Managers feel free to request Friends to include Cheyney among the charities with which they contribute, and ask that checks shall be drawn in favor of and mailed to

WILLIAM BIDDLE, Treasurer,
119 S. Fourth St., Philadelphia.

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

GIRARD TRUST CO.

BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian,
Administrator, Assignee and Receiver.
Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults.
Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESTNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

*Phone. Spruce 3032

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Rice 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 40 years. Medical 13

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental
ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundehar Wilton

"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

THE DOMESTIC ELECTRIC VACUUM CLEANER

PRICE, $30.00
with attachments, $38.00

The full size guaranteed carpet sweeper brush makes this the most efficient cleaner on the market today.
Solves the Sweeping Problem in the home or institution.
Ten days' free trial.
Time payments at the cash price.

Send for Booklet

F. W. HOFFMAN & CO.
35 S. Fourth St. - PHILA.
ALSO FULL LINE OF HAND CLEANERS

Genealogist

Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
52 E. Stockton St., Trenton, N. J.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 21, 1918.

No. 38.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"I saw an ocean of darkness and death, but I saw an infinite ocean of life and light flow over the ocean of darkness and death—And in this I saw the goodness of God."

GEORGE FOX.

AGAIN, THE YEARLY MEETING.

A few decades ago, the approach of the "annual solemnity" brought into the families of Friends resident in Philadelphia a considerable stir of preparation for the entertainment of guests. No small responsibility rested on the matrons of those households to insure the competent management and provisioning of the domestic establishment, and in many cases to carry a share of the labors and concerns of the meeting as well. It was not an easy week for those who thus dispensed hospitality and at the same time put their shoulders to the burdens of the Church; but the memories and influences of the social and religious privileges which those circumstances made possible, remain in the mind as a grateful tonic to many who shared in them and in the fellowship of which they were a token.

"Times are altered" now,—not altogether for the worse; and the changes in residence, in business systems and conditions, and in traveling facilities (not to speak of other changes) have greatly modified certain phases of our lives, and very noticeably that of the social practices above indicated. Yet fellowship and acquaintance and common purpose must continue, as fundamental to effective organization, and these do not depend chiefly upon the advantages of outward opportunities. Interest and forethought may still be engaged, and will hardly be wanting in those who are concerned for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem. Not in many years has the Yearly Meeting assembled under such actual stress of circumstances as has now fallen upon us, and doubtless many people are looking toward its gatherings with interested expectancy,—some, too, with much solicitude on divers accounts. To these latter perhaps applies the admonition, "Be not anxious for the morrow," although while endeavoring to avoid corroding anxieties they must not refuse the burdens appointed them to bear. Whatever help may be derived from any preliminary conferences or associations, we are not likely to give too much place to individual concentration upon the indwelling word for "light and leading" in these serious times. "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."

In connection with the subject of these thoughts, some remarks in the letters of dear Richard Shackleton* seem to have a "fitting place." Through the somewhat quaint diction, a sweet, refined spirit, a discerning mind and a deep experience still speak to us after all the changes of more than a century; and a few of his observations are so beautiful and suggestive, so appropriate to our present situation, that they are here offered for notice and consideration.

"We have all need," he writes, "to witness a taking deeper root in the ground of Divine love, . . . that when the world speaks trouble, Christ Jesus may speak peace to our tossed minds. . . . As men and women we are fallible, and diversified as to tempers, habits, and dispositions, so that even the children of the heavenly family may differ in sentiments and opinions about earthly things; but as these cannot live without getting their food in due season, their participation together at the Lord's table renews their amity and brotherly kindness."

"In music there are not only different chords and strings, but stops and pauses. Let us seek to be ordered and modulated by the soul of harmony, Divine love; and if we cannot go forward in service, and find our own minds not under present qualification to help others, let us stand still till we renewedly feel and know that good is present with us. Thus minding our stops and movings, the locking and unlocking of the key which opens and none can shut, and shuts and none can open, we shall walk wisely and usefully in our several lots in life."

Although the expressions above quoted may be accepted mainly as general truths, they may also have a special application to the conduct of the affairs of the church. On this subject Richard Shackleton observes, "I want a current of life to bear our discipline along; then we should feel as joints and sinews to one another, then we should be united as fellow-laborers, . . . and these seasons would be seasons of Divine refreshment and renewal of strength." Again, referring to the gifts "in the heavenly storehouse," he points out the necessity of a preparation of the ground of the heart in order that these may be received, and he further remarks upon the service and advantage of each one's exercising his own gift, whatever that may be. "The variety of gifts," says he, "like the variety of chords in David's harp, constitutes the harmony, more sublime and beautiful than a dull monotony."

In a letter to an intimate friend, he expresses the fervent desire that they might individually watch and be sober, enlarging upon the injunction in this manner:—"watch, and take heed to ourselves lest we should at any time be entrapped, and enter into the temptations of an insidious adversary; . . . be sober, solid and deep in our dwelling, that we may be preserved from being intoxicated with the fumes of our own imagination; but being religiously temperate and clear, may be favored to see our several lots and services; to step quietly into them, and having done or suffered according to the Divine Will, to the best of our understanding, may refer ourselves and the whole of our conduct to Him that sees and judges rightly."

*One of this name and confessing to this ancestry has recently attended the meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets.

Richard Shackleton set a high value upon true culture, and we would not now by any means neglect or overlook those helps that are derived from natural endowments, duly sanctified and dedicated; but surely no cultivation of these can supersede the necessity of being "solid and deep in our dwelling," as well as temperate in our spirits, if we would become clear in judgment and serviceable in our undertakings.

M. W.

FOR THOSE WHO SPEAK TO BUSINESS IN YEARLY MEETING.

Stephen Grellet, in his Memoirs, speaking of his traveling companion in England, George Stacy, the younger, says: "I have seldom met with one more guarded in his religious movements; nor do I recollect to have heard him speak more than once on any subject in his own meetings for discipline. I told him what I had observed, he replied, 'I think it is proper for me before I speak on any subject to endeavor to have a right sense of it in its various bearings, and then to know that it is my duty to speak upon it; if so, I consider that I ought to do it in as brief, but as clear manner as I can; having done so, I leave it to the meeting to judge and act; if Friends should not see as I do my repeating the same thing, would not be better understood, nor alter their own views.'"

AN OPEN LETTER.

TO OUR MEMBERSHIP.

Approved for publication by the Special Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, of Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, appointed to assist and counsel those Friends who might be drafted, or need help, on that account.

Signed on behalf of said Committee,

JESSE EDGERTON.

While more has been said and written in recent time in regard to the war than on any other subject perhaps, yet we feel in this time of crisis, a desire and concern to do what we can to encourage our membership to such a course of clear thinking, and right living, as will enable us, through holy help, to lay hold of the precious promise of our Divine Master, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. xviii: 20).

In the remarks we may make, it is our desire to make it clear to all that we do not consider that our conscientious convictions are binding upon others, or that we are able or willing to sit in judgment upon the conscience of another; willing, rather to accord to others the same liberty of conscience which we ask for ourselves. It is with this feeling in our minds that we wish to encourage all our young Friends, of conscription age, to seek daily for ability to "Have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men." (Acts xxiv: 16). We believe that such a living concern will enable us to "Renounce the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God." (2 Cor. iv: 2). We believe that as you are thus engaged, in singleness of heart, to keep close to your Divine Guide, that He will be a "Spirit of Judgment" to you, enabling you to walk so inoffensively in His sight as to merit the attention and regard of those in whose care or company you may be placed; and if you are brought into military environment, may the innocence of your daily lives, in these new and strange conditions win for you a kindly attention and careful consideration of your needs and your feelings. And it has seemed to us, as we have thought over the trying situation in which you are, or may be placed, that your safety and peace of mind will be promoted by a firm and faithful though gentle refusal to perform such service as your consciences do not approve.

We believe that auxiliary service, in camp or hospital, instead of contributing to your comfortable getting along, will, if undertaken, result in difficulty. The officers will understand that if you are induced to perform service which will release some one else to go to the front, it is nearly equivalent to doing the fighting, barring a degree of danger. Then if the new recruit is prevailed upon to do some auxiliary service, being a part of the military machine, he will, in all probability, be pressed into military work still further.

It has been interesting to learn, that at Camp Sherman, the C. O.'s who have steadfastly declined either to wear the uniform or perform service under military orders fared better than those who at first were willing to do some of the work which was assigned them, and later found it harder to refuse, when things they could not conscientiously perform were demanded of them. It has been a comfort to notice the greater leniency shown to the conscientious objector now than in the time of the Civil War; and it seems to us that the greater consideration now shown is a legacy from the faithfulness of our worthy Friends of that generation, in setting up and adhering to a high standard of obedience to apprehended duty.

In that time of trying the souls of men there were many heroic examples of devotion to principle and loyalty to the higher requirements of duty among our membership, both in the north and south, which have doubtless had their influence in bringing about more humane treatment for a conscientious objector whose obedience to the Divine law was more important than his obedience to military authority.

We believe that to-day, the President and Secretary of War are pretty well informed as to the grounds on which Friends refuse military service. We are hoping that our consistency in avoiding all kinds of alternative service, if faithfully followed, will not only be a credit to our young Friends, but may result in some advantage to those conscientious objectors who belong to religious organizations that are not recognized in the Government plans of exemption. Our sympathies go out to these, and if the faithfulness of our members may be helpful in fortifying them for suffering,—in bearing a testimony for the Prince of Peace, will it not be some compensation? And who shall say that those who are able and willing to stand uncompromisingly as Friends, in this great world-war, are not performing a service for generations yet to come equal to that done by Friends who suffered unflinchingly for conscience' sake during previous wars! To us it seems a delicate and difficult problem to offer to the conscientious objector any kind of service in lieu of military service, as it seems to us a compromise with evil! Hospital and Red Cross activities are so interwoven with the fabric of war that it seems impossible to participate in the one without encouraging the other.

May we ever, dear Friends, be concerned to keep our consciences clear, and susceptible to the enlightening influences of Divine Grace, willing to be taught thereby, and if so be, led to adopt the spirit of this beautiful stanza of one of Whittier's poems:

"The leveled gun, the battle brand,
We may not take;
But calmly loyal we may stand,
And suffer with our suffering land,
For conscience' sake!"

"We never know for what God is preparing us in His schools—for what work in the hereafter. Our business is to do our work well in the present place, whatever that may be."

WORK OF THE PHILADELPHIA PEACE COMMITTEE.

The approach of our Yearly Meeting and the preparation of annual reports, seem to bring to us a sense of the accountability of our various committees as to work accomplished, and its value in proportion to the expenditure connected with it.

When our Yearly Meeting's Peace Committee was first appointed, and in the months that followed, there was some expression of disappointment that the Committee was "not doing more work," and this may have been because of the failure to realize that in such a large group of people—all interested in peace work, but unused to working together—some time must be spent in harmonizing and planning the lines of action.

The second year of its appointment has therefore been more fruitful of results, even in the midst of a trying period, with such rapidly changing conditions in our own country. Though bulletins are now being distributed to local representatives we have felt that some further report of recent undertakings might be of interest.

The line between the Peace Committee and the American Friends' Service Committee has puzzled some Friends. And, indeed, it is a rather indefinite boundary; frequently crossed. Perhaps the two bodies are best described as two machines, running side by side, doing the same kind of work, but differently geared.

The Peace work of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was so fully organized before the Service Committee began its work that it seemed unwise to change plans already well established. So it has come about that some parts of our work are best done through the Social Service Committee, and some through our own organization. There is a small group of members belonging to both, and keeping us bound together in detail of action, as we are in aim, and in enthusiasm for the work.

One result of it all, and one that can not fail to affect the future of our religious Society, is the cementing effect of a common interest in a good cause; of learning to work together and to work effectively. We have been long trained to be faithful to the individual "concern," and for this we can not be too thankful. Yet if we would serve our own "day and generation" we must learn something of organization, and of those two much-used words of our own time "efficiency" and "standardizing."

To this end much valuable work has been done in the department of sewing and knitting for war-victims and for our young men in the Reconstruction Service. There are active groups in many localities, and the past winter has seen a wonderful growth in the amount of work done. The use of patterns specially cut for us, the purchase of material through the Central Office, the carefully prepared bulletins, and thorough inspection before shipping, have greatly aided in procuring for the war-sufferers not only such garments as we like to make, but such as they like to receive.

It is significant as a proof of the advantage of centralized buying and cutting, that, in the case of the six groups of Friends in Ohio who are working through us for the Reconstruction work, about four dollars are saved by goods being sent to them, made up, and returned to the office, over what the same work would cost if materials were bought at retail.

The buying in quantity is not only cheaper, but the right kind of goods, of uniform quality is procured, and this can be stored until needed.

Ready-cut garments and material are furnished without any stated cost. Some groups repay by deducting the money from local contributions to the Peace Committee. Some collect small dues, and purchase buttons, thread, etc.

We have, besides the groups, individual workers whose help is much appreciated. It is interesting that in some neighborhoods there is a considerable number of people who are not Friends who prefer our work to that done for soldiers and their families by the Red Cross. As one woman said, "There are more people working for the soldiers, and they will be taken care of. I like to work for the war-sufferers."

At one of our meetings, the story was told of an elderly German woman who had been turned away from a Red Cross sewing group, because they were afraid she would "put something in the bundles." Being told by a Friend to come and join their group at the meeting-house, and that she would be trusted there, she replied: "Yes, I'll come, and sew for the Belgians."

One of the most interesting lines of work now opening before us is being done by the sub-committee on Social Service in the way of helping Germans to find employment, who would otherwise have been kept in the penitentiary or in internment.

A large field of service seems to be opening, and the service of several volunteers might be used by the Committee. District Attorney Kane has expressed his satisfaction that Friends are willing to help these people who, he feels, are not dangerous to the community before they are interned, but may easily become so afterward if no positions can be found for them, and public feeling is aroused against them.

We expect much from the food conservation work this year if it can be started earlier than it was a year ago, and the interest of local groups can be aroused and held. Canning and drying will, we hope, be carried on even more extensively and efficiently than last year and Friends who are willing to lead this work in their own neighborhoods, or who are likely to offer the use of land, or contributions of fruit or vegetables, are encouraged to send in their names as soon as convenient, to James M. Moon, Chairman of the Agricultural Committee.

The question of our getting into closer fellowship with the other religious bodies, maintaining a testimony for Peace, has been before us at different times, and a sub-committee has lately been appointed for this purpose. Our young men have been closely associated with theirs in some of the camps, and the desire is that we may become mutually helpful by closer association.

The usual Peace Meeting will be held during Yearly Meeting week, following, as it did last year, the presentation of our Annual Report.

The hope has been expressed that this meeting may strengthen us for whatever may lie before us in the way of service to a war-stricken world, and also in re-affirming our faith in "the better way" of love, which seems so often over-ruled by the way of force. We need to draw closely together and afresh to dedicate our hearts and lives to whatever measure of service may be ours in advancing the kingdom of the "Prince of Peace."
F. T. R.

STANDARDS OF EFFICIENCY.

CHARLES W. PALMER.

Modern life has become so exceedingly complex that it has been necessary to organize business and the other secular activities along lines that will secure the greatest results for a given amount of human endeavor. Science and invention have come to our aid, rendering incalculable service in reducing the amount of physical human effort. There still remains, however, that mental effort by which man must guide and control those activities on which our lives depend. Regarding both the physical and mental activities of man there is no one word that fits as frequent use as efficiency.

The efficiency of a factory demands the greatest output for a given cost, or the minimum cost for unit of output. The efficiency of a railroad demands that trains run with safety and on schedule, that rolling stock and roadbed be kept in repair and that merchandise be handled with despatch. The efficiency of a city government demands a guarantee for the citizens of all those conditions that make for right living in the community. The efficiency of a school demands effectual instruction of the pupils in healthful surroundings and with a minimum cost. The efficiency of the individual demands the maximum results from his physical and mental efforts.

With our thoughts and actions so constantly leading us along the road to efficiency in these matters, it is but natural that we should tend to carry the same ideal over into our spiritual life. This is a tendency which may result in great harm, a danger against which we should be warned, a danger against which we should consistently struggle.

It is reported that some members of a congregation were met together to discuss some of the problems of the church. One member arose and calling attention to the large number of "unchurched" people in the community and in the country at large, decried the inefficiency of the church. He was a successful business man and argued for the adoption of the methods of business in the church. This man was effectually answered by another man, who said in effect: "It is true that we all deplore the large number of people who have no church interests. But they cannot be brought into the church by the adoption of business methods. That has been tried. On the other hand, the very inefficiency of the church is its greatest glory. All the rules of business efficiency would demand that only those of greatest talents and highest training should be employed in the work of the church. But the church has not so worked. It has had a place and a usefulness for its poorest and its weakest, and has thus sought to bring about their highest spiritual development. The church has failed only with the failure of those members who have failed of a dynamic faith and faithfulness."

I believe that this man saw things aright. Our ideas of efficiency if carried to the limit would demand the substitution of an absolute monarchy for our democracy. But none of us would welcome the change. The happiness and the highest development of men and women as citizens demand that they each and every one be given a place in determining the governmental actions. The history of the monarchies of the world points an obvious lesson. A democracy is inefficient, but therein lies its greatest glory, as millions of immigrants to America would testify.

And so where the spiritual life of men and women is at stake the democracy of the church is its greatest glory, and the highly democratic form of organization in our branch of the church is, I believe, one of the greatest contributions of early Friends to the spiritual advance of the world.

History again has pointed the way for us. Moses, Joseph, Samuel, Gideon, David, Isaiah, Jeremiah, the Disciples. "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, but rich in faith, to be heirs of the kingdom?" and to do His works in the world?

Our Saviour mingled with the common people and delivered to them His Divine messages of comfort and forgiveness and guidance. By all the laws of efficiency, the whole course of the Reformation should have been accurately planned and carried forward, not by a poor monk, but by the best possible talent the world could choose. But it began by Martin Luther's faithfulness to the immediate duty. The rise of the Society of Friends came about, not by any human plan, but by faithfulness of George Fox and his co-laborers to that same call to duty. "Methodism" spread over the world, not by the formation of a plan, but by the great dynamic of a vision of duty.

No, organization for "business efficiency" is not the way to bring about the "spiritual efficiency" of the church, but that deep experience whereby men are born again into a Christlike faith and faithfulness to the revelation of God's will in the secret of the heart. This will be the force, as it always has been the force, which has led men to the Saviour and to associate themselves in fellowship with His followers in the earth.

Certain activities of the corporate body of the church can and must be organized under committees which will naturally follow the rules of business procedure, but with this work, as with the more spiritual activities of the church, we must always remember that it is God's work, to be done as in His sight, with His immediate guidance, and with an assurance that as it is thus done, He will bless it to our increase of life and to the increase of His Kingdom in the world.

To give one's self so entirely to activities that one has no time for his soul, no leisure for inward growth, no opportunity to let the springs of life fill and fertilize the spirit, is to make a dismal failure of life, no matter how unselfish the activities may be.

DISASTERS.*

This little book is a plea for preparedness in advance of the great calamities of flood, fire and wreck, which, scattered and beyond control as they seem, are in reality startlingly frequent and destructive. What the Red Cross did at the sinking of the Titanic, the Cherry coal mine fire, the 1913 Ohio Valley flood, and the Triangle Shirtwaist Factory, is described in detail and a summary chapter gives the general principles underlying relief work for sudden disasters. The treatment of the family as a unit and according to its own special needs is the first great principle, and the rapid abolition of the bread-line and the refugee camp for the permanent constructive measures, with their house to house canvassing and inevitable information card, is the first great problem. The emergency committee springs up, one hardly knows how, in the very midst of the stupefaction of despair, and it is succeeded by some permanent agency. This agency is plainly, as the author says, the American Civilian Red Cross, for it has branches everywhere, it can supply nurses and social workers on a moment's notice, and it had the experience gained in past catastrophes. But this book is invaluable in order to form an intelligent public opinion and to train volunteer citizens all over the country for co-operation in such unexpected and terrific accidents as the Halifax disaster, which may fall upon the smallest village or the most prosperous.

LYDIA C. CADBURY.

RECONSTRUCTION AND RELIEF WORK BEHIND THE LINES.

M. L. BAIKER.

READ AT A JOINT MEETING OF FRIENDS IN SALEM, OHIO.

We have reached a crisis in the world's history. That is universally admitted. It is one of those pivotal points around which all history will revolve. The fundamentals of society are being shaken. Those forms of faith and practice which we have come to regard as fundamental are being tested, as perhaps they have never been tested before. We are individually conscious of this.

As members of a religious society which has for over two hundred and fifty years forbidden participation in war, in any form, we are, especially at a time like the present, likely to be held in reproach for our attitude on all things military. We may, as has often occurred in the past history of the Society, be compelled to suffer punishment and indignities for our refusal to comply with military requisitions, or to aid in the carrying out of the military program.

Under these circumstances it is not sufficient to explain that we believe war, under any circumstances to be utterly un-Christian in character and consequently ineffective as a means of advancing the ultimate interests of mankind. The world is not satisfied with mere academic discussions of belief. It is even impatient of them. We are reaping, as we are told, not what we have sown, but what those who have gone before us have sown. It is a time for action. We care not what you believe, what are you going to do? That is the challenge which the world is flinging in the face of the conscientious objector, in our military camps, and to us who with him feel that there is a better way. If the faith that is in us can not meet this challenge, the world has a right to doubt our sincerity.

It is something to be able to refuse an assignment of duty under military law, because we recognize our allegiance to a Higher Law, but when confronted with the question, "What would you do?" "What would the world do if all thought as you think?" It is not enough that we should reply, "Well, in that case, there would be no war." We must assume a positive attitude of unselfish service instead of a negative attitude of belief.

However thoroughly, however reverently our convictions may be grounded, this can be no time for mental, physical or spiritual loafers. It is a time for action and the world has a right to expect it. It is a time which demands the best that is in us, not of belief, but of service. It has been said that the world needs more of Christianity. True, but it must be a religion which finds its expression through constructive effort.

*"Disasters and the American Red Cross in Disaster Relief." By J. Byron Deacon. Russell Sage Foundation, N. Y.; 75 cents.

We may say that "Kultur", whether it be American or German, if it be at all worthy of the name, can only be developed through the operation of spiritual rather than of physical forces.

We may say that the co-called superman and the super-nation will never find their realization, except in the peaceful followers of Christ rather than of Nietzsche and Bernhardi. We will be met with the objection that German Kultur is even now being forced down the throat of an unwilling world. "What are you going to do about it?" We reply that Christ not only demonstrated the peaceful character of His Kingdom by making the supreme sacrifice, notwithstanding that He had all power to prevent its accomplishment through a resort to physical forces, but He did more. His whole life was filled with the power of His ministration to the physical, mental and spiritual needs of the people; to the lame and halt and the blind, without discrimination. It was a constructive ministry and Christianity has lived while human institutions and human governments have fallen into ruin.

"What are you going to do about it?"

A very definite answer to this question should be given. We owe it to humanity; we owe it to Quakerism; we owe it to ourselves. We believe that an answer is given to these demands in the relief and reconstruction work which is being taken up under the auspices of the American Friends' Service Committee. We believe that it is an answer which is not only consistent but vital to the interests of Quakerism, because it is a contribution toward the ideal of "Peace on earth."

Why, it may be objected, if you have a practical solution for the ills of mankind, did you wait until the world is torn and bleeding to apply it? However indignantly we may deny the imputation, however vividly we may recall the labors of the past, we can but confess, in sack cloth and ashes, that the liberties which we have enjoyed have been bought for us, not by us. Our own expenditure of energy, of service and of suffering has not been commensurate with the freedom and ease which we have enjoyed. We have pursued the even tenor of our way forgetful of the obligations which liberty imposes. But it is not too late.

To us it seems inconceivable, when humanity is bleeding; when physical and mental torture is being suffered by millions of our fellow-beings, that we should close our eyes, turn our backs or even remain indifferent, for fear our motives may be misconstrued; for fear that it might be said of us that we are playing the game of conscientious objectors, we are merely trying to strike an easy bargain.

At a time when the fires of hate and of brutal passion are raging, the work of relief and reconstruction, which is being undertaken by Friends is surely a step in the direction of reconciliation. It is of importance for at least three reasons.

First, because the world needs it. Second, because Quakerism needs it. Third, because we individually need it.

The world needs it first, because of the actual distress due to the devastation of war. Second, because it is a phase of relief work which is relatively neglected, and third, because of the efficiency with which the work is administered.

Quakerism needs it, first because it is humanitarian, constructive in character and hence in line with the Society's historical testimony against war. Second, because it furnishes a common platform upon which the different branches of Friends may merge their efforts toward the realization of a constructive Christianity.

We need it individually because it will broaden our own horizon and teach us the joy of service and the smallness of selfish interests in the face of humanity's need.

The world needs this service as our contribution toward that restoration to which thoughtful people are, even now, looking forward with hope. Those who have, in any measure, kept pace with events in Europe can not but realize, in some degree, the awful devastation which has been wrought in the wake of the contending armies. The old and infirm, the women and children, who have been left at home to carry the greatly increased burdens, which the war has heaped upon them, have had their homes, their lands, their business destroyed and millions of them have been cast adrift, without the barest necessities of life. Can we imagine what this would mean to us?

It is the mission of the American Friends' Service Committee, co-operating with a similar organization in England, and with the civil branch of the American Red Cross, to do all in its power to relieve these conditions; to provide clothing, food, shelter, medical attendance and all things calculated to relieve the sufferings of a war-stricken people. To supply houses, and needed furniture for them, farm machinery, seeds and employment, to the end that new cheer may be given to face the tasks of the future.

The work of these organizations of Friends is recognized as highly efficient and has had the endorsement of both the British and French governments. Its efficiency is largely increased owing to the low cost of administration. The hundreds of trained workers are giving their time without compensation, thus permitting every possible dollar to do its work of mercy.

Inadequate as it is to meet the great needs of the situation, it is understood that the work conducted by the Friends is the largest single agency devoted to the relief of the civil population behind the lines. The character of the service should appeal to all, but especially to Friends and to all persons, who regard war as un-Christian in character. It is constructive, healing, not destructive in its effects, building friendships, not tearing them down.

Again Quakerism needs this service for its own sake. It offers a common platform upon which we ought to unite for a common cause; to merge our efforts toward the realization of a constructive Christianity. If, when the war is over, we have not learned, individually and collectively, to rub elbows with our neighbor, to seek for the points of contact, rather than of difference, the war will have been vain, in so far as Quakerism is concerned. Would it be any wonder if the voice of Peace could not be heard, if those who cry "Peace, Peace," can not work together in Christian fellowship for its accomplishment?

Denominational peace, industrial peace, national peace, international brotherhood, can never be promoted by erecting barriers between those who are seeking a common goal.

Again Quakerism needs this service in order that it may gain a new vision of its responsibilities to society.

Our liberties, our privileges, our exemptions, have been bought for us, not by us. We are in danger of accepting them as something which is ours by right of inheritance. We may cherish the memory of those who have borne the marks of physical suffering for conscience' sake, but unless we can, in a measure, share in those sacrifices what does it profit us? That peace for which the world is craving, can neither be realized nor maintained by anything less than a submerging of selfish interests for the sake of the common good.

We need, individually, the stimulus which this form of service will afford, for the same reason that we need it collectively; to broaden our own horizon; to teach us the joy of service and the smallness of our own selfish interests in the face of humanity's need. This is the essence of real democracy. It is a patriotism, if you please, which is too broad to be confined within any geographical lines. It is the opposite from war. It has been declared that when war steps in democracy steps out. The two are incompatible.

Our President has given expression to a noble ideal, that the "World must be made safe for democracy." Can it ever be achieved until democracy is made safe for Christianity?

Surely true democracy involves, not the conquest of peoples but of the individual heart.

There could be no more fitting time than the present, when the foundation of civilization seems to be rocking under our feet, that Quakerism as a body should re-docker "its place in the sun;" that it should not only absorb the rays of spiritual warmth but that it should again radiate them in a spirit of consecrated service. If Quakerism, as a whole, can but rise to the needs of the hour for service in the interest of a common humanity; if we will but do this in a spirit of self-sacrifice commensurate with that shown by thousands of soldiers in the field, who have chosen a different method of warfare, I believe that we will not only strengthen our traditional testimony against war, but will go far toward demonstrating to the world our faith in a constructive citizenship.

SALEM, Ohio, Third Month 6, 1918.

THE UNFAILING PROMISER.

Christ's promise to His disciples:—"If ye shall ask anything in My name, that will I do." (John xiv: 14.)

We take Thy promise, Lord, whate'er we ask
In Thy blest name, it shall be done, by Thee.
What shall we ask? Our needs are very great
And what is very best we cannot see.

Thou, Lord, hast sight and wisdom and all love,
So Thy dear will be done, we only crave.
This reaches to the limit of our need,
We trust our Saviour who delights to save.

—S. J. T.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A LITTLE ENCOURAGEMENT TO FAITHFULNESS.

"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness for they shall be filled." Dear Friends, what a favor it would be if the exercises and trials of faith of the present day, permitted by an Allwise Overruling Providence, should cause us more and more to realize that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. May our hearts become contrited and prepared to receive the pure, unchangeable truth for ourselves, from the true Source and Fountain of all good, causing us to hunger and thirst after righteousness that we may be filled.

"I am the way, the truth and the life," said our dear Saviour, "and whosoever cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." How encouraging is this language to all His sincere followers. They seek to know the truth themselves, humbly abiding, faithful to the manifestations of the Holy Spirit in their hearts.

Oh! that people everywhere would more and more seek after this true wisdom, for they that seek shall find. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," but how long does it seem to take some to realize this for themselves, although professing to be followers of the Prince of Peace. May we especially who are of the same household of faith be encouraged at the little evidences we see of a deepening in the true life. As there is an abiding in the faith once delivered to the saints, whether older or younger, we can see eye to eye in all important matters, love and sympathy filling our hearts. May the number of such as these be increased among our dear younger members, and may there be a greater willingness to spend and be spent for the precious cause of Truth and righteousness in the earth, as inwardly revealed to them.

Although the work of righteousness is peace and the effects of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever, yet at times it may be through much tribulation that the faithful enter the Kingdom. What a favor it is, dear friends, that we have such a compassionate Saviour to be with us in our trials and exercises of faith. He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin, and never said to the wrestling seed of Jacob seek ye my face in vain. Then let us be encouraged in humility and watchfulness to be lovingly concerned for the truth and for each other's everlasting welfare the remainder of our days.

I believe some of us realize that we have nothing to glory in but our infirmities, and yet we can thankfully say that goodness and mercy have followed us all our days. Dear friends, let us hold the truth in an even balance—as did our worthy forefathers in the earlier days of our Society—and as many faithful ones have done since. Let us be encouraged to hold fast our confidence in Him, the Prince of Peace, who has been sufficient, that we may be favored to experience Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day and forever, and through the love and mercy of our Heavenly Father be prepared to abide in the house of the Lord forever.

JOSHUA P. SMITH.

GIBSON, Iowa, Third Month 5, 1918.

ALL friends and brethren everywhere, now is the day of your trial, and now is the time for you to be valiant, and to see that the testimony of the Lord doth not fall. For now is the day of exercise of your gifts, of your patience, and of your faith. Now is the time to be armed with patience, with the light, and with the righteousness, and with the helmet of salvation. And now is the trial of the slothful servant who hides his talent and will judge Christ hard. Now, happy are they that can say, the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, and He gives the increase; and therefore, who takes it from you? Is it not the Lord still that suffers it? For the Lord can try you as He did Job, whom He made rich, whom He made poor, and whom He made rich again, who still kept his integrity in all conditions. So learn Paul's lesson. In all states to be content; and have his faith, that nothing is able to separate us from the love of God, which we have in Christ Jesus. . . . So keep your tabernacles that there ye may see the glory of the Lord appear at the doors thereof. And be faithful; for ye see what the worthies and valiants of the Lord did attain unto by faith. And in this neither powers, principalities, nor thrones, dominions, nor angels, nor things present, nor things to come, nor heights, nor depths, nor death, mockings, nor spoiling of goods, nor prisons, nor letters, were able to separate them from the love of God which they had in Christ Jesus.

Friends:—In that which convinceth you wait, that you may have that removed you are convinced of. And all my dear friends, dwell in the life and love and power and wisdom of God, in unity one with another and with God. And the peace and wisdom of God fill all your hearts, that nothing may rule in you, but the life which stands in the Lord God.—Copied from the "Life and Writings of George Fox," for THE FRIEND, by Isaac Evans.

A NAMELESS PROPHET WHO KEPT FRESH GOD'S NAME.—

The last voice to speak for four hundred years—Malachi—sends a beam of light down through the centuries and keeps awake in the hearts of his people the hope of the coming of the Messiah. Read the stirring message of this prophet. It is an ancient message, but it fits marvelously into the spiritual needs of this day. Notice how it emphasizes the necessity of keeping alive the spirit of communion with God; how it vitalizes faith; how it magnifies the things of the spirit; how it gives courage to the waiting heart; how it denounces sin and glorifies righteousness. Is there not a good suggestion that will make for closer co-operation among Christians in those words: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another"? What is the real value of Christian testimony? Is it not to put one on record with reference to the faith and to encourage others who are of like spiritual desires and purposes?

Is it not profitable to serve the Lord with faithfulness and to come into possession of the rich reward of such fidelity? The old prophet says that it is. The Christian who has spoken his word of testimony and who has lived it as well, furnishes the same evidence. Malachi opened the way for the Great Messenger, the Deliverer of Men; that was a great mission to be given to any man. But we, by our faithful following of the Master, can also become openers of the way for those who are to come after. It is a great privilege to be given to any person to open the way of approach to Jesus Christ to any other. This privilege falls to those who are endeavoring day by day to give faithful service to their Lord and Master.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT

Vol. 1.

FIFTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 21, 1918.

No. 1.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT.
A MONTHLY SUPPLEMENT TO THE FRIEND.
DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF YOUNG FRIENDS.

Editor—EDWARD W. MARSHALL.

Associate Editors.

JANE C. MOON IRVIN C. POLEY
A. DOUGLASS OLIVER EDITH STRATTON
ALICE TRIMBLE.

EDITOR'S ADDRESS—20 SOUTH TWELFTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

PUBLISHED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF
THE PHILADELPHIA YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE.

"Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy and your young men shall see visions".—Act II: 17.

A DEDICATION.

The appearance of this first issue of the Supplement marks what is believed to be an important addition to the activities and responsibilities of Young Friends. During recent years, the Young Friends' Movement has been growing and gathering momentum to such an extent that it has been felt that there should be, in this vicinity, some recognized medium of expression for Young Friends, through which they might voice their thoughts and ideals, and discuss those present-day problems which can best be solved by united effort. This first issue represents the outcome of that feeling.

It will be recognized that the Supplement has possibilities for usefulness. It should become a potent factor in the unification of Young Friends, among whom there exists a wide range of thought and opinion on many of the vital questions with which our Society is confronted. One of its principal functions should be the earnest endeavor to crystallize along constructive lines this volume of scattered thought, to mould the diversified ideas into unified aims. It is hoped to attain this object, to some extent, by means of editorials, contributed articles, and in some cases, by symposiums. With the prospect of world-wide spiritual and material readjustments facing us as the result of the present war, it seems essential that we make every attempt to harmonize our thought on the fundamentals, to co-ordinate our effort, and to attack the problems of the new world order with unity of purpose.

Another function of the Supplement will be to keep its readers informed of the activities in which Young Friends are engaged, including reports of conferences, social service, reconstruction work, Bible study groups, missions, and conscientious objectors. It is expected that added impetus will be given to the Young Friends' Movement through the better understanding and appreciation which arises from a better knowledge of the Movement's aims and activities.

The most important function of the Supplement, however, must be that of inspiration. It should endeavor to stimulate, by strong religious appeal, the spiritual re-awakening which seems to be an encouraging indication of the virility of the Young Friends' Movement. It should attempt to direct aroused religious feeling into channels of practical, energetic service.

The Supplement must be, like THE FRIEND, a religious journal. Underlying and permeating each issue there must be that same deep spiritual quality which has been a characteristic of the Society of Friends. It is to be expected that with a different editorial board, and with a body of contributors composed almost entirely of Young Friends, the Supplement may at times appear slightly different from the remainder of THE FRIEND in mode of expression or point of view. But it is firmly believed that any such differences will be superficial, and that when the non-essentials are removed, the aims and purposes of THE FRIEND and the Supplement will be found to be identical.

A burden of responsibility is placed upon Young Friends by the appearance of this publication, for upon their help and support, the fulfillment of its functions largely depends. The Editors appeal to them to rise to this opportunity and to give to the Supplement of their best thought, energy and ideals.

For an opportunity seems to lie before us. Although the Supplement is devoted primarily to the interests of Young Friends, yet for that very reason it is devoted to the interests of our whole Society, whose principles the Young Friends' Movement endeavors to uphold and apply to modern conditions. In the belief that the continued existence and true growth of the Society of Friends cannot be realized unless there is within it an abundance of fruitful spiritual life coupled with unity of purpose, we would have the Supplement exert whatever influence it may possess toward a fuller realization of these conditions in our midst and toward the end that all who bear the name of Friends, whether old or young, may become to a greater degree "one body in Christ Jesus."

E. W. M.

OUR ANSWER.

IN THE FRIEND of Twelfth Month 27th, the challenge was given to the Young Friends' Movement to register its vitality in the meeting for worship. Must we accept the challenge? To answer this question we shall need to have clearly in mind what we mean by the Young Friends' Movement. Is it of such a character that it must or should function in this deeply spiritual and corporate way?

The Young Friends' Movement has been defined as a "spiritual and denominational awakening that is spreading among the young people of the Society of Friends." It began with George Fox and his enthusiastic companions. To them came a discovery that transfigured life and filled it with a joy that no prison cell or physical persecution could overwhelm. They were Spirit-filled men—those young prophets of personal religion! They lived in a world of Spiritual reality vivid and compelling and intense. They touched life deep down where the springs of life are.

To such men worship was a sine qua non and worship more direct and absolute and detached than the existing type. Ritualism was touching God with gloved hand. These young idealists would have none of it. Their passion for reality would brook no medium or conventionality. The method of worship that evolved from this passion for God direct was no mechanical discovery; it was an indigenous necessity. In the utter silence they reached down—each man of them—and touched His life throbbing in their hearts.

It was more than individual worship. In the depths their spirits met and the heart-beat of God flooded into the hearts of all as "from vessel to vessel." God spoke to them and through them—sometimes through one and sometimes through another. The vital thing was that He spoke, and could use all. This entire freedom from the notion of a recognized clerical class was sometimes abused. It was thought prudent for the Church to acknowledge certain gifted and theologically sound "ministers." It was perhaps in the interests of orthodoxy and common-sense that this distinction was made. Whether it has contributed toward the spiritual democracy of worship is not relevant to the present subject. The point is that the type of worship originally evolved was the direct expression of the type of religion experienced. It was an awakening which registered itself in worship by its inner necessity. A spiritual awakening must.

To-day the Society of Friends is witness to a fundamental awakening of its young people. How far responsible for this awakening the present world situation is, we shall not undertake to discuss here. Suffice it to say that the awakening preceded the war, though it has been deeply intensified by it. It might almost seem that the awakening was God's preparation of the Society of Friends for this terrific testing of loyalty. The present danger-points in our defense are those points in which the surge of the new life has not been felt. In so far as the pressure for our stand comes upon the Friends of conscription age, the whole Society of Friends will need to stand back of the corporate Young Friends' Movement as well as back of individuals in the most dedicated support, if we are to "stand in this evil day." We ask older Friends to believe in us and to help us in the deep ways they can. In this time of utter need we look to one another and we look to God. Spiritual strength is our demand, worship becomes a necessity and no substitute can satisfy. There we touch the deepest in one another and feel depths beyond. This spiritual awakening must register itself in the vitality of worship. If the established meetings do not feel the pulse, it is because there is no open channel there for the new life to get in. Given the awakening, given the channel, the Young Friends' Movement must accept the challenge of vitalizing the Meeting for Worship. Are we doing it?

EDITH STRATTON.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' MOVEMENT.

A HISTORY.

There is nothing new in a Young Friends' Movement. At the beginning, the Society of Friends was just such a movement. The "First Publishers of Truth" were all young men and women, some of them barely out of their teens. Their power to shake the country and to bind fast a rapidly growing fellowship into an effective church was the power and fellowship of youth.

Even as applied to modern times the Young Friends' Movement is not very new. In England where it began, it seems to owe its origin very largely, either directly or indirectly, to that young prophetic leader, John Wilhelm Rowntree. Its first phase was intellectual,—the desire for a solid basis for religious truth, and this expressed itself in a series of Summer Schools for Friends and in the establishment of a permanent settlement for religious and social study at Woodbrooke, near Birmingham. The second phase was social and active. Locally and throughout the kingdom, young Friends were brought to know one another and together came to a consciousness of special duty and privilege. They began to take their membership seriously, to inquire into the meaning, for the present as well as for the past, of the position of Friends, and to put their ideals into life and service. A general conference of young Friends was held at Swanick and under one of the Yearly Meeting Committees was established a Central Young Friends' Committee. In Ireland a similar development went on simultaneously.

The American movement owes its initiative and early direction to the English Friends. The first American Summer School was held in 1900 in imitation of the English experiments. English Friends attended this and several later summer schools, and Americans soon began to go to Woodbrooke for study. Following another English precedent, study classes were formed in a few of the more liberal communities for the study of Quaker history. All these activities belonged to a generation now no longer young, but middle-aged, and were concentrated chiefly among the Orthodox Friends of Philadelphia and New York.

The more recent developments of the movement have also received much inspiration from England. The Central Committee in London and its spokesman, Friends' Fellowship Papers, have maintained a cordial interest in "Friends beyond the seas." Before the war, groups of young Friends annually crossed the Atlantic and thus American developments often followed the English. The indiscriminate fellowship of English Friends with all branches of American Friends helped the movement toward fellowship in this country. The Whittier Fellowship Committee, by its guest-house and by other undertakings gave expression to this feeling. Joint study circles flourished for years in New York and Philadelphia. The English tramps, when undertaken in this country, were inevitably joint affairs, and in many minor and local ways the younger generation has been able to work harmoniously with the descendants of those who once were considered dangerously unsound. Looking back over the extraordinary growth of mutual respect, if not of doctrinal agreement, between the two branches in the last decade, the chief factors appear to have been, not the influence of English Friends alone, nor the temerity of American youth, but a sense of shame at our un-Quakerly divisiveness, a study of the facts of the separation, careful appraisal of the points of difference, and a better personal acquaintance.

The Young Friends' Movement has affected the other branch of Friends as it has affected us. They have shared on equal terms and often with greater readiness the inspiration that came from England. Summer Schools were held by their Advancement Committees. The biennial conference has grown and increasingly appealed to their younger members. Their former Young Friends' Associations which failed to keep young have either been rejuvenated or have given over part of their scope to newer activities. A Young Friends' Movement with a large membership was organized in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1915, somewhat on the English model. These developments have apparently been blessed with a real growth of Quaker interest and of spiritual life.

In the West the special interests of young Friends found expression until recently in the local Christian Endeavor Society. The annual conferences of these societies, beginning at Winona Lake, Indiana, in 1910, not only extended the horizon of young Friends beyond their own community, but exposed them to other and more distinctly Quaker ideals. Visitors from the East and from England not only suggested different Quaker traditions, but imported a more definite denominational self-consciousness. The same result was obtained by young western Friends who went to the East or to England for study. At Hartford Seminary, as well as at Woodbrooke, their Quaker interest was aroused, and for the past quinquennium the Five Years' Meeting has had no board so poorly financed, but so enthusiastically effective, in spreading Quaker ideals as its Young Friends' Board. The fields have been "white unto the harvest" and the laborers have been few, but devoted and contagiously inspiring. Locally the formal Christian Endeavor has been revived or has given place to study circles and other kinds of activity. Many Yearly and Quarterly Meetings are well organized for young peoples' work with offices and secretaries and interested membership. From this vigorous western growth Philadelphia Friends have gained much more than they have given.

In the Conservative Yearly Meetings there has, of course, been no movement so formal or extensive as in the larger bodies of Friends. Organization and division by age have seemed unnecessary and undesirable. But many of the younger members have either shared or sympathized with the new life and fellowship in other bodies. They are a needed component of any well-balanced national movement.

Perhaps the developments that I have described will seem to the reader rather limited and self-centred. They all belong to the quiet days of peace, when life was easy and happy. They were the earnest endeavors to find a new and deeper life and fellowship in an ancient and respected branch of the Christian church. Their chief obstacles were ease, respectability, and lack of the purpose and courage that danger and suffering give. We knew we had a message that was needed, but we could not feel the urgency of the call as we wished, and so our efforts seemed to be chiefly talk and effervescent enthusiasm and to lack real extensive power. We could not reach beyond our own membership and much of our own membership was nominal—respectful and contented with Quakerism, but not on fire with its revolutionary call. How well I recall one summer evening in 1912, sitting on a bridge at Ilchester with a young English Friend who was taking me on his motorcycle to visit a little meeting. And as we looked across the meadow to the old grey walls of Ilchester gaol, where Besse says no less than 210 Friends were imprisoned at one time, we spoke almost with regret that no modern trials made firm our faith and gave power to the Young Friends of England and America. Those were prophetic words. Two years later the war came, first to England and then to America, and my friend of the motorcycle is to-day serving his third sentence in Exeter Civil Prison, not fifty miles away. Most of the Friends whom the young Friends' movement had gripped in England have proved loyal to the ideals of our Society, either through suffering or through constructive service. Already in France, the young Friends of England and America are turning into expressive international good-will the enthusiasm and fellowship of their former common conferences and visits. Here talk has turned to life and action. The war, one feels, will either make or break the Society of Friends. To-day the Young Friends' Movement is not an easy, sociable, self-edifying undertaking, but a challenging call, full of danger and of action, to fearless expression of the Quaker message. Our peace testimony is not the whole of our message, but it is to-day the testing element. If we can be faithful in that, we have few fears for Quakerism's strength in this generation of young Friends. For perfected by suffering, tested by danger and sacrifice, we shall be better fitted than ever before to meet the more difficult tasks of what shall follow the war—whether it be peace or whether it be the revolutionary stress of a world order being made over.

HENRY J. CADBURY.

TWO BOOKS BY JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.

To me, there are two kinds of faith in Jesus Christ. The one accepts the idea that God's spirit took human form for a time; the other includes this and goes further, believing that Christ's way of living is a workable one, applicable to business, political, and home life. The first is relatively easy and it is hard for me to believe that such belief "on the Lord Jesus Christ" is sufficiently difficult to be worth very much; the second is tremendously and, perhaps, increasingly hard, but it is such faith that will overcome the evil in the world, if we will but have the courage to put it into practice. The faith of John Haynes Holmes is of both kinds, decidedly; but the emphasis is on the second, and it is for this reason, perhaps, that I have found his book, "New Wars for Old," of inestimable help.

Many books that try to state the case for non-resistance, give us a new realization of the beauty of Christ's way; "New Wars for Old" does this, too, but it also renews one's faith in its practicality. It gives two chapters to examples of successful non-resistance, ancient and modern; and, in the words of a calendar before me, "one example is worth a thousand arguments." The author gives the lie to the epigram that "Christianity has not failed, because it has never been tried," he believes, and makes the reader believe, that it has been successful in every case where it has been honestly and courageously tried. He cites the four quotations from the New Testament that are used most frequently to show Jesus believed that sometimes war was necessary and answers them so effectively that the chapter has been to me ever since a present help in time of troublesome argument.

One mistake that enthusiasts for a cause are apt to make is not to give full credit to what nobility there is on the other side. Statements implying that all pacifists are idealists and that all soldiers are rushing to battle filled with the lust to kill, do harm, needless to say, to the cause of non-resistance. And it is just in this matter that John Haynes Holmes, both in "New Wars for Old" and in his newer book, "Religion for To-day," is so supremely successful. He states the other point of view so fairly and fully that one wonders how he can muster arguments for his side. A cousin of mine, a strong believer in the justification of our war at the present time, read several paragraphs of the former book and would not believe it was written by a pacifist. This atmosphere of tolerance, in addition to its delightful readability, makes it peculiarly valuable for Friends—and friendly—propaganda.

"Religion for To-day" is a more complete statement, with much additional and perhaps even more thought-provoking material, of the ideas given in Philadelphia in a lecture, entitled "Religion after the War." His chapters on Justice, not Charity, and Truth, not Authority, are particularly worth reading. And I cannot resist the temptation to quote a few sentences from a most interesting chapter, The Modern Conception of Prayer:

"Prayer, as commonly practised both in the past and in the present, has concerned itself exclusively with such phenomena as rainfalls, storms, cataclysms, sickness and disease, the issues of battle, the fall of dynasties and kingdoms,—things 'of the earth earthy' A prayer, from the new point of view, is an effort not to change God, but to change ourselves. It is an endeavor not to adapt the mind of God to our selfish and trivial desires, but to adapt our minds to the august will of the Most High. . . . We pray not in order that we may 'reconcile the ways of God to man,' as Alexander Pope put it, but, on the contrary, that we may reconcile man to the unchanging ways of God. Prayer, when truly understood and practised, is concerned not with the physical, but with the spiritual world; it seeks a change not in the outer but in the inner realm."

In conclusion, may I say that any one interested in peace should read "New Wars for Old" and anyone interested in religion should read "Religion for To-day"? If I am right in believing this, many Friends will wish to read both.

IRVIN C. POLEY.

"THE PRESENT-DAY CHALLENGE TO US AS YOUNG FRIENDS."*

There was recently held at Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, a most significant Young Friends' Conference. It grew out of a deep "concern" on the part of a group of young people of the College who had been meeting for some weeks under the general leadership of Clarence E. Pickett to discuss their relation as Friends to the present crisis and to the problems growing out of the war.

Accordingly, letters were sent to a number of representative young people of our various meetings, inviting them to come to Oskaloosa for a two days' conference. A godly number came in response to this call, so that with the young people from the College who attended, there were as many as fifty present in some sessions of the Conference.

It was a most searching time of earnest inquiry and prayerful consideration as they sought to learn their true obligation as Friends to their God, to their government, and to their own conscience in this trying hour. No other conference or meeting of young people within our Yearly Meeting has been held which has been marked with a deeper spirit of consecration and loyalty or by more real spiritual power.

The last afternoon of the Conference, the writer placed these words on the blackboard—"The Present-day Challenge to Us as Young Friends," with the question, "What would you say that it is?"

*Forwarded from Iowa at the suggestion of J. Henry Scattergood.

There were twenty-two replies written out and handed in. Of these twenty replies, three were from young women and seventeen from young men. A very significant thing to be noted is the fact that fourteen of these replies from the young men were from those within this present Draft or very near it, some of whom had to report within two or three days and go to camp.

Because the answers given are so remarkable when all the facts surrounding them are borne in mind, it has been thought well to share a portion of them with a larger number, even though no one thought at the time of their ever being published. This is done that a larger group of Friends, young and old, may know something as to how deeply some of our young people are thinking concerning the grave problems now confronting us and of their answer to this Challenge. The replies are given in their exact words, although in some cases only a portion of the answers are given. Space also prevents the giving of all the answers received, though every reply given is worthy of being published. The classification or grouping of replies is the work of the writer—the replies are the words of the young people themselves.

I. KNOWLEDGE OF OUR PRINCIPLES.

Omer Johnson, Pleasant Plain Quarterly Meeting.—"The Present-day Challenge to us as Young Friends is a deep study of the early history of the Society, of their reasons for opposition to war, and a challenge for us to try to show by our actions that we firmly believe in these convictions and are willing to do all in our power to carry them out."

Loyal P. Thomas, Bear Creek Quarterly Meeting.—"The challenge to Young Friends to-day is to know why we believe in the Discipline in regard to the world-wide conflict and to settle in our own minds where we are going to stand as Quakers."

Grace E. Michener, Oskaloosa Quarter.—"To me, the Present-day Challenge to us as Young Friends is to know what we believe, why we hold the views we do, and to present to the world a constructive way of living,—a positive message of the power of love and Christian democracy. This, in other words, necessitates a study of the principles of Jesus and a thorough-going application of these principles in every relationship of our daily lives."

II. CONSTRUCTIVE MESSAGE OF QUAKERISM.

Alfred E. Standing, Bear Creek Quarter.—"It is a challenge for a Positive Quakerism. A message that proposes the substitutes for what we don't believe in."

Harvey E. Grose, Bangor Quarter.—"I believe the Present-day Challenge to us is to show to the world that we are trying to construct instead of destroy by war."

III. ACTION ON THE PART OF THE SOCIETY—PROCLAMATION OF MESSAGE.

Earle M. Winslow, Bangor Quarter.—"I believe that in the light of the present world crisis the duty of every Friend, young or old, is to show to the world that we have a message for the propaganda of Peace better, now and ultimately, than that proposed by any military propagandist. The world expects us, and our Government gives us the supreme opportunity to vindicate our position by standing up for it to the limit. The militarist believes in his propaganda enough to push it to the limit, and he expects us to push ours, regardless of consequences."

IV. TO DEMONSTRATE THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST AND CHRISTIAN BROTHERHOOD.

Elton Trueblood, Ackworth Quarter.—"To propagate the spirit of Christ, as we see it, among His people."

Chase L. Conover, Oskaloosa Quarter.—"To demonstrate, to a war-stricken world by the power of the indwelling Christ, the spirit of Christian brotherhood."

Marie Owen, Ackworth Quarter.—"To find a solution for expressing to the world our belief in the practical application of brotherly love."

V. TO LIVE FEARLESS, CONSISTENT, CHRISTIAN LIVES.

Willard Jones, Pleasant Plain Quarter.—"I consider the Present-day Challenge to Young Friends is to live fearless, aggressive, Christian lives; fearless to express their ideas in the world-crisis; aggressive to do something constructive."

Duane McCracken, Pleasant Plain Quarter.—"That we be genuine Christians; that, having open-mindedly faced all the facts, we follow without compromise the dictates of our conscience."

VI. TO GET OTHERS INTO THE RIGHT RELATION WITH JESUS CHRIST.

Gladys White, Ackworth Quarter.—"We as Quakers hold that if a man has the right relation to Jesus Christ he cannot go out and kill his brother. We, as Young Friends, should promote the ideal of getting each individual in the right relation to Jesus Christ. After this our ideal will come. Our main aim is to help others get a 'bigger vision of God.'"

It might be added that these replies did not "drop out of the blue sky," nor were they hastily framed and given. They are the result of months of careful and earnest seeking by those in college as well as by those outside. These have arrived at their conclusions partly through consultation with older Friends, but chiefly through prayerful consideration of these perplexing problems before God and within the sacred tribunal of the individual soul.

OSKALOOSA, IOWA.

ORA W. CARRELL.

A BEGINNING.

In connection with planning the First-day morning expeditions to various outlying meetings last Spring, need was felt for a calendar or bulletin as a means of drawing attention to matters which interest young Friends.

During the Westtown Conference this calendar idea was presented to the Young Friends' Committee. The thought was approved and enlarging suggestions were made. Two members were asked to investigate the feasibility of a bulletin which might serve as the organ of the Committee. While this supplement is not the immediate work of those persons and its scope will surely far outreach a mere list of announcements, perhaps their concern served to crystallize the desire for a publication peculiarly our own.

CAMP MEADE, Second Month 18, 1918.

HAROLD M. LANE.

ANOTHER YOUNG FRIENDS' PERIODICAL.

[This significant item of news from Ireland seems to indicate that the Young Friends' Movement not only is active in that country, but is accorded official recognition by Dublin Yearly Meeting.—Eds.]

The Irish Young Friends' Committee have started a News Sheet of seven or eight pages, intended to take the place of the Y. F. A. Magazine, which came to end with the appointment by Dublin Yearly Meeting, in 1916, of a Central Young Friends' Committee to have the care of Young Friends' activities within the Yearly Meeting. This Committee, after some experience of the attempt to cover the ground allotted to their care, have felt the need of some more direct means than those hitherto adopted of coming into contact with all other young Friends in Ireland. It has been decided to issue the News Sheet three times a year at 2d.; (of F. J. Kerr, 27, Ulverton Road, Dalkey, Co. Dublin). Elsie M. Wigham is the editor.

SUCCESS.

"Before God's footstool to confess

A poor soul knelt and bowed his head,

I failed, he cried, The Master said,

Thou didst thy best, that is success."

MY QUEST OF JOY.

Once I set up idols and trained the fibers of my heart
To cling to them in faith and hope of life,
And all my days I sought to make them real,
To see them live before my eyes in light;
But though I waited long and strove to find
In them the joy that life must surely give,
I found it not, then one day, looking down
I saw them shattered on the ground below
In hopeless fragments, jigg'd and weather-worn.
Then for a time the world grew dim around
For that I tho't was truth had lost its light,
And that I knew was truth I could not find,
Till through the mist a light broke clear and strong
And in its path I, blinded, passed along
And came at last to see, and seeing, know
That God is Love and in this love alone
Is bound the hope and faith of each that lives,
And that to love is but to serve in truth
And give for Him our inmost heart's desire.

And so in one glad vision shining clear
The joy I sought before in idols false
I found at my heart's door with radiant face.

—EDITH E. WILDMAN.

IMPORTANT YOUNG FRIENDS' GENERAL CONFERENCE
ON THIRD MONTH 23rd.

All the young Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should make every effort to attend an unusually important conference to be held at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on Seventh-day, Third Month 23rd. Those young Friends who have not as yet become interested in the Young Friends' movement are especially urged to be present.

The afternoon subject for discussion, "Mobilization of Young Friends for Their Spiritual Task," is a clear, ringing summons for our young Friends to come to the Conference determined that they will remain no longer in a more or less disunited and ineffective condition, but will strive to draw together spiritually and sociably with a solidarity of effort which would augur well for the future of our Yearly Meeting. This discussion will largely deal with the question of how the scattered members of our various committees can be reached and bound into local groups; how these groups may co-operate for larger forms of service; how the whole Movement may be related to the respective local meetings on the one hand and to the whole Yearly Meeting on the other. It must be remembered, in this discussion, that unity and organization

NOTES FROM JAPAN.

CAPTAIN HARDY IN FRIENDS' MEETING.

The benches of the little old meeting-house in Tokio were all filled and folding chairs at the back of the room did not suffice for the crowds, so a number had to stand all through the meeting. It was advertised for 7.30 on First-day evening and many were the people who wanted to see and hear this old man who had come to Japan with Perry sixty-five years ago—one of the two survivors of the visitors of 1853.

Unfortunately the old man had made a mistake in dates and had promised to speak at two places in distant parts of Tokio at the same hour! We got in touch with the other place and they said they would try to stop him off at eight sharp and send him by taxi across to us, arriving about 8.20. This was explained to the waiting people and T. Sawano and S. Hirakawa filled the time as best they could. We admired Hirakawa San, who spoke till about 8.20, and then continued, as the Captain had not yet appeared. A reception committee was waiting at the gate and looked expectantly into every passing automobile—but alas, they were mostly filled with smoking men and women.

To make a long story short the taxi broke down and our visitor had to resort to a street car, which is a pretty slow are not ends in themselves, but are intended as the means of furthering the principles of Quakerism and through them of advancing the Kingdom of God on earth.

The eight local groups already organized and one or two not yet organized will sit together as delegates in the afternoon.

The evening session will be a general meeting, with two addresses developing further the opportunity and the call of the hour. A cordial invitation to attend this session is extended to older Friends.

In order to insure the largest possible attendance of members from a distance a Committee on Hospitality has been appointed and will be grateful for the names of people in or near Philadelphia who would entertain one or more guests for Seventh-day night of the week-end. Write to Edith Stratton, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

Come to the office between the two sessions, to get the names of your guests or hostesses.

A little preparation meeting for worship will be held in an upstairs committee-room of the Institute at 3.30.

The full program of the Conference follows:

YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE—Friends' Meeting-house, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Third Month 23, 1918.

Subject—"Mobilization of Young Friends for Their Spiritual Task."

Afternoon Session—4 p. m., D. Robert Yarnall, Presiding.

I. The Spiritual Task—Message from the Peace Committee of the Yearly Meeting—Francis R. Taylor.

II. The Function of a Central Committee—J. Passmore Elkinton, Chairman of Young Friends' Committee.

III. A New Life for the Auxiliary—Rebecca Carter, President of the Y. W. A.

IV. The Function of Local Groups—two minute talks—1. From organized groups: (a) Lansdowne C. E.; (b) Haverford Round Table; (c) Media Fellowship; (d) Moorestown; (e) West Chester Study Circle; (f) Twelfth Street Fellowship; (g) Arch Street Fellowship; (h) Wilmington Young Friends' Group. 2. From unorganized communities: (a) Western Quarterly Meeting; (b) Haddonfield; (c) Germantown. 3. From college meetings: (a) Wellesley; (b) State College.

V. Discussion.

VI. Summary and a Look Ahead—Edith Stratton.

Devotional.

Supper—6 p. m.

Evening Session—7.30 p. m.—(older Friends cordially invited)—J. Passmore Elkinton, Chairman.

I. Quakerism: A Religion of Adventure—Janet Payne Whitney, London, England.

II. The Unprejudiced Call for Personal Consecration—George L. Jones, Westtown School.

thing in Tokio! It was just nine o'clock when he limped, panting down the aisle after his brisk walk up the hill to the meeting-house. The hands of the old clock on the wall had slowly turned around to eleven, before the sailor, with his interpreter, had finished speaking. And those 300 people sat or stood patiently till the end!

It was a simple talk—the story of his life, showing how, by living close to God and consequently avoiding smoking, drinking and other bad habits, he had been enabled to live to the good old age of eighty-three in sound health. He made a strong personal appeal to his "grandchildren" as he calls all the Japanese, to do all in their power to wipe the curse of "sake" (liquor) from their fair land and to pledge allegiance to God, the Father.

Practically every one present promised to join in the fight against drink and quite a few handed in their names as enquirers who would like to know this loving Heavenly Father about Whom their old "grandfather" spoke. A great number of young men went up front to shake his hand and get him to write in the fly leaves of their Bibles.

The writer of these lines had the honor of taking the old sailor back to his home that night and he was greatly impressed with the hardness of the old man. Although the day had been a hard one with sermons at four different places and much traveling. Captain Hardy ran and jumped on a tram and stood up in the crowded car, refusing to take another person's seat. "These are all my grandchildren," he said. "I love 'em all. The only one that has ever insulted me was drunk and it wasn't his fault. O, this 'sake' is a terrible thing."

"Good night, and God bless you," was his parting word at the door of the missionary's house where he was staying. The return trip to the Mission was made about midnight and few people were stirring. But those who were out were mostly under the influence of strong drink. One man stopped the trolley car by refusing to get off the track. At a transfer point an unconscious man was in the gutter and another yelling in at a saloon keeper. The cars carried people in various stages of intoxication and at the Mita stop three students were having a loud argument as to which was the road home!

While it is unusual to see so many people at one time indulging in this sin, yet one is always aware of the terrible curse drink is to this land. O, for more able witnesses like this veteran sailor, Hardy, to show these people a better way—"the way of the tree of life." HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

THE YOUNG MAN AND HIS AMUSEMENTS.

Under this caption the Boston Evening Transcript prints a notable article from the pen of George T. Dowling. Two sub-heads are given, that seem to be especially useful as defining principles which all can apply personally. These sub-titles and the essence of what is said under them follow:—

SPEND YOUR TIME FUTURE-WARD.—If I can impress this upon you I shall not be taking away from you any of your amusements; I shall be doing better than that; I shall be taking you away from them. They will become so subordinated to the main purpose of life as to sink into their proper place, and you will forge ahead with so large a conception of the meaning of your possible destiny that you will no longer be asking early and late, "What shall I do to be amused?" but, with its widest significance, "What shall I do to be saved?" saved from failure, from poverty, from remorse, from physical or mental or moral shipwreck?

Along the lines of these two questions you will find among your associates crystallizing two different classes. With one class levity and thoughtlessness will be the chief characteristics, and with the other seriousness and a purpose. Ten or twenty years hence the latter, after experiences of usefulness and happiness in making their work tell, will be approaching the head of their several callings. The former will be looking for a job. Both will have had their future; but they are planting that future now.

SPEND YOUR MONEY UPWARD.—The second suggestion which I have to make is that you spend your money upward. The one test of every amusement is this: How is it going to find me to-morrow; better fitted for my work or worse? better fitted to be the man I know in my heart I ought to be, or worse? Your amusements will cost you money; and if you make up your mind to spend your money upward and not downward, that will determine the character of your amusements. Think of how many books may be bought for the price of two or three theatrical entertainments. And when you have bought them they are yours forever. Do you want some inspiration in your business? It is in your power to say to John D. Rockefeller or Andrew Carnegie or Charles M. Schwab or any one of a multitude of others: "Come here, I do not feel sleepy to-night. I want you to sit up with me and tell me your experiences in business. Reveal to me some of the secrets by which you have won." And any hour of the day or night they will immediately obey. Why, it is wonderful when you come to think of it. And remember that if you are not availing yourself of these chances, your future competitors are.

Or do you long for the homely poets of homely life: Robbie Burns or James Whitcomb Riley or Will Carleton or Henry W. Longfellow? What you throw away in a few evenings will supply you with a library, and the greatest men in the world, and at their best, will be at your beckoning.

Spend your money upward. You are not spending it upward when you attend some pig-sty drama, even though the sty be brilliantly painted with crimson and gold. You are not spending it upward when you buy a ticket to dance all night or to mingle with evil companions. You are not spending it upward when you play cards for money.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

LITTLE STORIES OF HUMAN INTEREST.

J. LINDLEY SPICER.

No. 1.—OLD BROM.

When a boy in Saratoga County, N. Y., we lived six miles from the Friends' Meeting-house.

Early on First-days we would breakfast, put up a luncheon, and father, mother and myself go to the place of worship we best loved.

After meeting, "Old Trim," the faithful roan horse, was fed. We ate our lunch and then drove to a community on the banks of the Upper Hudson, where my parents had opened a Bible School.

An old unused Union church much out of repair had been cleaned and fitted up. About sixty people gladly availed themselves of this opportunity for religious instruction and Bible study.

A mile away lived a family of notoriously bad repute, known locally as "Old Brom and his gang"—men and women who kept a resort where wild orgies were sometimes held.

One frail little girl, grand-daughter of Old Brom, came to the Bible School. Kind bodies fitted her out in decent clothes; she would go to the house of her school teacher, be washed and dressed, go to Bible School, then go back, put on her shabby clothing, and so return to her home.

Years passed, revival meetings had been held, many professed conversion, and a work developed which resulted in the erection of a nicely appointed Friends' meeting-house across the river.

One day my mother received a letter from the school teacher, stating: "The good seed you sowed in our neighborhood is springing up and promises to bear fruit. Old Brom wants you to come and tell him how to find Jesus Christ."

We responded at once, mother and I, accompanied by a Methodist woman, who could sing the Gospel message, went and found Old Brom, another old brother of his, four old women, and three younger persons, men and women.

Old Brom had met with an accident, which had resulted in complete blindness. He had cried out to God in his distress. The little girl of former years was there, although now a married woman with a home in a far away city.

We had a marvelous meeting. The entire group of nine persons cried to God in confession of sin, and with promises to henceforth serve their Saviour, Jesus Christ.

Regular meetings were held in this transformed home. The prayers of Old Brom were most original and unique expressions of faith and trust. He and the others, as they passed on, gave evidence of complete transformation, and newness of life.

226 E. FIFTY-EIGHTH STREET, NEW YORK.

HOW TO KEEP IT.—Some lakes and inland seas are without outlets, but none are without inlets. Insensible evaporation would soon dry up the largest of them, if its waters were not receiving a constant addition. The sturdiest tree would soon die if it could derive no nourishment from earth or air. So, no matter how much grace a person has received, if he does not go on in his experience and grow in grace he will become dry and unfruitful, spiritually dead, and insensible to his condition. His outward conduct may be without reproach, but his power is gone. To keep a house in good order repairs must be made as need requires; to keep wealth one must be acquiring wealth; to keep learning, one must be adding to his store of learning, and to keep holiness one must be steadily "perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord."—
"EARNEST CHRISTIAN."

THE CHILDREN'S CORNER.

[With the advent of the Young Friends' Supplement the good women in charge of the selections for children have chosen a new caption.]

OUR STAR.

[The red and black star now worn by many of our boys and girls as well as by older Friends here in America, the badge of our Friends' Service Committee, was first given to the English Friends for their helpful work in France at the time of the Franco-Prussian war, in 1870. It has been adopted by our workers now in France and has been known and recognized by many an old peasant who came to love it in the last hard war which France was called on to endure. It is an emblem we are all proud to have inherited and hope to pass on un tarnished to those who labor in later years to help a stricken people.]

O, many a star, both near and far
On a flag is floating free!
But I would sing our Friendly star,
The star for you and me,
That little star of black and red,
On the "Way of Love," its beams are shed,
In the paths of Peace its followers tread,
Wherever they may be.

The peasants knew it long ago
On wasted fields of France
Old men;—who then were boys you know,—
Remember at a glance
The little star of black and red;
And how the Friends it onward led,
Broke in their homes the Heavenly bread
Of love and charity.

And now it marks the strong right arm
Of youth or maiden brave
Who goes to save from want and harm,
To till again each wasted farm,
And,—in the midst of war's alarm,
To comfort,—heal, and save.
The shining star of black and red
How bright the gleam it seems to shed
On paths where Duty onward led,
Far, far across the sea.

And may we wear it not in vain
Who follow still its light!
We need its cheer and courage, too,
For us it means "Your work renew!"
Help us to help!" And we may do
Our part to keep it bright.
The Friendly star—all stars above
For still it shows the way of Love
The work we all may do!

—F. T. R.

FLYING WORDS.—There is somewhere in print a little story that deserves to be printed again and again, until all the children know it by heart.

The incident occurred in a church where priests set apart certain times when their members shall come to them as they would go to their own fathers and mothers to talk over the things that much concern them. Indeed, the priest is addressed as "father."

If a member of the church has done things during the week or the month, that have left with a him feeling of doubt as to his wisdom, or the deeper feeling that he has done things really wrong, he is expected to go to his church-father and confess them to him, that the father may tell him some better way, or name a punishment for the wrong thing done.

Once it happened that a young girl confessed to her church-father that she had been talking very unkindly about a girl of her acquaintance, a school-mate perhaps, repeating things she had heard about her, not knowing whether they were true or not. The "father" knew that she needed a lesson that could not easily be forgotten. So he told her to go to the market-place of the town, and bring a fowl whose feathers had not been taken off.

On her way back she was to pluck the feathers and cast them from her, and report to him again.

When all was done as he had instructed her, she returned to him, and he further directed: "Now, go back to the market, place and on the way, gather up the feathers you have plucked every one, and bring them to me."

The young girl set out to do as she was bidden. But, as she passed along, she found that the wind had gone before her and had scattered the feathers far and wide, even among the leaves of the wayside trees, and through the hedges, and over the little river running through the town. At last, discouraged and in tears, she went back to the "father" with hardly more than a handful of the feathers she had scattered.

Then the "father" said to her: "My daughter, it was just this that you did when you scattered words of blame and suspicion, whether false or true, about your neighbor. If I had asked you to gather the words you could not have done it, for other tongues would have passed them on and on, beyond your reach, to carry hurt and harm to any ears and hearts they should fall upon."

There is nothing more destructive than some spoken words. They may be like sparks of fire falling upon dried grass. They may be the very seeds of war in the home, in the school, the State, the world?

One of our poets has written these lines that seem to belong to the good father's lesson:

"Boys flying kites, haul in their white-winged birds, Men cannot do this when they're flying words."

AN APPEAL TO STUDENTS IN FRIENDS' COLLEGES.

Instead of the regular quadrennial Student Volunteer Convention, with four or five thousand delegates, five hundred college men and women, including some missionary and faculty representatives, met at East Northfield, Mass., from First Month 3rd to 6th, for a survey of the world situation in the light of Christ's call to carry the Gospel to all people. The Friends who were present were so impressed with the constructive and challenging program of future work which this Conference outlined for itself, that they are eager to give to the students and teachers of Friends' colleges the good news of this unparalleled opportunity to line up with the entire student body of the United States and Canada and even to lead them in purposeful effort to achieve for Christ things which make peculiar appeals to Friends and those in sympathy with them.

Let a brief statement of some of the outstanding messages and spiritual experiences of the Conference introduce this constructive program of work.

In the first evening session, the delegates were brought under a heavy burden by John R. Mott's survey of the world situation created by the war. He said in substance: The world is shaken to its foundations,—commerce has fallen to pieces, the international labor movement has broken, home life is shattered, mere intellectual education has proven dangerous, the Roman Catholic Church has failed and Protestant leaders have neutralized their future influence by their war messages. In addition to burdens equivalent to fourteen per cent. of the property of the Allies and twenty-eight per cent. of the Teutons, the sorrowful, bleeding and exhausted world, already robbed of eight million men who have been slain, must carry on its back eight million cripples, and an army of diseased civilians. Another burden which is coming upon the world is shown by the fact that for one nation alone, enough soldiers to make forty divisions have been put out of commission by venereal diseases. Christendom is rent asunder and the bitterness is steadily growing. The light shining out of all this darkness is that we now face an inquiring and unselfish world where many eagerly long for the great Christian message of faith, hope, and love. This is the challenge to American college students to enter into the full measure of sacrificial service at home and abroad.

The great affirmations of the Christian faith, given by Drs. William P. Merrill and John Douglass McKenzie, preceded the presentation of the needs of the world. Professor Harry F. Ward, of Boston, presented the challenge of the unevangelized industrial world and pleaded on the authority of Jesus that all life be so organized as to seek first the kingdom of God and things will follow, reversing the method of civilization, which organized life to seek things, and "maybe the kingdom of God will follow." The needs of Latin America, Africa, Syria, and others, near Eastern fields, India, China, Korea and Japan, were all marshaled with challenging appeals which are only intensified by the great war.

During the whole forenoon of the third day, the college and university students faced with prayerful seriousness their own share in the heavy responsibility for the world: (a) the responsibility to live clean, victorious lives, exemplifying the spirit of Christ in all college life, giving time to prayer and Bible study and accepting the plan of Christ for their lives; (b) responsibility to foster evangelism, the need for this being made more urgent because war is breaking down moral standards and the systems which have protected the weak; and (c) to give of their means for world evangelization—not only because of what their gifts will accomplish, but because, unless they are trained as students to give, there is little likelihood of their learning that joy in later life.

In the light of these facts, the clear call to students is:

(1) To uphold the original ideals of our country, to work for world brotherhood, to banish ill will and harsh judgments, remembering that Christ also died for the Germans and endeavoring to fight every manifestation of the spirit of war in our lives and homes.

(2) To help raise up a generation who can transfer their allegiance to a cause infinitely greater than war.

(3) To promote Bible and mission study, preparatory to taking their places in the evangelization of the world.

The climax in this great drama of message bearing, heart searching and praying for light, came with the adoption of a carefully prepared program of work to which the delegates from Canada and the United States as well as the students from foreign lands committed themselves.

PROGRAM OF ENDEAVOR.

(1) To seek to enlist a large number of students in voluntary classes for the study of the principles of Christian democracy based on the life and teachings of Jesus, seeking to get His answers to the great personal, industrial, national, and world problems of our day.

(2) A new and honest endeavor to make a thorough-going application of the spirit and principles of Christ to life on the college campus, and thence reaching out to the community, the nation, and the world.

(3) To raise a fund for foreign mission work, in addition to that to be used in meeting the exigencies of the situation created by the war.

(4) To enroll a sufficient number of new, qualified volunteers to meet the missionary needs of the non-Christian world.

We would remember in closing, one of the most hopeful and searching messages of the Conference, that by Gilbert Beavon on "The Adventure of Prayer," challenging us to a new and larger ministry of prayer for the accomplishment of the task before us;—remembering also, another note of the Conference, that God is in the habit of doing the impossible for those who make the adventure of prayer and faith.

On behalf of the Friends in attendance at Northfield,

GILBERT BOWLES, Chairman.

A FOUR-QUARTER SCHOOL YEAR.

Our friend Joel Cadbury has put into our hands some stirring newspaper clippings giving reports of the discussion at the N. E. A. Superintendents' Meeting in Atlantic City of the "all year round school." Perhaps this return to an ancient practice (Friends will recall that it was the rule at Westtown a hundred years ago) was inaugurated in California. In any event it has now been in force for several years in several States. The schools of Newark, New Jersey, have been a notable instance of success with such a program. The statistical evidence there would indicate that the health of pupils and teachers is distinctly better with the division of the whole year into four terms. These divisions are so arranged as to secure two vacations of a fortnight each in the year.

Some paragraphs of the newspaper article are submitted as calculated to make us "think on these things":

"The school children of America, thanks to these traditions, average 970 school hours to the year. This is 185 school hours less than the children of London receive, 350 fewer school hours than in Paris and 380 fewer hours than in Berlin. Adding together all the school hours of the American boy who has attended the public schools up to his eighteenth year and comparing them with the total school hours of a German lad of the same age, we find that the German boy has been in school for a period forty per cent. longer than his American competitor and is, inferentially, forty per cent. better trained. We are conducting continuation schools to-day for thousands of our drafted and enlisted young men. Nothing of that kind is necessary in Germany. They had the necessary education before they entered service.

MUST CHECK WASTAGE.

"We must take immediate steps to check this enormous wastage that is placing us at a tremendous disadvantage in the coming fierce world-wide competition. Germany, to allude again to the wisdom of our enemy, pays its teachers well, gives them signal honor and employs a far greater proportion of male teachers than does America.

"If we abandon the three-quarters school year and go to a four-quarters year, we will be enabled to pay our teachers more and thus to hold them in the profession. That is a grave problem we must face at once. School teachers are going into other work daily because of our low wages. England is raising the pay of its teachers thirty per cent., and a revolution of teachers' services must be made here.

"England, when she went into the war, paid scant heed to the school children and she is paying dearly for that neglect. She put more than 200,000 children under twelve years of age into her munitions factories and more than 500,000 school children between the ages of twelve and sixteen. As a direct result, juvenile crime mounted in all communities until it reached the appalling increase of eighty per cent. in London. Health, morality and order all suffered, but the greatest loss came to the growing minds of the children.

"A halt was called in 1917. Thoughtful Englishmen and women asked: 'For whom are we fighting if not for the very children we are sacrificing?' So the closed schools are being reopened and an educational reform Act is well on its way toward enactment, an Act that will serve as a beacon to our reconstruction here in America, cutting out as it does, non-essentials from the curriculum and providing technical training when the need for such education is apparent."

FRIENDS COURT-MARTIALED

Alfred Tomes, at present in Wormwood Scrubs Prison serving a sentence of 112 days' H. L., was court-martialed at Warwick. A. T. has been an attender for seventeen years and actually a member for ten years of the smaller body of the Fritchley Monthly Meeting of Friends. He was an iron-monger in Sturcheley, having worked up to that position from errand boy. A. T. said:

"On going to the Local Tribunal for the second time the Chairman admitted my conscientious objection proved, and granted me conditional exemption on getting a plot of land and working on same two days per week. These conditions I accepted and faithfully adhered to, but to my surprise, owing to the decision being wrongly recorded—namely, given two weeks to get work of national importance, the third Tribunal decided that I had not fulfilled the conditions and withdrew my certificate, exempting me from combatant service only which I could not accept. The Appeal Tribunal refused to hear the whole of the facts, but took my case on conscientious grounds again, and again admitting the genuineness of same, offered me time to get work under the Pelham Committee. As I could not accept this, my case was dismissed, and of course, I was then thrown into the hands of the military, called up and arrested in due course. I have since offered to work on the land, and have a letter in my possession from a friend offering to employ me, and would faithfully carry out my trust if given the opportunity.

"The sale of my business meant the complete stoppage of the source of my own and wife and family's livelihood and what for twenty years I had been striving for."

FROM ENGLISH QUARTERLY MEETINGS.

The formation of "A League of Nations" was the special subject considered at the Berks and Oxon Quarterly Meeting. A number of Friends were present overnight at a meeting addressed by Arnold J. Toyne and Professor Gilbert Murray on various aspects of the subject. The gathering frankly faced some of the difficulties, but yet considered that the only hope for the world lies along the establishment of a League of Nations and a process of universal disarmament. William C. Braithwaite laid before the Quarterly Meeting itself some reasons for the setting up of this League, sketching the lines on which it might possibly be established, and the methods that it might adopt. He emphasized the need for the development of international consciousness and the provision of an organ for the expression of such consciousness. The Quarterly Meeting, in its minute, desired that the ultimate force behind such a League may prove to be moral and not material. Other subjects claiming the attention of the Quarterly Meeting were: Teaching meetings, the proposed national education reform, and the revision of the Book of Discipline.

THE VOCAL MINISTRY.

At Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting, the Elders' meeting (open to all Friends), following the routine business sitting, was addressed by A. Neave Brayshaw on the vocal ministry of our meetings for worship. He remarked that disparagement of the spoken word always calls forth a certain conventional Quaker applause. It was easy to say that one had never spoken in meeting, the inference being that one was too humble to do so, or that one had never had a "call" for such service. Was it not more to the point to ask oneself, "Am I glad I have not heard the 'call'?" Have I determined that I never shall hear one? Have I really left the door as open as I think I have? Do I fervently desire that the gift shall never come my way? Is it possible for not one person in a meeting of sixty to be able to give that meeting what it needs? Surely if all were in the right spirit, all trying to rise to the opportunity, and all having something of the deeper Christian life, words and messages would arise on the minds and in the hearts of one and another for the general help of all and the special help of individuals. "Good works should not be put forward as a reason of shirking the vocal ministry; rather our ministry should help our good works." The attitude of some Friends towards the ministry made it more difficult for the young and the tender people to do their duty and break the silence. "I plead for that spirit in a meeting out of which helpful ministry is bound to come. There are some from whom the occasional word may come, whilst it may be for others to give their lives wholly to it." There were the further reminders given, that those who would minister effectively to their meetings must know something of the flock; that ministry was not alone for the comfort and joy of the convinced and converted, but was also for the purpose of aggressive adventure. How much we lack in some meetings of "speaking to states," formerly much experienced!—From The Friend (London).

USE OF SILENCE.

The silence Friends seek, then, is not an empty, dead thing, for "of all dead things a dead silence is the deadest." It must be vital. It requires concentration. It is worship in spirit and in truth. It should be peaceful, yet there should be an alert readiness to obey. This is not the sort of hush that comes before a storm or when waiting for something to happen, but it is "like the stillness of a high-noon of summer, or of a snow-covered country when the heat or lightness gives an intense sense of overflowing and abounding life. Such, only of a deeper and far more intimate kind, is the atmosphere of waiting souls."

Words spoken from such a silence will reach the need of some heart, because God will direct them. Such messages will not be thoughtlessly given, for the speaker will be conscious of the impelling of God's spirit. "I dare not speak except when I dare not keep silent" is a good rule to follow.

Living, vital silence is a test of faithfulness and of life. Meetings where silence is practiced are thermometers of the corporate life. If they are dead and barren, so are the individual members. We cannot go our own way for six days and expect to be miraculously guided on the seventh. In the midst of our busy environment we should live constantly in such an atmosphere that we are conscious of the higher plane of life.

Scientists tell us that some crystals are formed perfectly only in stillness. May it not be that our spiritual senses are quickened and developed as we wait in silent fellowship?—CLARENCE E. PICKETT, in The Canadian Friend.

O-SALOOSA, IOWA.

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 463.)

I must have been within about four or five minutes' walk when the train left. The wrecking crew had said I could go in with them which I had understood to be at 5 p. m., but at the station they assured me that while I could do so, the train probably wouldn't leave till midnight. They advised me to return to Sibate for the night. Of course I tried to tell them, in Spanish, what I thought of the affair, and that it was past my comprehension why they had not started the train from the wreck. That would have given us from Sibate some chance. Nor could I get any receipt for my belongings in the freight car, only a verbal promise to take them to Bogota that night.

Of course I should have returned to Sibate for another night. But I looked across the three kilometres, two miles, which separated me from that little hamlet, and a great desire not to spend another night in Sibate filled me. I thought of my dirty damp clothes, and no change; of the evening with nothing to do; of the night and of the pulgas (fleas); likely enough the wreck would not be cleared out by morning; also now I was already under way. Suppose I should walk on. It was a terrible distance, nearly twenty-seven kilometres—eighteen miles, but then there was the most level of railroad lines, a good path beside it (at least at start), and, failing the railroad, a roadway, excepting one (that north from Bogota), the broadest and most traveled in all Colombia. I should get in between 10 and 11 p. m., really not very late, and walking with a purpose seemed preferable to roaming, waiting for bed-time in Sibate.

I walked on. The light faded, at last even from the sky in the west. It was partly cloudy, partly starlight. The walking proved fair, and the kilometre-posts decidedly closer together and more encouraging than mile-posts are at home. A certain type of small bridge gave me some trouble. In these the rail is run along a plank, this plank, not greatly wider on each side than the width of the rail, sloping away from the rail, and wet with rain, consequently slippery. I nearly lost my balance several times crossing these. At first, as the light faded in the west, the eastern sky was black, but gradually a dull light grew brighter, and rounding a point of mountain appeared Bogota, then only some eight miles off, a studded band of light at the base of its huge black mountains. It was there that I left the railroad and followed the shorter road toward town.

I am speaking calmly of that walk, but I cannot think of it without almost a shudder and a resolve never again, except under absolute necessity, to walk so much as a mile of country road in Colombia by night. Now I understand fully why Colombian peons carry with them such heavy clubs when they tramp these roads. I had only a light switch, for clubs do not grow in the sabana; my camera-tripod, which would have made a good weapon, was in the knapsack locked up in that freight car. I had underrated completely the dogs which are so abundant here. It is very rarely one can make friends with dogs here. Almost invariably they are sullen and sink away. Frequently they had barked at me, but always from a safe distance. I expected to be barked at on this walk, and so it was at almost every house. If the dog was alone that was all, but if several, encouraged by numbers, there would be an onslaught. Three times I know not how I kept them off. My switch soon broke, and in the last encounter, much the worst, I broke one handle of my camera case. This last was near to Bogota, on the broad road, at a place by which I had passed in perfect quietude during the day. I suppose at least five dogs were almost upon me. I suppose they had learned to fear clubs and so made way for the dark, heavy-looking object, my camera case. That I should escape being bitten seemed at the time the impossible; that I did is cause for as complete thankfulness as my short career has known. Oh, the joy of reaching the first street light of Bogota! From there on was safety, for it seems to be only in the dark that these dogs are assailants.

And how good was the lemonade which I drank at a bar (I don't approve of such places) on the Plaza Bolivar, expecting no other supper (it being then about 10.35 P. M.)! And what blessings I felt ready to pour upon the head of that waiter-boy in the hotel here, who meeting me in the passage a little before eleven, ventured to ask if I'd had any supper! There had been a night session of the legislature, and some senators or representatives were dining late. So I sat down to a chicken dinner. And that same boy (blessings!) got me some hot water.

The next morning, day before yesterday morning, I went off at once to the station, and there, true to promise, and no charge whatever, were my specimens and Birtchet's knapsack. Jose was not there as I expected he would be, it being about the time for the arrival of the Sibate train. Instead, while I was out, it seems he called at the hotel, learned of my late arrival the night before, pieced together from my having no horse and the absence of a train at that hour, that I must have walked, and set off, it seems in some perturbation, to consult the Birtchets about where I could be now. If he had any fears about my sanity, I'm sure I've allayed them since—but I do fully agree, from actual knowledge, that to take such a walk in Colombia by night is about as injudicious a thing as a person can do.

All day, day before yesterday, till nearly ten at night, I was busy caring for specimens, a rich and valuable array. The quina had not come, but has, since, as I've said.

The Birtchets ask how I have gotten Jose so devoted to me, and one of the party has told me that he appears the best specimen of the Colombian peon (he doesn't seem that class) that she has seen. He certainly is capable, willing, absolutely dependable, and I think we have been most fortunate to have him.

Of course, when I sent Jose to return the knapsack to the Birtchets, he told them what he knew of my adventures. I fear that walk is something I cannot, if I would, hide under a bushel. Apropos of Jose as a good servant, I may say that the Birtchet's have apparently far the most intelligent and nicest-looking girl servant I have yet seen in Colombia. I hear she has been in better circumstances, but through some reverses of the family, is with them.

Seventh-day we all (Birtchets et al) go to Zipaquira to see the famous salt-mines, and I definitely plan to stay some days for plants. I scarcely expect the richness of Sibate, but who knows.

Now, as you know, I'm most intensely interested in news from home, but it's been long since I've heard. Seventh-day last I sent a telegram to Barranquilla, and next week expect my arrears of letters. How much, indeed, I should like to be home with you, but even more am I anxious for instructions really to work here.

FRANCIS.

(To be concluded.)

Selected for "THE FRIEND" by Edward Wood.
"THE CHURCH MILITANT."

I

An unbeliever—oft I went
Into the Church to find content,
And waited, that my soul might see
Man's most Divine Humanity.
Ah! Not for me the peace of prayer
Nor all the bliss of worship there.
Though holy with antiquity,
Scant comfort had the creed for me;

Yet creed nor ritual scarce could hide
The spirit of the Crucified,
And, from the Church's inmost shrine,
Christ's very eyes looked into mine.

II

Within the Church again I stood
When half the world was red with blood,
And said—Here shall I find release
From strife! Here reigns the Prince of Peace!
That still small voice I'll hear again,
More potent than the rage of men!
Here calm-eyed Reason shall discourse,
Proclaiming force no cure for force,
And bidding men—as Peter's Lord
Bade him of old—"Put up thy sword!"

But in God's house I found dark Hate
And Fury set in Love's estate,
The songs of peace are put away,
Christ's priests cry out—"Go forth and slay!"
And in the Church, my soul unblest,
I see my Christ in khaki dress.

III

O, sadder than the blood which rains
Its fruitless showers on Europe's plains!
O, sadder than the widow's moan
Or Belgium's suffocated groan!
Man's heavenliest Gospel is denied,
His blackest crime is sanctified,
And, through great Europe's war-drunk lands,
Christ's Church for bloody violence stands.

For, when the State unsheathed the sword,
The servile Church forgot her Lord.
Among the nations had she stood
For Europe's wider brotherhood,
Had she reeked less of earthly things
And served alone the King of Kings
Her word had curbed, in that wild hour,
The people's rage, the kinglet's power.

Though sect and schism-torn she be,
 She's one in her apostasy,
 For in that ancient Church of God,
 Where men acknowledge Peter's rod,
 Or where the lowly blood is blest
 By holy icons manifest,
 In cities where great Luther stood,
 Where men still pray to Luther's God,
 Alike, where English bellfries chime
 Their solemn notes at worship time,
 Or in those homes of simpler prayer
 Where bows the pious covananter,
 Where Bunyan speaks or Wesley sings,
 Or fervent Hallelujah rings,
 The Church, with one voice, speaks to-day—
 "In Jesus' Name, go forth and slay!"
 This is the Antichrist to be!
 This is the second Calvary!
 Lo! In the fanes of His renown
 The broken-hearted Christ looks down.
 —HERBERT BLOYE, in the Labour Leader.

A HERO OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

(Concluded from page 487.)

"We set out early in the morning on foot, serious and deep thoughts attending my mind. We seemed like sheep going a second time before the slaughter, without any outward obligation: travelled about twelve miles, crossed Savannah river, and came up with a colonel and his men, who had got there the night before. A captain looking earnestly at us, began to examine what our business was, and hearing the account we gave, (slender indeed in his view,) viz.: 'to visit our brethren at Wrightsborough,' he appeared surprised and mistrustful; asked us for a pass, which we gave him; he ordered us to follow him, and led us to the colonel. Our certificates, General Greene's friendly letter, and permission, being read to him, they asked why we were travelling on foot. We told them we were robbed not far from that place, about two weeks before. They said they had heard of us down at Augusta, and if we would stay, they thought they could find our horses, for they knew who had them. And as I was describing my horse, a soldier said, he thought my horse was in the company; and I soon found the horse, saddle, and bridle; for that wicked man had just ridden up. I informed the colonel, who had him immediately taken and put under guard, and then sent out a scout after the other, who had my companion's mare, saddle, and saddle-bags, and confined him also, which greatly surprised them. They sent for us, and desired we would forgive them. We inquired where our goods were. They readily informing us; we told them that all we wanted was what we had lost, and that they would repent and amend their ways of living; that we could forgive them and do them a kindness if it lay in our power, although they had injured us. They appeared low in their minds, for the colonel declared they should be hanged, as many accusations of their wickedness and barbarity came against them.

"We got the principal part of our goods, lodged with the soldiery that night, and next morning rode to Friends' settlement. I hope, with thankful hearts, and visited the meetings of Friends both at Wrightsborough and at New Purchase. Finding my mind clear, turned my face homewards, and as I rode, a hope renewedly revived, that I should see my little family again. I felt them near to my heart, although by computation eight hundred miles distant from them. We crossed Savannah river, and travelled towards Ninety-six, where the armies were fighting; and when we drew near, became doubtful how we should pass, as the cannon were firing fast, and the road we were in, leading immediately to the British garrison, we knew of no way to escape; but a friendly man overtook us, and told us that he would pilot us round, and a difficult path it proved; sometimes we were close by where they were fighting, or firing upon the garrison; and as we passed through the skirts of General Greene's army, the cross officer, whose prisoner I had been when at Camden, saw me ride on as I before had told him. He called to me: 'What! old fellow, are you there?' I answered him according to his question. He asked how I came to deceive him. I replied, I had not, and that he knew it. He came to me, took me by the hand in a friendly way, and said, he hoped I had done no harm. I told him, I did not intend harm; and with some more friendly conversation we parted. Just before we got round into the road, General Greene's men fell upon a fort or redoubt but a little way from us, making a terrible noise. There was a great stir among the people, some running one way, and some another; some hiding behind trees; we rode smartly on, and could hear them for about seven miles without intermission. We passed on towards North Carolina, without any other remarkable interruption. As for my service and exercise in the ministry, I have left it to the judgment of my brethren. My Master had a service for me there, and I trusted my life in his hand, travelled on, and so obtained a reward which is more precious than gold.

"ABEL THOMAS."

"SEVENTH MONTH 7TH, 1781."

He was favored to return to his family and friends in peace, and delivering up his certificate, gave an affecting account of his exercises.

He attained the seventy-ninth year of his age after various religious errands in the years subsequent to the experiences already related, as taken from Friends' Library.

"I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go."

"Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord."

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

LETTER FROM FRANCE.

LE GLANDIER, Par Pompador (Correze), First Month 29, 1918.

DEAR CHARLES EVANS:—

I wish I had the ability to write thee so as to give an impression strong enough of the splendid chances we have here to work. I have only been here a couple of regular days, but I am delighted with the place and can not be too enthusiastic over it.

It is beautiful, very beautiful, around here, and the old castle is splendidly adapted for this school. The large playground is the best thing about it as far as we are concerned and I would not want a better one if I had the chance to order it made myself. Things are ever so much better and more comfortable and workable than I had expected to find. The six hundred children all seem pretty well and happy, especially good-natured when one considers what they have gone through.

We have already gotten organized. As a commencement Captain Graux has given us the entire control of the playground and the schedule is arranged so that all the children come to us every day. The groups are large yet, but when we have more men we can do better work.

Henry Strater has made a wonderful beginning to this work and is doing splendidly. He has already given the children a great deal and has awakened in all of them the enthusiasm that is going to be the basis for our work with them later on.

There are about twenty-two Belgian men here as teachers, so we have no duties at all except on the playground, which opens at 8.30 and closes at 4.30 or 5.00. Our days are busy, but the work we are going to be able to do will be well worth while.

We have the girls as well as the boys to direct on the playground. Such dear youngsters I have never before seen. Such responsive little souls and such honest sincere hearts. Loving children as I do, I am in a seventh heaven here.

The idea has occurred to Henry and me that perhaps the Friends could send a few of our women here, to work in an intimate way among the girls on the playground and during the time when they are not in class. There are six or seven young French women here, but they are not of the type that work in as they should. They take no personal interest in the girls and consequently do not get as close to them as they should. Captain Graux said when we were talking about it to him that he would like very much to have some Friends (women) come to help out on the playground and in the dortoirs at night.

Henry [Strater] and I are agreed that it is a great chance to come into close contact with a great number of children and to do a great good. Also that it would be pleasant work and any of our women who would come would be very happy. There are nearly fifty people here of all branches. Doctors, nurses, dentists, teachers, etc., and we have a splendid time together. The accommodations are very comfortable and the meals splendid. We wonder if they could put this before the F. W. V. R. C. If necessary, some one else could be sent down here to look the proposition over, but I am sure any one who came would be of the same opinion as we are. Captain Graux said if he could have three or four American or English Friends (women) in three weeks he could replace the French teachers who are here now, but who do not fill the bill.

Personally, I think we men are going to have the chance to do some wonderful work for these children. It is an opportunity that cannot be estimated in its effects. I am extremely delighted with everything I find here, and the same chance is open now for women. I hope it can be accepted. (I wish a few women whom I know in Philadelphia could be here to undertake some of this work). We shall be very much interested to hear what the F. W. V. R. C. thinks of the proposition when they bring it up.

And I do wish thee could come to Le Glandier for a visit. Thee would enthuse, I am sure. It is perfect spring weather here, with sunshine every day so far.

The country round about here is wonderful. We feel as though we were in the Adirondacks or in New England. Nearly forty young men and young women are about the Chartreuse already and it is very pleasant to know them. The Belgians, the French and the Americans make a fine company. We talk French all the time and it is going to be a wonderful chance for us to perfect what little French we have.

We have been so busy that it has been hard even to find time to write this letter. Can thee let us know how this idea strikes the Paris Office, as soon as she finds out, so we can tell Captain Graux. I hope they will see fit to send some women here in a few weeks.

We shall be ready to welcome Vickers and Morton as soon as they come. Strater, who knows Morton, thinks he will be fine here.

Best wishes to thee and the people in Paris.

Sincerely,

Signed: EDWIN C. ZAVITZ.

SCHOOL FOR ONE THOUSAND BELGIAN CHILDREN REPATRIATED THROUGH SWITZERLAND.

This is one of the most recent lines of work in which Friends are co-operating with the American Red Cross.

DESCRIPTION.—A former monastery is being refitted for use as a school for one thousand Belgian children, between the ages of seven and fifteen years, who have been repatriated through Switzerland. Six hundred arrived five weeks ago; the rest arrive this month. Of these, six hundred will be boys. The school is to be continued until after the war. There will be studies, work (combining with it as much as possible trade instruction) and physical education.

THE WORK.—Captain Graux wishes the boys to have physical exercises, sports, scouting, etc., according to English and American ideas. Belgian or French workers have no knowledge of such instruction; he himself initiated boy scouting in Belgium. He can secure Belgian soldiers for teaching and surveillance.

In his letter, Captain Graux outlined a plan whereby the Friends would be in charge of the boys at all times except when in classes. Now, however, he is promised six more professeurs, so that the Friends would not need to act as surveillants during the night. They would organize and direct games and sports; co-operate with the workmen, who direct the chores and trade instruction; and co-operate with the professeurs during the day in the directing, or surveillance.

DURATION.—The aim of the work would be to impress upon the boys what is best in the American and English idea of training and sport. Consequently, the men should conduct the training for a period long enough for it to have a permanent effect in moulding the characters of the boys. It would not be worth while to enter into the work for less than five months, at the least, although the Friends might be replaced by new English or American workers.

QUALIFICATIONS.—The men would not need to be athletes, but would have to be able to organize and instruct large numbers of the boys in the sports. It would be well to have at least one worker who knew boy scout work, since the country is well adapted to this. They would need to be men who could maintain discipline among the boys. Knowledge of French would be essential, although a man who could speak French brokenly, could issue the necessary commands, and would rapidly acquire facility by the constant contact with the Belgians. All of the children are Walloons, that is, they all speak French and not Flemish.

The men would necessarily have to have a strong attraction for the work, since the organization will not be perfected for some time, and there would be many discouragements. To do the work well, it would require the most constant effort. No man could undertake it as a holiday from the other work of the Friends, since it would be in many respects harder. It would also require tact.

HENRY STRATER.

HOME FOR BABIES.

AT ST. REMY EN BOUZEMONT.

You come downstairs from the pleasant room that has been set aside for sick or tired workers in the war zone, and a regular hum of conversation greets your ears. It rises from the sunny play-room where the large family of babies, nineteen at present, shortly to be thirty, aged from nine months to two-and-a-half years, is desporting itself. The language is quite unintelligible, even to the initiated, consisting as it does of baby words in a foreign tongue or that terrible mixture we call "Français," but it is cheerful sound. You find them all busily employed chattering to one another or sitting and investigating the insides of dolls of too fragile a nature, which in a mistaken hour you have presented to them. You sit down on the floor and in a moment you are submerged by a wave of them; three or four in your lap, the rest climbing over you. Not being on duty you have no cap on, and one or two of the shyest of them gaze at you doubtfully to be sure that you are really the "Auntie" you pretend to be, then their recollection wakes up and they, too, throw themselves upon the part of your anatomy that is still visible to the naked eye. Your buttons, your fountain pen, your brooch, are objects of their affectionate investigation and you are lucky if your watch escapes too vigorous a sucking.

By ten o'clock they are in their pen—a large wire netting enclosure, like a gigantic chicken run, on the sunny graveled terrace, trotting about unsteadily, searching for mud to play with and generally finding it, or lolling on the straw-filled mattresses at one end. The puppy Jumbo makes frantic leaps at them outside the wire and one or two of the bolder spirits encourage him, but sad to say, a few of the tiny ones are frightened and weep a little, so he is chased away. Far below them lies the moat where the swan, their great excitement, lives. The most advanced of them call her the chicken and great is their delight when she walks about the land.

Beyond the moat stretches the lovely meadow with the border of tall trees where they will play when summer comes. In this wintry season the south terrace is the warmest place for them, and their pen a safe haven from which they cannot stray.

The wooden gate is shut down upon them and there they remain until their dinner time. Open the gate and call and see the quaint sight. Up the steps they tumble, crawling on hands and knees, and those who cannot arrive at even this point of activity stretch out their little arms to be carried. Like a flock of birds, they sit around in rows and open their mouths for the good, thick vegetable soup and bread; only the few more advanced among them being able to feed themselves. What platefuls they get through with and what comfortable well-filled expressions they put on afterwards!

Two o'clock and an extraordinary silence reigns everywhere. You peep into the night nurseries, with their rows of little cots, each with its flower-bespinkled quilt, and there in the sun with the windows wide open lies every baby curled up, or clasping some beloved toy, sound asleep.

When they wake again a cup of milk and a solid crust to gnaw, and after that more conversation and investigation of the world in general. You meet them in the kitchen, they stagger at you in the hall and clasp you round the knees, and smiles and good temper reign all day, except at certain disconcerting intervals, such as face-washing time, which no self-respecting baby can endure. Then supper, and the great business of the day, bath time. A scene of noise and excitement in the warmed bath-rooms, splashing and delight for some, a horrible ordeal for others, according to their various tastes. The clean and healthy little bodies are tucked into their cots and although their mothers are not there they do not lack a good night hug, their many "Aunties" see to that. Then silence all through the night, for they sleep well.

Poor little war victims, separated from their mothers by the menace of the guns, they are having in spite of it, such a chance of healthy boyhood as they could never have arrived at even in their own homes. Thanks to the American Red Cross they have everything that conduces to health and happiness and were they kings and queens or the wealthiest American citizens, they could have no more.

Here in this peaceful spot one can forget for a moment the war and all its horrors—love and life are all around—growth and development instead of death and destruction.

When the war is ended and their mothers come to claim their children, the care they have had will help in one tiny corner to promote that sense of love and brotherhood between the nations which is the only guarantee of a "just and lasting peace."

EDITH M. PYE.

USE OF TOBACCO.

We are all rejoicing that the National Constitution Amendment has been passed and hoping ere long it may be ratified by all the States, or at least enough of them to exclude liquor entirely from our country.

Do we realize another powerful evil is still with us and increasing all the time? This is the use of tobacco, especially in the form of cigarettes. Reliable authority states the increase in the use of cigarettes during the first two months of 1917, was fifty per cent. greater than for the corresponding months of 1916, and there will be a demand for six billion to supply the army of a million men in 1918, or five hundred million a month.

Have we done anything to discourage the collection of great sums of money to buy tobacco and cigarettes for those young men in the army? Many have been sent through the Red Cross and in Comfort Bags. The Women's Christian Temperance Union does not send tobacco, in any form, in the Comfort Bags prepared by them, but instead sweet chocolate, etc., as the men very much need more sweets than are supplied in their food.

Have we impressed on the minds and hearts of our Young Friends how important it is that the young men refrain entirely from the use of tobacco, if they desire the highest efficiency in their work, whether they labor in this country or across the ocean? The cigarette does spell inefficiency. It affects the heart, lungs, kidneys and all vital organs to their injury. It militates against self-sacrifice, courage, alertness and moral character, all of which we greatly need in work we are called to in these days. Temperance in all things will influence for good.

MARTHA L. PRATT.

LANSDOWNE, Pa., First Month 24, 1918.

EXTRACTS FROM EMILY BRADBURY'S LETTERS FROM RUSSIA UNDER DATES OF ELEVENTH MONTH 9th AND TWELFTH MONTH 6th.

FURNISHED BY AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

BUZULUK.

I am planted in a village of about 5000 people in the middle of the Steppe—miles from anything and it seems like being at the end of the earth. I only know there are 5000 people here, because the other day I went up to the volost (the house of the chief man of the village) and asked and they showed me the book with every "hozyaevn," or head of the family, with his dependents, written in it. You never would dream that there were so many people here, to look at this village—only the richest people have wooden houses—the rest live in mud houses that one can look right over when standing alongside. Every family lives in a kind of "compound" of its own. For instance, our landlord's house is on one side of the gate (a big wooden door) and ours on the other—then built around the barn-yard (we would call it, but the English call it a "compound") are the houses of his brothers and sons. I haven't learned yet just which are the doors to the people's houses and which to the animals—they all look exactly alike—even inside!

We are having quite exciting times now because the refugees can't get anything from the natives. The natives say they haven't enough grain for themselves and they refuse to sell to the refugees, and the refugees refuse to move to another district where the bread is plentiful. [Because of] a riot yesterday four soldiers appeared and all day yesterday and to-day have been searching and when they find any surplus over and above what the man's family needs they take it and sell to the Berjeuz (refugees). There's quite a lot of feeling, naturally, so I guess we'll have more excitement before it's decided whether or not the refugees have to move to another district where the bread is plentiful.

EFLIM FKA.

At last the cart has come to take our letters and things to Buzuluk, though if it does any good to send them, I don't know! I guess when they get through "revoluting" in Moscow they'll send our things along—but now I haven't had any letters for three weeks—though don't tell anybody or I'm afraid they won't even write. Probably, though, something will be on the next cart—for we hear that things are quiet again in Moscow and Petrograd. It's so hard to believe that there is any trouble in Russia—way down here everything is so quiet and nothing different except that some of the soldiers are home saying that peace has been declared for three months. When the three months began or whether it's true I don't know! Life here goes on just the same.

I have been trying to find out from each woman in the work-room just how much money she receives from the Government—for every person over sixty and under fourteen receives four roubles ten kopecks a month—very few of the women receive money for themselves—only a few of those whose husbands have been killed at the front—but they, most of them, get money for their old people and children. Here a person of sixty is really old—and when you think that the bread they eat in one month comes to about five roubles—well, it's hard to understand just how they make ends meet. When we remember that this is the only work the women can get—otherwise they would have no money at all—then this work seems worth while. This gives them only the barest necessities—but then the natives themselves have mighty little besides.

EMILIE BRADBURY.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
"IT MAY BE AT MORN OR IT MAY BE AT MIDNIGHT."

It matters not, the manner of our going;
Sooner or later comes the Master's call.
In Summer's sunshine or in Winter's blowing—
The message comes to all.

Perehance our last farewell we may be taking
In calm communion with a loving heart.
Or in fierce winds and sudden waves high breaking
Our spirits may depart

It matters not, if only we are ready;
Doing His will, accepted by His grace.
Bearing the banner of our great hope steady,
And standing in our place.

It matters not—the way of life's confusion.
If by redeeming love we are possessed,
In deepest hush, or wildest storm's confusion—
Our Father knoweth best

—L. C. W.

NEWS ITEMS.

During the Twelfth Month the cars of Friends' Unit in Italy have covered 23,584 kilometres and carried 1,575 patients (187 lying and 1,388 sitting). The totals to date are 965,002 kilometres; 132,961 patients (34,283 lying and 98,678 sitting).

P. J. BAKER,
Acting Commandant.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE FOR WEEK ENDING THIRD MONTH 16, 1918.

From 19 Meetings	$23,101.52
From 18 Individuals	1,132.40
For Armenian and Syrian Relief	49.00
For Buttons	20.50
	$24,303.42

CHARLES F. JENKINS, Treasurer.

The following books are suggested by Robert L. Kelley in the American Friend for use in an important movement to impress students with the obligations of the present world situation:

Among the courses which are suggested to the local groups are Bosworth's "Studies about Jesus," Sheldon's "Christianity, Democracy and Internationalism," Glover's "The Jesus of History," Murray's "The World Task of the Church in Our Time," Soper's "The Faiths of Mankind," Rauschenbusch's "The Social Principles of Jesus" and Ward-Edwards' "Christianizing Community Life."

CANADA MILITARY SERVICE ACT.—Albert S. Rogers, acting for Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends, and C. O. Zavitz, for Genesee Yearly Meeting, have filed with the Central Appeal Judge Duff, at Ottawa, documents and declarations showing Friends' position regarding war, for final reference in cases of appeal for exemption of Friends from service under Military Service Act.

Up to the present date, although in a few cases appeal was carried from decision of local tribunal to first Appeal Courts, all members applying for exemption have, so far as reported, been granted exemption from combatant service. Members engaged in agriculture have in most cases like other farmers been granted total exemption on the ground of Agricultural Service. The question as to what will constitute non-combatant service for Friends has not yet been determined.—From The Canadian Friend.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE.—The following men and women sailed recently for France:—Laura Ethel Comfort, Tecumseh, Michigan; Joel Bean Cox, Wailiki, Maui, Hawaii; Francis H. Diamond, Devon, Penna.; Paul G. Engel, Central City, Neb.; A. Russell Heaton, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; Horace P. Hill, Minneapolis, Minn.; Samuel Morris, Philadelphia, Pa.; Charles Leslie Pennell, Lausdovne, Pa.; Dixon Cole Phillips, Plainfield, N. J.; Vernon L. Pike, Wichita, Kansas; E. Merrill Root, Somerville, Mass.; Carleton E. Sager, Philadelphia, Pa.; Harvey S. Thatcher, Utica, Ohio; Cleaver Shoemaker Thomas, Chester, Pa.; Herbert N. Baker, Tonganoxie, Kansas; Frank E. Colcord, Newberg, Oregon; Milton P. Hunter, Pleasantville, N. Y.; F. Raymond Jenkins, Richmond, Ind.; Harvey E. Kitts, Kokomo, Ind.; Clifford T. Knight, Oskaola, Iowa; Maynard J. McKay, Wilmington, Ohio; Willard B. Otis, Venice Center, N. Y.; Dr. Marianna Taylor, St. Davids, Pa.; Lester B. Wright, Newberg, Oregon.

Friends at Cornell University hold services every First-day night. Our numbers are rather small, perhaps averaging about fifteen. Willard Otis recently left for service in France. But the interest is entirely independent of large or small audiences. Each one feels a vital part in the meeting. We are not allowing our militaristic surroundings to divide or distract our interest in Reconstruction work. Before Christmas we held a meeting to get a comprehensive idea of the work being done, and also to mobilize our forces. As evidence of our actual interest we have already sent a neat sum to the Service Committee, and some sewing is being done.

A most profitable meeting was held on the 7th, when Levinus Painter portrayed by means of lantern slides, copies of Henry Scattergood's, to a group of Friends, the actual work being done by the Reconstruction Unit in France. The pathetic views of orphaned children, homeless widows and bereaved old, reminded us afresh that "Europe is indeed a suffering Europe." The acute and tragic conditions as revealed made us shudder to think that the end of such destruction is not yet. The speaker in simple words set forth the opportunity for helping. And such an opportunity it is. It would seem an enviable privilege to relieve the suffering and distress of those innocent sufferers. The simple deeds of the Reconstructionists, because of the good will they express, of the hope they inspire and of the life revived, seem almost to be lifted out of the material world. Truly they are "good Samaritans." Constructive measures are fascinating because of the ultimate good accomplished. Any one can tear down. But a man's best is called forth to create. If the present generation owes a debt of making a better world for the future, it must begin by reconstructing and replacing the pieces of the present one. This we were glad to see is the way our men and women are doing under the red star of service.

JOHN T. CHAFFELL.

TO THE REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.—The present titanic international struggle presents conditions to the American people heretofore unknown.

Friends, who have for two centuries upheld to the world the doctrine of Peace, Good Will and Brotherhood, are once again experiencing a time of testing of principles; this is in large measure being effected through its young men of draft age.

Our sympathies towards these need to be enlarged, for their problems are complex.

The doctrines of our Christian faith remain unchanged.

In previous wars, as is the case to-day, some of our young men express their loyalty to government by accepting military service; a much larger number, however, just as fully imbued with a love of their country, are firmly convinced that all participation in war is fundamentally wrong; they, therefore, feel bound to refuse military service of any kind. We have fifty members whose ages ranged between twenty-one and thirty-one years when the recent Selective Service Regulations went into effect, who have accepted military service of one form or another.

As the result of a careful inquiry (a few men having not yet been heard from) we learn that there are, as nearly as is possible to state, one hundred and fifty-two men of draft age, members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who claimed exemption from military service under Series IX of the Questionnaire; this list included twenty-seven men who are engaged in Reconstruction work in France or Italy under the Friends' Service Committee or allied organizations; our total membership of draft age being two hundred and ninety-nine. In addition to the last class named there are in service seven young men who had not attained their majority at the time the draft laws became effective.

Though not representing the Friends' Service Committee, we can but commend the unselfish labor of love, being performed in foreign lands by our young men, who are receiving no pecuniary return for their work.

The number of our members in the military cantonnments, who are upholding our testimonies in opposition to militarism is but seven. Under existing laws, this number is likely to be materially increased in the near future; we are confidently hoping, however, that legislation will very soon be enacted which will empower the Secretary of War to grant furloughs for engagement in civil pursuits to men called to camp. This will, we trust, furnish avenues for service which will be acceptable to the most pronounced conscientious objectors, held in what, in some instances, is practically imprisonment.

Our men in the cantonments have their faith strengthened by the position taken by the Menonites, and kindred sects, who far out-numbered our members so situated, and who for the most part have refused even voluntary service of any kind. There is in Camp Meade a sort of fellowship existing among all the conscientious objectors, including the Socialists and some other organizations; this has cemented what has at times been the wavering strength of some—it has also caused complications from the standpoint of camp administration.

Existing legislation provided for the religious objectors, but not for those whose opposition to militarism was based on other than Christian grounds.

Most of our men in camp have accepted voluntary work in the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., or Library; with the distinct understanding that such service in no way involved them under the military law, and they do not expect to accept government remuneration for their work.

The study course organized some time ago is, we trust, proving a benefit, in improving the conditions of the men in whom we are particularly interested. Of the classes in French, English and Church History, the first-named is much the largest, others than Friends are beneficiaries in this service. William Bacon Evans makes weekly visits to the camp in the interest of the study of French, which action is appreciated by his students as well as this committee.

Arrangements are being made for weekly visits to Camp Meade and Dix (mostly on First-days) by interested Friends. Our men whose privileges are so circumscribed, need spiritual uplift under the depressing influences to which they are subjected, as well as the hand shake and cheer of those who may show their sympathy by making the trip to camp. We feel that this is an important duty which Friends should not lightly set aside when impressed with a sense thereof.

We endeavor to keep in touch with the whole situation through our offices, at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

On behalf of the Committee,

WM. B. HARVEY.

PHILADELPHIA, Third Month 15, 1918.

[THE following in regard to the meeting at Winnipeg is kindly copied from a private letter by one of our subscribers.—Eds.]

Our Meeting for Worship has been regularly and constantly kept up, and we cannot but thankfully acknowledge we have been favored at times with showers of blessings, cheering our hearts, and strengthening us to run the race set before each one. Not long since we received into membership a young American man, who after over a year's consistent walk, applied for membership and was in due course received as a fellow member. We now have a very intelligent Irishlander who speaks English fairly well. He is entirely opposed, as we are, to war. He has read several of our Friends' books in the Winnipeg public library. He now attends our meeting, but sees a prospect of being conscripted, but he is a C. O., and will not fight. He wants a "Barclay's Apology" and is willing to pay for it, and would like any other Friends' books. (These have been forwarded.) We have the same troubles to contend with as you have—cases of abuse of C. O.'s by the military officials. May we be careful to let our light shine in the peaceable, gentle spirit of Christ. The Lord ruleth the raging of the sea, and He is able to bring forth good out of evil. The sailor well knows the darkest hour of night is not seldom just before the dawn.

AN EXCERPT FROM A FRENCH NEWSPAPER, SHOWING DEEP APPRECIATION OF THE WORK OF THE FRIENDS' UNIT.

How the French receive the help of British and American Friends is shown in the following extract from Messenger of the Marne, of Vitry-le-François. An almost identical account appeared in the Journal of the Marne, of Chalons.

"The Maternity Hospital of the British Society of Friends, aided by the American Red Cross, has decided to give once a week, at Birty, three medical consultations for children under thirteen years of age, whether of refugee families or not.

"Yesterday afternoon, on the occasion of the opening of the consultations, Mennesier, Sub-prefect, M. Paillard, President, and the other members of the special delegation, visited the dispensaries in the Place Royer Collard.

"Received with a charming simplicity, these gentlemen were able to observe the perfect organization of this new institution. Many mothers were already with their children awaiting the care of the doctor, Ethel L. Heard, whose devotion is above praise. After admiring the embroidery made by the émigrés, re-sold for the benefit of the work for refugees, the President of the Special Delegation warmly congratulated the members of the Society whose constant activity for our sorely tried people has never ceased since the beginning of the war.

"In the name of the City of Vitry, and in witness of his gratitude, M. Paillard presented to Miss Eleanora Iredale, leader of the Friends' Units at Vitry, a plaque made of Champagne clay, the first example of which was presented some time ago to the glorious victor of the Marne, Marshal Joffre.

"Much touched by this gift, Miss Iredale gracefully thanked M. Paillard. She appreciated, she said, the value of this souvenir from Vitry, and the Society of Friends would feel honored in jealously preserving it. If the Allies love France passionately for her devotion to the ideal and her call of justice, they love her soil, too, and, she concluded, "we have always had a special preference for your beautiful Champagne, whose soil is preserved in this precious plaque which you have given us."

"In the name of the mothers of Vitry, we permit ourselves to add our thanks to those expressed to the Members of the Society of Friends by the sub-Prefect and the members of the Special Delegation."

It is understood that Joshua L. Baily, Jr., whose release from camp was noted in last number, intends to visit C. O.'s in all the cantonments after seeing his wife in California.

THE note of explanation in last week's paper did not properly correct our mistake with Anna J. Haines's copied letter. The word smuggled was used by her only in connection with a salad. The typist who copied her letter had not followed her paragraphing, and this fact misled us entirely as to her meaning.

CORRESPONDENCE.

31, RUE BERGÈRE, PARIS, le Second Month 14, 1918.

In these days when it is so easy to let oneself believe that the powers of evil have utterly routed the forces of righteousness, we have been glad of the sustained effort of THE FRIEND to preserve "an even keel." There is a great need everywhere that we do not let ourselves grow cynical or despondent, and that we help others out of the slough if they fall in.

I have wondered if any letter war-time motto for THE FRIEND could be found than the wonderful passage of George Fox's:

"I saw an ocean of darkness and death, but I saw an infinite ocean of life and light flow over the ocean of darkness and death. And in this I saw the goodness of God." And I have wondered, too, if there might not be a real service in having it appear week after week, in the heavy type you sometimes use, directly underneath the Editors' announcement. What would thee think of it?

ALFRED LOWMY, JR.

[THIS is Herbert Nicholson's circular letter to his young Friends in America. Although much belated, it still has a fresh message.—Eds.]

30 KOUN CHO, Mita, Shiba, Tokyo, Japan, Eleventh Month 23, 1917.
DEAR FRIENDS:—

—To-day is the national thanksgiving day—the time when the people, having gathered their crops, give thanks to the Emperor. Last month they had a day when they gave thanks to the gods. Both these days are school holidays, but the ordinary laborers—like myself—do not get any time off. Then, next week comes our American Thanksgiving. So you see we have lots of time to give thanks out here!

Last night we had a thanksgiving meeting in the Christian Endeavor to give thanks to the true God for His many blessings. At that time I was trying to think of something to be especially thankful for and I could only think of things for which I was not at all thankful, at first. I had a cold, the proof for two things I had at the printers had failed to come on time, I had just that afternoon pushed a pedal off my bicycle. The price of fuel was so high I usually had cold feet, the work of repairing the buildings was still dragging, I was "out" with the cook, etc., etc. And, then, to go beyond my own little circle, I find all sorts of troubles. Labor in Japan, as in other countries, is having its fight with capital—trying to get its fair share of the profits of production. Just last week the big T. K. K. ship yards had a strike in which several hundred thousand yen's worth of damage was done to property besides the loss of work. Capital is shutting down on labor and there is going to be a blow-up some day, it is feared. There is practically no organized labor in Japan and the employers are very much afraid of such things as unions being started. Then, to look beyond our little country we see all sorts of revolutions, etc., going on in China, in Russia, and so forth; and worst of all, the great war. You back home have enough troubles to worry you also. Not much to be thankful for—eh? If we were true Japanese we would say, "Shikata ga nai" (It can't be helped) and go on about our business. But here's just the thing I found to be thankful for. There is a way out. It can be helped. And the worse the difficulties, the greater our thankfulness that they can be surmounted.

"For God so loved the world that He sent His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." There is a way out of our own personal difficulties—and there is a way for all who believe. In God's plan there is also salvation for the whole world. We can not save it; but through His power we can bring others to Him and fight the forces of the evil one. In the end we shall have to leave it to Him and may the Son soon come to take possession in His glory and power!

One other thing I have to be thankful for is that Tom and Esther Jones are expected in three days. It will be great to give the keys of the house over to Tom and turn the household cares over to Esther! We have tried to give the house a thorough cleaning from top to bottom. It has not been as good a cleaning as I would like to have given it, but this was a case of "Shikata ga nai!" I had other things to attend to, so could not supervise very closely. (I would like to have had hold of those carpets and given them a good, old-fashioned beating!)

There are many other things to be thankful for—for instance, that day after to-morrow is the second anniversary of my arrival in Japan and I have not forgotten it! Work is going on smoothly on the whole and progress is being made in various lines. I have enough to do to keep me from being lonely. And I am most thankful that I have so many good friends back home, who are interested in hearing from me occasionally and who are lacking of me in more ways than one.

May rich blessings be yours in this thanksgiving time.

NOTICES.

YEARLY MEETING NOTICES.—The Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, usually holds sessions at Fourth and Arch Streets on Seventh and Third-days at 10 A. M.; this year on the twenty-third and twenty-sixth, respectively.

The regular Yearly Meeting sessions are as follows: Second-day, 10 A. M.; Third-day, 2 P. M.; Fourth-day, 10 A. M.; Fifth-day, 2 P. M.; Sixth-day, 10 A. M.; These are all at Fourth and Arch Streets.

SECOND-DAY, THIRD MONTH 25th—Afternoon—3.00 o'clock—Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia.—Mansaku Nakamura San, the Evangelist in charge of our Mission Station at Tsuchiura, in Baraki Province, Japan, will speak in the Japanese language on "Religious Conditions in Japan from the Viewpoint of a Japanese." Gilbert Bowles will interpret. Minnie P. Bowles will speak on "Why I Wish to Return to Japan." "The Challenge of the Missionary Situation to the Society of Friends" will be the topic of an address by Gilbert Bowles.

3.30 o'clock—Indian Aid.—Forty-ninth Annual Meeting of the Philadelphia Indian Aid Association. A brief report for the past year. George VAUX, Jr., Chairman of the United States Board of Indian Commissioners, is expected to address the Meeting on some personal observations amongst present Indians of Oklahoma.

Evening—7.30 o'clock—Freedmen.—Annual Meeting of the Friends' Freedmen's Association. Report of the Board of Managers. Annual Report of Christiansburg Industrial Institute, Edgar A. Long, Principal. Address on Negro Education, J. D. Eggleston, President Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

THIRD-DAY, THIRD MONTH 26th—Evening—7.30 o'clock—Temperance.—Annual Meeting of the Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. E. F. Hobson, President of Blue Ridge College, Maryland, will speak on the subject, "The New Emancipation." H.

M. Chalfant, Pennsylvania editor of the American Issue, will give a ten minutes' talk on "Pennsylvania's Problem."

FOURTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 27th—Afternoon—3.30 o'clock—North House, Airmail School, Western Soup Society.—Brief reports from North House Association, Airmail School and the Western Soup Society. Address by Dr. Frank D. Watson, Professor of Social Service and Welfare Work, Haverford College. Dr. Watson has had wide experience in work of the character performed by our three Institutions and was consulted as an expert by North House Association before it decided to locate its new work at 864 N. Randolph Street, its present location.

Evening—7.30 o'clock—Bible Schools.—The Fifty-second Annual Meeting of Friends' First-day School Association of Philadelphia and vicinity. Brief Business Meeting. Address by Elinh Grant, of Haverford College.

FIFTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 28th—Meetings for Worship.—Meetings for Worship will be held in the Meeting Houses at Fourth and Arch Streets and on Twelfth Street below Market, at 10 o'clock A. M.

Arch Street Meeting-house—Evening—7.30 to 9.00 o'clock—Peace.—Meeting under the auspices of the Peace Committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends. Addresses by Elbert Russell, Director of Studies at Woodman School, and A. J. Muste, Minister of Central Congregational Church, Newtonville, Mass.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

PEACE COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS DURING YEARLY MEETING WEEK.

Second Floor Hall, Arch Street Centre

Wool for knitting and materials for sewing may be obtained by those interested.

Room 24

Sample foreign garments from abroad will be on exhibit daily. Equipment for canning and drying and free bulletins for distribution will also be on exhibit daily.

Fifth-day, Third Month 28, 1918

Special arrangements for showing off the canning and drying work and chances to enroll in canning and drying clubs will be offered. 1.15 P. M., Special Lecture and Demonstration.

MEETINGS for Worship regularly held at Mansfield, N. J., both on First and Fifth-days, at ten o'clock, will now be held until further notice at the home of John B. Confort, in Columbus. Monthly Meetings will be held as heretofore at the Meeting-house.

MEETINGS from Third Month 31st to Fourth Month 6th:—

Kennett, at Kennett Square, Third-day, Fourth Month 2, at 10 A. M. Chesterfield, at Crosswicks, Third-day, Fourth Month 2, at 10 A. M. Bradford, at Coatesville, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 3, at 10 A. M. New Garden, at West Grove, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 3, at 10 A. M. Upper Springfield, at Mansfield, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 3, at 10 A. M.

Haddonfield, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 3, at 7.30 P. M. Wilmington, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 4, at 7.30 P. M. Uxehlan, at Downingtown, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 4, at 10.30 A. M. London Grove, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 4, at 10 A. M. Falls, at Fällington, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 4, at 10 A. M. Evesham, at Mt. Laurel, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 4, at 10 A. M. Upper Evesham, at Medford, Seventh-day, Fourth Month 6, at 10 A. M.

DIED.—At Downton Lodge, Cokermost, England, the residence of her brother, MARGARET LINDIN, eldest daughter of the late Richard and Rachel Irwin, of Manchester; aged sixty-one years.

—, at Poplar Ridge, New York, on Sixth Month 28, 1917, ELIZABETH GARDNER, aged seventy-four years; a member and Elder of the Scipio Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. Y.

—, at her home in Germantown, on seventh of Third Month, 1918, RUTH LEEDS, widow of James S. Jones; aged sixty-six years; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting.

—, at Media, Pa., on ninth of Third Month, 1918, ELIZABETH L. THOMAS, aged ninety-nine years; widow of Caleb E. Thomas; a member of Concord Monthly Meeting.

Is Your Life Insurance Adequate?

You will need more than $9000 to guarantee to your family a monthly income of fifty dollars for twenty years.

Write for information.

The Provident Life and Trust Co.
Of Philadelphia, Pa.

N. W. Cor. Fourth and Chestnut Sts.

H. F. BRUNER S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.
COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: LOCUST 243
RACE 601

A COMPLETE LINE
OF

NURSERY STOCK

FRUIT TREES,
ORNAMENTAL TREES,
SHRUBS,
SMALL FRUITS,
ROSES,
CLEMATIS,
HEDGE PLANTS.

The Rakestraw-Pyle Company
KENNETT SQUARE, PA.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES

ALBERT C. RIDLEY

1714 SANSOM STREET

Engraving and Printing

FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY

Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting Cards, Die Stamped Writing Paper

TELEPHONE-LOCUST 1782

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor
ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET
PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

SPRINGTIME in the Pocono Mountains is ever a delight to those who admire and study nature. The Birds and Flowers are numerous and varied, and the Trout Fishing in the Swiftwater is wonderful.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for Spring Term, 1918:

"The Teaching of Jesus, History of the Hebrew People, and History of Friends," by Elbert Russell.

"An Introduction to Social Work," Frank D. Watson, of Haverford College.

"History of Religion," Jesse H. Holmes, of Swarthmore College.

"History of Foreign Missions," Elihu Grant, of Haverford College.

"Principles of Religious Education," Charles H. Fisher, of Pennsylvania State Normal School, Westchester.

Spring Term, Fourth Month 1 to Sixth Month 8, 1918.

Send Applications for information or for admission to

ELBERT RUSSELL, Director,
WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves. PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10:30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

THE ESTAUGH
HADDONFIELD,
NEW JERSEY

Two vacancies—apply to
ANNA EASTBURN WILLITS, Haddonfield, N. J.

If you are satisfied with your present printer stay by him. He deserves your support. If you are considering a change see

THE HOLMES PRESS
J. Linton Engle, Pres. 1336 Cherry Street, Phila.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER
S. W. Cor. Sixteenth and Race Streets
Special attention given to Friends' Funerals
Bell 'Phone : Spruce 1646

SHETLAND PONIES
Oldest Herd in United States
Established 1883

Specially attractive prices just now owing to change in business arrangements
HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

Assoc. M. Am. Soc. C. E. Bell 'Phone—Lombard 1412

EDWIN M. EVANS
CONTRACTOR & BUILDER

My jobbing department is well equipped, prompt and efficient
338 S. LAWRENCE ST. : : PHILA.

WANTED—NURSERY GOVERNESS. YOUNG woman interested in Montessori principles for the girl 3 years. Intelligence and tact more important than experience. Instruction given in use of materials. Assist care of girls & attending school. Salary $35. Seaboard in summer.

M. M. SCOTT,
2100 Spruce Street

FOR RENT—EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED COTTAGE, bath, open plumbing, hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several meals daily, half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are one or more invalids in family. Meals must be taken at Maplewood.

Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES,
Jamestown, R. I.

FOR RENT—AT MOYLAN, PA. 9 ROOM HOUSE, well-built, modern, neat street and water, large piazza, fine view, 1 1/2-acre lot, fruit, etc. Garage. Modestly furnished. Desire to lease for one year.

B. F. WHITSON.

WANTED—A TEMPORARY HOUSEKEEPER FOR home in country. Small house with all conveniences. Work light. No washing or ironing. Two school children in family. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing MARG. B. EASON, Centre, Bucks County, Pennsylvania.

WANTED—FOR THE ACADEMIC YEAR, 1918-19, experienced teacher of Arithmetic for grades three, four, five and six; a Friend preferred. Ability to teach French also is desirable.

Apply to "SCHOOL," care of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—BY ONE OF EXPERIENCE, A POSI- tion as companion nurse for invalid, or managing housekeeper for elderly person or couple. Some domestic work, sewing or other light duties might be included.

Address M. "THE FRIEND."

SUMMER BOARD IN THE PLEASANT COUNTRY, near Maiden Creek. Season opens Sixth Month 15th. CAROLINE B. KIRK, "THE LEAF," Calicum, Pa.

FOR RENT FROM SIXTH MONTH 1 TO NINTH Month 30, 1918, furnished home on Haverford College campus. Nice rooms, two baths, garage. R. W. WELSHY, Haverford, Pa.

WANTED—A COMPANION FOR AN ELDERLY woman Friend in a nice home
Apply P., "THE FRIEND."

IT SAVES STOPS

TWO-THIRDS of the output lost by breakdowns is frequently saved by Tannate Belt. And two-thirds of the overhead charges and two-thirds of the idle wages and repairs. Tannate is so tough. And its flexibility and cling favor easy drives and save take-ups.

Live concerns from Maine to Australia are keeping down stoppage with Tannate.

A parcel post order proves its advantages.

J. E. RHOADS & SONS
PHILADELPHIA: 12 N. THIRD ST.
NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.
FACTORY AND TANNERY, WILMINGTON, DEL.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. - PHILA.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.
BANKERS
REPRESENTATIVES
PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL
LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND
PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS
FOR
CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.
FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

We recommend the use of RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Letchworth Cottage Spring Lake Beach, N. J.

Open for the Season 1918

A. C. & S. H. Letchworth

Established 1870 in Both Phones
Frank W. Taylor & Son
*Roofers in Tin, Tile, Slate,
Copper and Slag,
Manufacturers of Ranges
and Furnaces*

FURNACES, RANGES & HOT WATER SYSTEMS
Installed and cared for by expert mechanics

259 S. FOURTH ST., PHILADELPHIA

Genealogist

Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 S. Broad St., Treas. B. A.

Safety and Yield In Investments

MANY short-term notes of ample security offer, at present prices, an unusually liberal yield.

Well-known issues of such securities can now be bought at prices to yield from 5.60% to well above 7%.

Send for Circular PF-156

The National City Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.,
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

THE DOMESTIC ELECTRIC VACUUM CLEANER

PRICE, $30.00
with attachments, $38.00

The full size guaranteed carpet sweeper brush makes this the most efficient cleaner on the market today. Solves the Sweeping Problem in the home or institution.

Ten days' free trial.
Time payments at the cash price.

Send for Booklet

F. W. HOFFMAN & CO.
35 S. Fourth St. - PHILA.
ALSO FULL LINE OF HAND CLEANERS

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER
GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building
Established 1896. Experience 40 years. Medical 13

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, THIRD MONTH 28, 1918.

No. 39.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 DAVIS H. FORSYTHE,
 MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

It is customary to consider that the Meeting of Ministers and Elders on the Seventh-day preceding Yearly Meeting week opens the Yearly Meeting. Only those in the station of Ministers or Elders attend this session. The present year about one hundred and fifty Friends were present. This included visiting Ministers from Ohio, Vermont and Canada. In some sections the meetings of Ministers and Elders are open to all interested members. There is, of course, nothing of a secret nature in these meetings, but there is possibly a point in confining them within the prescribed limits. This practice at least is time honored and has a basis in apostolic method. Last year, when a new query was adopted for the use of the meetings of Ministers and Elders, it was represented that there might be a very evident gain in an enlarged scope for these meetings in which a concerned membership might participate. During the past year by a Conference of Ministers and Elders of a Quarterly Meeting at a Monthly Meeting, and by the consideration of the summary answer to the new query in a Quarterly Meeting after the ministers and elders had adopted it, this extension of interest and helpful exercise has been in some measure realized.

As one sat through the session on the 23rd, and felt the stirring of power, questions of the responsibility of sharing such privileges as widely as possible were in some minds. Good meetings are not made to order, but when they are experienced all who have part in them naturally wish to pass on what they receive. Will it not be well for all the subordinate meetings of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders to keep themselves sensitive to opportunities for sharing good? If long established custom has seemed to make a gulf between these "select" meetings and the membership, it certainly is quite apart from our ideal to have it so.

As usual, the business of the session on Seventh-day concerned itself with the queries, two of which were read and the answers from the Quarters considered. That there is still spiritual potency in this order of business is quite clear. Certain definite exercises come to the surface in a way to emphasize needs and opportunities of members and meetings. In connection with the first query the help to meetings for worship of the prayerful interest of absentees was somewhat dwelt upon. This subject had been included in the answer from one Quarter. It was known to some that in two or three instances in the limits of that Quarter, the matter is one of distinct experience as well as of general sentiment. A minister and two or more elders who are unable to attend meeting are in the practice of engaging in worship during their regular meeting hour. Undoubtedly this faithfulness reaches their meetings as a helpful influence. The consideration of this subject brought a further appeal that Friends engaged in religious service should be followed in their travels, as ability for it is given, by the intercessory prayers of their fellow members. So the meeting was led to face the privileges and favors of "group functioning" in a very practical way.

Similarly the second query opened in the mind of a Friend the needed relationship between the "soundness of ministers in word and doctrine" and the sympathy of Christ. As His spirit of out-flowing love becomes dominant in a service, His servants will be led into feeling with all classes of their fellowmen. The soldier in khaki, the outcasts of Society, the bereft and suffering, will detect the spirit, that in the perfect pattern, drew all men unto Him. This soundness in the life safeguards and expands soundness in the letter, which of course is not to be despised.

During the two-hour session the meeting was several times united in prayer by the faithfulness of ministers in such vocal expression. It was interesting, as always, to note how such offerings become a natural product of a deeply exercised body, so closely wedded are worship and prayer!

YEARS ago Youths' Meetings were a feature of Philadelphia Quakerism. These were appointed by older Friends for young Friends. This year will be remembered in our Yearly Meeting for the inauguration of a Young Friends' Conference as a feature of the week. It was held Seventh-day afternoon and evening. Doubtless some adequate report of it will be included in next supplement number. It will not be out of order for us to note two features of the meetings.

It is altogether clear that the movement is one contributory to loyalty to the Society. It embraces an understanding study of Quakerism and then a courageous practice of it as "a way of life." In England it is responsible for a type of conscientious objector that is sure to emerge from the present world confusion as a figure of most noble heroism. The second notable feature, closely related to the other, is the profoundly religious temper of the movement. Our young Friends have found that a Quakerism based on anything else than a first-hand experience of the religious life is unsatisfying to them and useless to the world. We have rarely heard this note more clearly sounded.

266 CYRUS COMPER
R. P. N. C. 22

The meetings for worship in the city on Yearly Meeting First-day, although not as large as when Friends came to the city in numbers for a week's sojourn, were appreciably larger than usual. Some non-Friends make it a rule to attend Friends' meeting this one time in the year. As often with our more public meetings there seems an enlarged liberty of expression. This is sometimes unsettling, and the solemnity of worship is disturbed by an appearance of over-anxiety to be heard. Although not absent this year this feature was enough over-ruled for our visitors to be able to say, "We had a good meeting." There is probably no more impressive product of Quaker practice than the solemnizing of great companies of worshippers in a silent waiting together upon God that transcends even the baptism of anointed ministry.

PRAYING AND VOTING.

Bishop Berry is reported to have said in regard to the proposed Federal Amendment to secure national prohibition—that voting in this emergency is more important than praying. Very likely what he actually did say was that men should vote as they pray. That in any event would be what we have to say on the subject. "Thy Kingdom come," breathed out of sincere hearts would of necessity now and always mean a vote against king alcohol.

Multitudes of prayers fail to get incarnated in acts. It is all too easy to acquire even a fluency in prayer, without a correspondence of effort to make our prayers fact. How many praying men in the past have failed even to register, so they can vote! Will this shameful condition be repeated in the present crisis?

No great time ago there may have been some reasonable ground for doubting prohibition as a proper means to a desired end. Now few who are not connected with the "nefarious traffic" could be found to hide behind such platitudes as, "you can not make men moral by law." Statesmen of the highest rank, business men of all kinds, seekers after efficiency everywhere are demanding prohibition as at once workable and necessary. Expunge, if it were possible, for ever so brief a time, the influence of vested interests in continuing the trade, and world necessity would now bring world prohibition. Never has there been such an opportunity to advance this great cause. We appeal to Friends everywhere to rally to its support. Local efforts, the primaries always, the State movements and the great Federal interest should find Friends in the very midst of the fray. Local officers, members of the legislatures, Governors, members of Congress and Senators should all be made subjects of this amendment test. If they can not accept it and enter the lists for its realization, they should hear an unmistakable verdict against them at the polls. Thus shall we vote as we pray.

J. H. B.

CHRIST, to the Christian growing older, seems to be what the sun is to the developing day, which it lightens from the morning to the evening.

When the sun is in the zenith in the broad noon-day, men do their various works by His light; but they do not so often look up to Him. It is the sunlight that they glory in, flooding a thousand tasks with clearness, making a million things beautiful. But as the world rolls into evening, it is the sun itself at sunset that men gather to look at and admire and love.

—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

THE JOY OF FORGIVENESS.

Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good. (Romans xii: 21).

Good to forgive,
Best to forget.

—ROBERT BROWNING.

One of the finest instances of forgiveness I ever heard of occurred in England during the intolerant days of the seventeenth century. In the midst of a religious discussion, one of the disputants angrily struck his opponent a cruel blow on the face, mockingly exclaiming, "Take that for Jesus Christ's sake!" The injured man quietly replied, "Friend, I do take it for Jesus Christ's sake." That was all. With his Lord's precept and example, was it not enough?

An aged Christian recently died, who before his death personally saw or wrote all living persons whom he felt that he had wronged during his long career, requesting their forgiveness. He even asked to be absolved because of long-forgotten unfair treatment of a college mate sixty years before. He had been a proud man, but craved full reconciliation with men and God before he died. Did not these acts of humility prepare him for entrance into the eternal service of his forgiving King?

Probably many professors of the Gospel find it more difficult to acquit those who have insulted or abused them, than do others. Their lives are often regulated by the light as they see it. They do not wish to compromise with evil. Their religion promotes a sense of justice, and they almost involuntarily feel that their motives or decisions are correct. They may thus, without meaning wrong, ignore the viewpoint of another and unintentionally assume an unjust attitude. This may be easily succeeded by inability to manifest forbearance, by the keen thrust, the sharp correspondence, the bitter word. Seed is sown that yields bad fruit. Let those who love the Prince of Peace watch and pray lest they be led into this very real temptation.

In the heat of the moment we sometimes magnify our passions and utter words that afterwards we would give very much to recall. Our unruly tongues have gotten the best of us. Our weakness, which at the time we thought to be strength, has been exposed. Our humiliation in the sight of men may be as nothing in comparison with self-condemnation. Self-justification has no place in the repentant heart. How can we get right with those whom we have wounded, or with God?

There is a sovereign remedy. I think that those who know that there is quiet with Jesus, understand the cure. It is not altogether found in efforts to forget the past. It is discovered in getting into touch with Christ—in going to the place of secret prayer. Those who thus seek absolution at its Source will be prepared to forgive others. When we pray for our enemies we forgive them. We comprehend why our Lord laid such emphasis upon forgiveness: "If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you, but if ye forgive not their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Let us never forget the magnificent possibilities and terms of remission at the fountain-head of Eternal Love!

It is hard to ask another to forgive us. Often the real aggressor in a controversy will meet our advances ungraciously, but we are clear. That should be enough. When we exercise such tests of discipleship how often cantankerous spirits are overcome by the spirit of reconciliation and love. They, too, forgive!

One of the delights of Christian experience is a sense of the forgiving mercies of God. How happy is the reconciled heart! What soul-peace reigns! What new determination is created more loyally to serve God! If God thus pardons us for Jesus' sake, shall we not for His sake forgive others? We can carry to those who have humiliated us the same happiness that we have so freely received of God. Across the ferments and contentment of the ages rings the apostolic cry: "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

WM. C. ALLEN.

SAN JOSÉ, Calif.

WAR AND THE SOCIAL ORDER COMMITTEE OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

MESSAGE TO ALL FRIENDS.

Dear Friends—

In the fellowship of our common need we call on you to share with us in the task of social and industrial reconstruction which confronts us at the conclusion of the present war. Everywhere changes of unprecedented magnitude have taken place under the stress of war conditions; it will be impossible to return to the pre-war status, and there will be an unparalleled opportunity for reconstruction immediately the war is over—an opportunity which would be fraught with danger were the nation unprepared to use it wisely.

The industrial unrest which prevails in many quarters is but one symptom of dissatisfaction with the present system, and of a desire to see its defects remedied or a better system substituted for the old one. But when we seek to devise remedies for existing evils, we realize how impossible it is that there should be any panacea. We find that the relationships of social and industrial life no less than those of international polity, are full of jealousy and misunderstanding; for wherever human relations are determined by force and not by reason the essential conditions of war are present, and whether the result is open war or not, the wrong conditions should be altered. We must believe as Christians not only that what is contrary to the real welfare of the community can be altered but that with sufficient faith the right changes to make will be shown to us.

The problems to be faced are intricate and complex; they do not admit an easy or off-hand solution. We therefore appeal to Friends to give their best thought and attention to the subject of industrial reconstruction, to examine the issues with fairness, to forestall the need for a clash of wills and forces by enlightened common-sense, and by showing that we ourselves are prepared to make sacrifices in the cause of justice and brotherhood. Only by dwelling in "that spirit which takes away the occasion for all wars" can we make a worthy contribution to the rebuilding of a new world from the ruins of the old we see about us.

The doctrine of the Inner Light, which has always been the central point in the teaching of the Society of Friends, has aspects which have not yet been realized in the relationships of men to one another. For the sake of the community as well as of the individual we must condemn any system that denies to the majority of its members the opportunity for anything approaching a full development, which regards men as merely cogs in the industrial machine and deprives them of even the necessities of life in the blind rush of competition.

We demand that every human being shall be given a chance of developing the best that is in him and of sharing in the best that life can offer. Among the best gifts of life we place the joy of service, realizing that the individual life must find its worth in service and in fellowship with others.

Furthermore, the doctrine of the Inward Light should teach us a new scale of human values. Class distinctions, and the man-made barriers which divide us from one another, will all be lost sight of in the realization of the ties which bind us all as brothers. False standards, too, of wealth, material power and domination, will be swept away by the incoming tide of life and we shall judge all things by new standards. If persons are more important than things, we cannot rest content with any system which allows men to be worn down by poverty, by bad conditions, and the relentless struggle for existence. Unless we hold things lightly, they run away with the real life, embittering our relations with each other and imposing on us the bondage of the material and the conventional. We must seek for a way of life which shall liberate ourselves and others from this bondage, and shall lead us to a freer and a fuller life of service for our fellows.

We recognize that the present industrial conditions deny to a large proportion of the workers an opportunity for the development of a full personality, imprisoning them in a mechanical routine which gives very small, if any, scope for self-direction or for self-expression, and by the exclusive pursuit of materialistic aims tending to develop the baser side of human nature rather than the higher.

If the present system has failed we must find some new one which shall take its place, a system which shall be in accord with our ideals, giving the fullest opportunity of human development—both in childhood and adult life—to every member of the community, and reconstructing industry on a basis of need and service, where all shall unite in the service of the community, and where the forces of loving-kindness and trust shall take the place of those of rivalry and suspicion. We must work out our spiritual beliefs in our material affairs, and material conditions must be altered, though the achievement of the ideal will be impossible without a change of heart and an entirely new scale of human values.

The spiritual force which can achieve this change is mighty, because of the appeal it makes to what is best in man, and this appeal must grow in force as man progresses. There is no limit to its implications. Applied to industrial affairs it can achieve great changes which otherwise would be impossible. If the same self-sacrificing and devoted spirit which has been shown during the war amongst all ranks and classes, were applied to the problem of industrial life, how much might be accomplished!

Let us therefore seek to cherish and to show forth in our lives the spirit which alone can quicken and inspire these changes, whilst by every means in our power we further the enlightenment and education of all classes of society to meet new problems, new responsibilities, new duties, that together we may plan and carry out on noble lines the reconstruction of the present and the future.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

J. EDWARD HODGKIN,

Clerk.

NORTHGATE CHAMBERS, Darlington.

JORDANS VILLAGE, LIMITED.

For many months a group of Friends interested in Jordans have been quietly negotiating the purchase of a compact little estate of about one hundred acres immediately opposite the Meeting-house and Hostel, and stretching westwards almost as far as the Beaconsfield Golf Links Halt. The estate includes Dean Farm and the beautiful Crutches Wood. The contract for the purchase has now been completed, and, as advertised, the promoters are inviting applications for capital from those interested in the development of the scheme. The aims and objects are stated to be to acquire and develop the estate

"by means of a village community to be founded in accordance with the principles of the Society of Friends and in a manner serviceable to the national well-being; and in furtherance thereof to erect or to permit the erection thereon of residences and other kinds of buildings and to promote the establishment therein of suitable industries on sound and just lines, so as to give to those engaged therein scope for the growth of character, self-expression and high standards of workmanship. To provide an opportunity for the establishment and maintenance of a centre for training for citizenship, as well as in manual, agricultural and other pursuits."

As soon as the purchase has been completed, the Committee will take possession, and their first duty will be the cultivation of the land. Some evidence of the spirit of good-will which actuates the promoters may be found in the fact that rather than turn out a tenant who has occupied the farm-house for about thirty years, the taking over of the house and the adjoining six acres of homestead has been deferred until the old farmer vacates the premises. It is only a few years ago that Jordans Meeting-house was re-opened for regular meetings for worship. In 1912, the Hostel was opened. The acquisition of the Dean Farm estate marks a further important step in the establishment and development of Friends' influence in this district, and opens out great possibilities for the future. —The Friend (London).

BLESS, AND CURSE NOT.

[This is taken from a sermon preached by the rector of St. Sepulchre's Church, in London, on the twentieth of First Month last, and printed in The Friend (London). We may not be able to see that it is true to fact, but it is certainly true to principle. It seems really wonderful that such an utterance should gain a hearing in England at this time.—Eds.]

Bless them which persecute you; bless, and curse not. (Romans xii: 14.)

These words are taken from a passage of simple practical advice. The great apostle who wrote them can turn from the deepest mysteries of the faith which he has been discussing and speak quite naturally of ordinary human things. He is as much at home with the daily duties and difficulties of men and women of the world, as he is in the realm of the spirit and in the great mysteries of faith. In the very middle of this practical advice, we come upon words which seem to strike a very different note: "Bless them which persecute you; bless, and curse not." Here he seems to be speaking in a different key. All the rest commended itself to us, just because it seemed to fall well within the power of ordinary human nature, but this goes far beyond. Nay it seems to set a standard which human nature instinctively rejects. It asks of us something which from the majority of mankind is too much to expect. It is not the practical man of the world who is speaking now, but the dreamer, the idealist, the visionary. You must not look to men to bless their persecutors. That is not only contrary to all the instincts of human nature, but as a practical rule of life, it would do more harm than good. It would allow wrong to go unpunished. It would give a free course to cruelty and oppression. It would paralyze justice. It would reverse so many moral standards of right and wrong that it cannot be recommended for adoption in the world as it is.

But are you quite sure that these are only the words of a dreamer? May they not also come from that same knowledge of human nature noticed in the apostle's other advice? Do not they illustrate that practical instinct which you so much admired, only in another form? For certainly he has put his finger upon a tender spot. The persecutor has always been the man who has moved mankind to indignation. Cruelty, oppression, tyranny, these are the crimes for which mankind as a rule can find no excuse. When the strong man uses his power mercilessly at the expense of the weak, he commits a crime against humanity which meets with universal condemnation. St. Paul knew that, just as well, perhaps better, than you or I do. So it is with the same sure instinct that has led him right when dealing with other matters, that he now touches the tenderest spot in the moral constitution of the race. He lays his finger upon it and says there is the place where a change must be made. "Bless, and curse not." The only blessing which is of any avail is that which makes a man better, not only the man who pronounces it but him upon whom it is pronounced. This is the blessing which will change the persecutor into the penitent, the enemy into the friend.

You can never do that by a mere word. But one act of gentleness and love may succeed where everything else is doomed to failure. And so the apostle goes on to explain the kind of blessing that he means, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." It is a definite practical programme of reform. St. Paul does not say, first beat him and then bless him; break his power and then show mercy; crush him and then comfort him; but just the opposite,—bless first and then you will really humble him. Change your attitude to him, and in the end you will change his to you.

Now the logic that underlies this is hard, severe, but extremely simple. It is based upon one fact and one only, but that fact lies at the very heart of life. It is this, that the deepest wrongs in human life are those which never can be cured by force. There is no punishment which can ever atone for them. There is no justice which can redress the balance. The bitterest penalty which you can inflict will only perpetuate the wrong. The only thing which can heal is pity, the only power that can atone is suffering, the only remedy that can restore is love. That is Christ. That is the revelation of the Father's love as we see it in Jesus. God was incarnate in Him, just because He came into the world to redeem its evils, and to cure its sin, not by force but only by love, by showing hate to no man, by accepting suffering rather than inflicting it, by dying rather than living. He would slay hatred by the Cross rather than by the sword. And if the Cross cannot slay it, nothing else ever will.

I look out upon the world to-day and I see England and I see Russia, both of them threatened by the harshest tyranny, the cruellest oppression which the world has ever known. England strong, determined, unbroken, inheriting the tradition of centuries of freedom, throwing its whole might into the struggle against wrong, for no selfish motive, God grant, but for love of honor and truth. Yet there are those who say that if we are to keep alive the spirit of our resolve, we must learn to hate our enemies, with a fiercer hatred than we have ever shown as yet. We must punish them for every crime that they have committed, we must break their power utterly before we can ever speak to them of peace. And even more than that we must let the burden of our wrath rest upon them for generations that are yet unborn. Ah, yes, but when we had done it, the root of evil would still be there. The world would be a world of strife. It would be too late, when you had exacted your full vengeance, for love to do its healing work. I see Russia, weak, torn, wounded, bleeding. Russia, that through all its long history has never known what freedom means; Russia, which has groaned and suffered for centuries under tyranny and oppression; yet now in its weakness holding out hands to its bitterest enemies, speaking of brotherhood among the nations, daring in its hour of agony to speak of peace. In that strange mysterious soul of Russia, that you and I can never fully understand, there is a passionate idealism, which breaks out through all the conflicts of her inner life. A great heart that beats with love even as it breaks with agony, a fierce longing for a brotherhood with all men that will sweep war and hatred from the world.

Despise Russia for her weakness? God forbid! Laugh at her foolishness, because we think we are wise and strong? Accuse her of betraying us,—we who have come so very near to betraying our Lord in our hour of temptation? Nay, but rather try to learn her secret. Sit at the feet of that suffering, bleeding, crucified people; listen to the cry of her agony and she will tell you this,—that in all the long centuries of dumb, patient suffering she has learned this, that force never can crush out what is best in the soul of man, that her martyrdom has taught her something which you have hardly guessed. She knows now—and it is the supreme moment of her destiny—that she should teach this to all the world, that only suffering can purify the soul, and that the soul, when it is purified, knows that it is only love that can redeem the world from sin. That is why she has thrown away her weapons and will fight no more. that is why she calls for peace, why she will go under rather than go on. Though it be with her dying breath she will say, "Bless them that persecute you; bless, and curse not." Russia does not count in the war now! May God enlighten us, she counts more than anyone. She alone has the secret which the world needs to-day. We think that in our strength, with our fleets and armies, with the vast resources of our Empire and the fresh energies of America, we shall save the world. But it is Russia, torn, bleeding, crucified, that can save the world; because, through her, it is not Russia, it is the eternal Christ, who speaks.

W. A. CUNNINGHAM CRAIG.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The Fourteenth Annual Meeting of Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia was held at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, on the evening of Second Month 19, 1918.

After the usual annual reports were presented, several proposed changes in the Constitution and By-laws were read, which will be considered and acted upon at a future meeting.

A report of the Fourteenth Annual Conference of Historical Societies, held in Philadelphia on Twelfth Month 20, 1917, was given by Amelia M. Gummere, who with Mary Willis Brown attended as representatives of our Society. She told of the discussion in reference to the importance of preservation of early archives and the value of the preparation of monographs on special topics, for the study of history, co-operation in which is recommended to historical societies.

Sarah E. P. Mickle, who attended the Thirteenth Annual Meeting of the Pennsylvania Federation of Historical Societies, which was held in Harrisburg, on First Month 17, 1918, read an interesting report of it, from which the following extracts are taken:—"A great deal was said about the passing of the manuscript, and each one was urged to aid in the preservation of such, as much valuable information has been lost forever through negligence in this matter.

"In many homes old papers are tossed around in bureau drawers, or laid between the leaves of old books, and are only rescued by chance, after they have been under the hammer of the auctioneer."

"In view of the fact that our State population is changing so rapidly, the old traditions, whether Quaker, Irish, Scotch, English or Continental, must be preserved that the newcomers may fully realize that in these traditions the history which is sacred to us and the ideals which we commemorate are the very things which have brought about the condition of liberty and the opportunity which they seek to enjoy.

"To inspire a new generation with honor for our institutions and veneration for our history is to insure their loyal support to our government.

"While the present presses upon us in its uncertainty, no one can take from us the past, it is completely ours, and is so deeply interwoven in our lives that it is a part of our very being.

"Never more than now do we need to study the influences which moulded the character of Quaker ancestors. There is no escape from the proving ground. The inspiration of the past will help win the problems of the present."

Amelia M. Gummere informed the meeting of the progress that has been made in the preparation of the new edition of John Woolman's Journal.

Additional information has been found which will necessitate rewriting some of the material which had been prepared. Deeds of property have been traced which show that the property of John Woolman, at Mount Holly, N. J., was previously a part of the tract of land extending from Haddonfield, which belonged to John Haddon, the father of Elizabeth Haddon Estauagh. Records have also been found which relate to the ancestry of Sarah Woolman.

The general topic of the entertainment of the meeting was "Quakerism in France."

Francis R. Taylor gave some account of the "Forerunners of the French Quakers," referring to the period of the conflicts between the Protestant and Catholic peoples of France in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Henry III, King of France, son of Catharine de Medici (the instigator of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew), was succeeded by Henry of Navarre, known as Henry IV, who was educated in the reformed doctrines and grew up as a Protestant Huguenot. After succeeding to the throne, in order to maintain what he considered the peace of his kingdom, he abjured his religion and the cause of the Protestants and became a Catholic.

By issuing the memorable Edict of Nantes, in 1598, he gave religious toleration, and thus placed the two religions under the protection of the government.

The Protestants had more political freedom during this peaceful period and took an active part in developing the industrial, financial and economic conditions of their country.

During the reign of Louis XIV the Edict of Nantes was revoked and the Huguenots again suffered dreadful persecution and loss of political rights.

Among some of these spiritually-minded Protestants, there were preachers who were known as the French Prophets—a non-resistant people. A group of these who lived near the Cevennes were called the Camisards, or Protestants of Cevennes, and from these people it is thought the Friends of Congenies are descended.

Some account of "The Early Friends in France" was given by Rufus M. Jones. He also referred to the bands of seekers and religious mystics in France and Germany, and to the outbreaks of prophecy among them in early times.

Then he told of the visit of Sarah Grubb and Mary Dudley, accompanied by George and Sarah Dillwyn, to Holland, Germany and France, in 1788, alluding to their great faith in undertaking such a journey in view of their physical weakness and inability to speak the languages of the peoples whom they visited. John Eliot, an English Friend who spoke French, met the company in France, and interpreted for them, when they visited the Friends at Congenies and Giles, where meetings were held.

Sarah Grubb made a second visit to the continent in 1790, again in company with George and Sarah Dillwyn.

William Savery, David Sands and George Dillwyn visited on the continent of Europe in 1796-1797. After visiting at Minden and Pyrmont, in Germany, they went to Congenies and Giles, in France, to mingle with the Friends there. In Congenies they met with Louis Majolier, who at times acted as interpreter for them. He and his wife, who was Marie Brun, were the parents of Christine Majolier Alsop, who was so well known among the English and French Friends, and who traveled with ministering Friends in Europe to interpret for them.

Eli and Sibyl Jones, Friends from New England, visited this little colony of Friends when they were traveling in Europe.

Rufus M. Jones also told some of his own experiences when he spent some time at Congenies. He then referred briefly to the work that three hundred English and American Friends, under the superintendence of T. Edmund Harvey, are now doing in France, and of the privilege to have such an opportunity to exert Friendly influence in that sadly stricken country.

Hannah P. Morris followed, giving some account of a visit made to Congenies, in company with her father, Samuel Morris. She was much impressed with the primitive simplicity of the people, the village well, where they procured their supply of water, the beauty of the vineyards on the hillsides, and the shepherds with their flocks, which reminded her of the description of Palestine. She made a brief reference to Marie Barnard, and then spoke of Justine Dalencourt, and her work at the present time in behalf of Christianity, reading some selections from a letter received from her recently. Although an aged Friend, she continues her activities in relieving suffering and making known the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

MARY S. ALLEN,
Secretary.

PRAYER is so mighty an instrument that no one ever thoroughly mastered all its keys. They sweep along the infinite scale of man's want and God's goodness.—HUGH MILLER.

NOTES FROM THE SOUTH.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

"The nobler a soul is, the more objects of compassion it hath."—BACON.
 "Who counts his brother's welfare
 As sacred as his own,
 And loves, forgives and pities,
 He serveth me alone."

—WHITTIER.

Of all the qualities of the Divine character compassion has the most universal appeal. "He had compassion on the multitude" reveals the real character of Jesus Christ, who was also touched and moved by a feeling sense of our infirmities and sore needs. "He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust."

After and above all the conflict comes the compassion—even in the death agony—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." It is the lack of this note in human hearts and minds that has brought the world to its present sad state. And yet at no time in human history has there been a more sincere response to help our fellow-man in the midst of his dire misery, no matter what has brought that fate upon him. Justice, righteousness and the whole category of moral and religious virtues have had their interpretation and application in human history with varying success. When we recall the Spartan or Puritan, the Hebrew or Roman, the medieval or modern conception of justice as applied to the criminal we are aghast at the tragedy. "Man's inhumanity to man" is appalling to this very moment, while all the time, in the deepest recesses of the human heart there has been a sense of fellowship, as is frequently witnessed even "at the front," and in all the intercourse of human beings. The difficulty arises when men and women substitute some opinion or differing interest for that inward fellow feeling—which always leads away from strife.

The foundation of this good-will is not based on any dictum of antiquity or external authority, but on the inner sense of the eternal fitness of all human and Divine relationship. Jesus Christ expressed this in every possible occasion and those who have possessed His spirit also. John Woolman has stated very clearly and definitely how this Christian attitude induces the most tender consideration of others less favored than ourselves.

The English language and literature scarcely contains more truly, and with wiser discrimination, the right attitude of the rich in their obligation to the poor and vice versa, than he advocated.

We have just read "The Life of Wm. Penn," by John Wm. Graham, and never appreciated so fully the efforts of that truly great and good man. His heroic sufferings in behalf of spiritual freedom as well as political, of social and religious toleration and of international good-will, with all the disappointments that befell him, reveal a soul that was immortal because it was transformed into the character of his Lord, and a mind illuminated by the spirit of sanctified common-sense.

In like manner "The Life and Letters of Thos. Hodgkin" have brought to us a character of great simplicity, strength and service during eighty years of rare opportunity and progress. A personal acquaintance and tender memory of his friendship have added to the inspiration of this volume. Like Wm. Penn and Lord Acton he realized that "the real test of a people's freedom is the amount of security enjoyed by minorities." And few, who are not blinded by prejudice, can to-day doubt that he was right.

"The only real security for social well-being is the free exercise of men's minds; otherwise we have impliedly contracted ourselves to slavery. This assuredly is the only real democracy that the decision of the mind should have the sanction of the conscience. A state that usurps the function of either has already become a mask for despotism."

In the midst of all the wreckage of ideals and distorting of the truth by all the nations, one would become utterly confused and wearied by the whole sickening scheme and scene of violence, if it were not for the perennial conviction—penetrating all the sham pretensions of friend and foe alike—that there is not only "a better way" and "a better day" for us, but that we ought to demonstrate its practicability, both as individuals and as a nation.

The "Recollections" of John, Viscount Morley, has thrown much light upon the Victorian period of English statesmanship, and while John Morley made no profession of religion one can see and admire his high moral purpose and great service in always having the welfare of the common people at heart. Indeed, one sees that he had "compassion" on the Irish and East Indians—for whom he was Imperial Secretary. We also see the struggle of autocratic with democratic methods without going abroad or taking any military part in the present world throes. We see it within the limits of our own Society—in the severe struggle with those who have deserted the age-long testimony of our Society against all war, which the editors of Friendly organs are maintaining to-day.

John Burns and John Morley resigned their responsible cabinet positions when war was declared in 1914, as John Bright did when Alexandria was bombarded, some thirty years before, because they had the clearest and keenest sympathy with the demands of justice. To confuse those demands with fighting and killing men is a wicked stupidity, that must be eliminated before justice or righteousness or freedom or democracy can be either found or established. Our conscientious objectors are really fighting the good fight of faith for all generations. When men, who have felt the constraints of Divine Love in their souls turn to the God of Battles to settle their disputes they surely forsake those universal spiritual forces which have brought the race thus far on its upward path. Every humane and Divine impulse protests against such a lapse. The Society of Friends has maintained its Christian testimony against all war from its rise, in the face of the most difficult tests, as we see in England to-day, with the united stand of Friends in America, in their official capacity.

The splendid reconstruction work, on the other hand, carried on in France, Russia and elsewhere, and the relief afforded "alien enemies," has brought to view our real motive of overcoming evil with good, for every living soul has an equal right with ourselves to all the compassion that a Christian heart can bestow.

A visit from William and Eleanor Elkinton over the weekend was much appreciated by the Friendly group here on the 10th inst. They had come directly from California and so could compare many somewhat similar features in the climate, scenery and foliage.

This afternoon the usual mid-week gathering of neighbors, about twenty women folk, assembled at our bungalow on the hill. This group has been meeting all winter and making baskets out of the pine needles and wire grass. Their interest in the work of Friends in rebuilding the desolated homes in France has given an opportunity to share the letters which have been received from our children there.

We are just about leaving this haven of rest and peace with thankful hearts for the opportunity to recover strength and become acquainted with many congenial spirits representing the substantial American home-maker and house-keeper.

ORLANDO, Fla., Third Month 12, 1918.

A VISIT TO FRIENDS IN SOUTH CHINA.

WILLIAM W. CADBURY.

The mid-winter holidays of the College began this year on the twenty-second of the First Month, so after a faculty meeting on that evening a party of three of us started for a few days' visit to the Friends of Hlok Shaan City. Beside myself there were Professor C. W. Howard, a member of Minneapolis Monthly Meeting and professor of biology at our College, and David Lee, who says that he is half a Friend, although he belongs to the Baptist Church. He is instructor in manual training at the College.

Howard and I left the College at 9.30 p. m., our bedding and clothing packed in a round basket and a canvas bag, making a single man's load. These were placed in the College slipper boat (so called because it is of the shape of a slipper), and in an hour we had reached the city. We stopped at the Ho-k Shaan (Crane Mountain) passage boat and there engaged a room for eighty cents for the two of us, including the ticket. David Lee joined us a little later with his nephew. The latter is a cook at the College and was on his way home to be married.

Our cabin was just large enough for one bed with a little standing room beside it, but Howard and I spread out our blankets on the wooden bed-board and passed a fairly comfortable night. At about 3 a. m., a large steam launch came alongside us and towed the clumsy passage boat down the river. We arose at seven and were ready for breakfast by nine. The breakfast, prepared in Chinese style, consisted of rice, pork chops, minced chicken, vegetables and soup.

We had not gone far before we struck a sand-bar and had to wait some three hours for the tide to rise sufficiently to move on. Our course lay through Shun Tak, noted for its fish and silk industries. Mulberry trees are planted on dykes surrounding large ponds. Fish are raised in the latter and the leaves of the trees are used for feeding the silkworms. At last the water was deep enough for us to proceed and we reached Taai Kee Tau about 2.30 p. m. Here we disembarked and while a coolie carried our 100 pounds of baggage, David Lee, Howard and I walked to a village called Sha Peng (sandy plain), some five miles distant. On the way we observed two instances of the animistic worship so common in South China. In one place there was a large banyan tree, at the roots of which incense sticks were burning and red paper prayers were pasted on the trunk. A little further on we saw a woman with a chicken, rice and wine on a tray, burning incense and offering food at a three-corner road crossing. She was sacrificing to the god of the cross road.

At Sha Peng we called at a mission chapel, where the preacher and his wife both greeted me cordially. One had been a patient of mine and the wife had frequently brought patients to me at the hospital. We also called on the Magistrate for the district of Hok Shaan and conversed with him for over an hour. Like most officials in China he seems to care little for the welfare of the people.

From Sha Peng we continued our walk to Lung Hau (dragon's mouth) village, and thence to David Lee's home, Fung Mei Kong (Phoenix tail hill). This added about four miles more of walking. The village is over two hundred years old and is divided into two parts—the new and the old. The total population is more than 1100. At the present time there are about sixty men from this village in business in Philadelphia and seventy in New York, one hundred and thirty in all, out of a total population of only 1100. Beside this there are about thirty men who have been in America and have now returned. Some of these speak English quite well. Of all these men, both those now in America and those who have returned only three can be called truly Christian. It is a sad fact, but apparently true, that there are no Chinese more opposed to the teachings of Christianity than those who have been abroad. Many of them are very miserly and none have been willing to help David Lee with the school for girls that he has started. For this work he has received money from Philadelphia from Morris Linton and other friends of his. Anna Belle Conard, also a Philadelphia Friend, forwards this money to him. There is no mission in the village and he is the only person actively engaged in Christian work. The children are especially devoted to him and follow him through the streets. His neighbors often accost him by the name "Jesus."

David's wife, with the baby boy, were waiting for us and we entered his home, consisting of a room about 25 by 15 feet, without windows and paved in brick. A small side-room serves as kitchen and another as bed-room. We were escorted to an adjacent house, built by his own hands, and here were two beds for us. A good Chinese meal was served, and since it was some twelve hours since we had had anything to eat, besides having walked some ten miles, we were both hungry and tired. We spread our quilts on the board mattress and slept soundly till daylight. Next morning after breakfast we explored several temples in the town, one of them dedicated to the god of the north pole. About 2 p. m., a crowd of women and children gathered around us so we held a meeting on the street. I spoke on the parable of the prodigal son, a story so well illustrated by the lives of many of the men who had got into evil ways while in America. David Lee and a Bible woman also spoke at some length. In the evening, after our supper, we walked to a nearby temple, before which we stood and sang a hymn. A crowd of men and boys were soon gathered around us. Howard spoke to them on John iii:16. David Lee interpreting, and I followed, calling attention to the fact that the temple was called "Temple of the highest god." I showed that the supreme God was not an idol as they believed, but a spirit, a loving, heavenly Father, common to all men. David followed me.

Next morning after breakfast I saw a number of sick people for whom I did what I could and we started off for a thirteen-mile walk to Hok Shaan City. It was a cool day and the air was most invigorating. Our winding path led us for the most part through fields of newly planted tobacco. Later we passed through a valley with mountains rising on either side, finally emerging on the plain where the city of Hok Shaan is situated. We went directly to the Quaker firm of Kwong Luen Woh, established by Chinese Friends who had been converted in the Chinese Mission connected with Brooklyn Monthly Meeting, in New York. Two of these, Lin Tin In and Chue To Shau, were there to greet us and a most hearty welcome we had.

The following day being market-day at a neighboring village, we walked thither a distance of six miles, starting after breakfast. The country is famous for its tea and our path lay between field after field of tea plants. The dried tea leaves are carried from the mountains in cloth bags, mostly by women. Each one will carry from eighty to one hundred pounds a distance of from ten to thirty miles. We arrived at the market town of Naam Tung (south cave) about 1 p. m., and after a cup of tea adjourned to a vacant booth in the market and sang a hymn or two. People kindly gathered around us and David Lee spoke to them, I followed, using as my text an inscription that I had seen in the course of our morning's walk on the roadside at the foot of a bamboo tree—a bit of animistic religion. Translated it reads "the gods' strength will sustain." Lin Tin In followed me, speaking at some length in the Hakka dialect, the common language of the people of that region. The meeting over, we started home and got back in time for an evening meal at about 5 p. m.

In the evening, as is the custom with the Friends in the Quaker store, all hands gather round the light and read a chapter from the Bible. I took the opportunity to speak of the Friends who are working in different parts of the Orient in Tokio, in Chengtu, and Nanking, and then emphasized the need of making our efforts tend primarily to the spreading of God's kingdom rather than trying to promulgate denominationalism. Others also spoke and it was an impressive meeting.

The following day was First-day and at 11.15 we arrived at the Friends' meeting-house—Luen Yau Ooi Shoh. We found only a few women present, but when a few hymns had been sung many more came in from the street till there were some seventy persons altogether. Twenty of these are regular members. David Lee spoke on John iii:16. I followed, also speaking in Cantonese, on true worship as one of the main tenets of the Society of Friends. Howard referred to the parable of the vine, and Chue To Shau followed in the Hakka dialect. Lin Tin In, speaking in English, referred most affectionately to the wonderful influence over his life of Lucy Beck and her co-workers at the Brooklyn Meeting. After sitting for about two-and-one-half hours the meeting closed. The men took great pleasure in introducing us to their wives, who with the characteristic modesty of these Hakka women did not even raise their eyes or smile when we spoke to them.

Returning to the Quaker shop I found that a number of sick had gathered for me to see. There was one with hook-worm and others with malaria, etc. I did what I could to heal them. In the evening we again had the customary period of evening worship, lasting some two hours. I took the opportunity to dwell on the leading of the Spirit in our daily lives and Howard told of how he came to have the call to come to China. "Till We Meet Again" was sung and we parted for the night with a real feeling of brotherhood.

Next morning all hands exchanged cards and we started off for the ten-mile walk to the nearest railway station, a coolie carrying our baggage. Thence by train and boat we made a safe trip homeward. We were fortunate to meet with no mishap, since many of our friends here have been held up and robbed during the past few weeks.

Charles Howard and myself were the first foreigners to meet with this group of earnest Chinese Friends in South China. We feel that the seed of the Kingdom has indeed been planted there and we commend this infant church to the prayers of all Friends in the United States and elsewhere.

CANTON CHRISTIAN COLLEGE, Canton, China.

THE CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE BIGGEST FISH STORY IN THE BIBLE.—If I were to ask you what is the biggest fish story in the Bible, I am sure that most of you would answer at once "Jonah and the Whale," but there is another one, which is mentioned by four of the writers in the New Testament. Because these four men have all recorded it, it must be true; and what I have to tell you, you can read about in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John.

I love the story because it is about a boy and what happened to him on a day when he went fishing.

I think all of us like to go fishing, but we do not go fishing to-day like the boys did in Palestine 1900 years ago, for they did not have fish-hooks or even bent pins, and I am sure we would not be satisfied with the meagre lunch which we know this particular boy had.

Now, one day in early Spring, this boy, who was probably about twelve years old, obtained permission from his mother to go fishing; she packed him a little lunch, placed it in his little basket, and off he started. He was probably a very poor boy, for in those days all poor people made bread out of barley, which when eaten away from home, was made into small cakes. He did not know what butter was, but instead had two small dried fish to eat with his five barley loaves or cakes; and that was all his lunch.

Our boy lived in one of the small villages not far from the city of Capernaum, and he started out to fish either in the river Jordan or the Lake of Galilee. On his way there he met a great company of people hurrying forward to the hills along the banks of the Lake, and like any natural boy who meets a parade or a lot of people, his curiosity was excited and he followed the crowd. Soon he came to a great Preacher talking to those who could get up close enough to hear Him. Being such a small boy our lad had no difficulty in getting right up among the big folks, and so he was able to hear every word that was said; in listening to what the Great Man was saying he forgot all about fishing or the time of day, because this wonderful Teacher always talked so that even the little children could understand Him, and He was so kind and loving and told such wonderful things that our lad had never heard before that even when lunch time came he forgot all about being hungry.

After a while when it was quite late in the afternoon, he saw the Great Man turn to one of the chief men and ask about feeding the people who were gathered there. Most of them had come a great ways to hear Him and none of them had had anything to eat all day. The chief man (I think his name was Peter) at once answered the Master that feeding such a large crowd was out of the question, for even if they had money to pay for bread the villages near by would be unable to supply so great a demand.

Our little fisher boy, overhearing this request, went up to Andrew, another of the chief men, who stood near the Teacher, and offered as his contribution the lunch which his mother had given him in the morning; Andrew no doubt laughed at such a small quantity of food for so many people, but as this was actually all that they could find, he told the Master about the lad with his barley loaves and his two small fishes and was commanded to bring the boy to Him.

The Master then told His disciples to seat the multitude of people on the grass on the hillside in companies of fifty and one hundred; then He took the barley loaves and the fishes and blessed them and gave thanks, then handed them to His disciples to distribute among the people; they all ate until they were filled. Afterwards, when the fragments were gathered up that nothing be wasted, we are told that they made twelve great baskets full.

We do not know even the name of this little fisher lad, but I always like to think of his willing sacrifice of his lunch that day for the feeding of others, and how happy he must have been, telling the wonderful story to his mother when he returned home that night. I hope you will think of this story whenever you have a chance to give your contribution in the service of the Master; however small it may appear to you or to others around you, just give in faith and you will bring joy to yourself and perhaps feed many, many people.

W. G. HEACOCK.

Although the little lad here written of is not mentioned particularly in more than one Gospel, his lunch is recorded in all four, so it is reasonable to assume that he himself was present and made a willing offering of the small meal which with the Master's blessing fed so many.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

LEWIS S. GANNETT.

WINTER IN THE CORREZE.

Just southeast of the geographical centre of France is the Correze—a country of rolling hillsides and quaintly garbed country folk. There used to be a Chartreuse Monastery called "Le Glandier" at Pompadour in the Correze, but ten years ago church and state were separated, and the cowed monks went away. The monastery lay vacant, parts of it sometimes used as a summer hotel, sometimes as a summer home for city children.

To-day the monastery buzzes with the infinite chatter of six hundred children—Belgian refugees, sent out from Belgium to keep them from starvation or illness. The American Red Cross and the Belgian Government share the expenses; the American Red Cross maintains a medical and dental dispensary there, and the Friends (Quakers) are sending down four young men (two Americans and two Englishmen) to direct the physical training and help in problems of discipline.

They spend their days on the playground keeping the boys so busy that they have no time for mischief.

The Americans are Edwin Zavitz and Henry Strater. Sometimes they cross the hillsides on business. Here is a section of one of Zavitz's letters:

"I had to walk four or five miles across country to attend to some business matters with the Mayor. It was a wonderfully brisk morning. The road wound up hill and down hill through this exquisite hilly Correze country. Some slopes are covered with chestnut woods, some are open pastures, already turning green; the parallel ditches making them look almost terraced.

"All the time that quiet morning one could hear the rippling of water, either in the full steep ditches or in the little brooks that wound their way between the hills.

"In late summer it must have been glorious here. In all the wild patches there are thick mats of dead heather. Imagine it in bloom with its fragrance and its pinkness. There are some flowers even in winter; a yellow blossom in the hedges already brightens the winter monotony—bare hedges—they border all the road and separate the hillside fields, sticks in two rows, the inside space filled with small branches. Grey-green lichens hang on the dead wood, almost as thick as Spanish moss in Southern swamps; and tangled together are green shrubs, that of the yellow blossoms and another with fresh waxy olive-green holly bushes starred with big clusters of scarlet berries. I never before saw such holly nor such mistletoe as grow in the high trees, bundles of it like huge crows' nests among the bare branches.

"Ox teams, led by peasant women, passed me on the road, red, stocky cattle, the yoke tied around their horns; a long stick held between their heads told them very plainly what to do. They were hauling odd two-wheeled carts, filled with apples or cider barrels.

"The trees are better cared for here than in America. Even in the woods, every tree is carefully trimmed and the cut branches are tied in bundles, not a twig is wasted. The large sticks are squarely piled and the small branches or fagots are cut in even lengths. Almost all the trees are chestnuts. This is the country of the 'marrons,' and one still finds good nuts under the trees. In a short cut across a field of 'marronniers' I picked up a good handful which the leaves and dead burrs had partly protected from the frost. As I walked down the road munching them, I was not the only one enjoying the nuts, for I met a drove of 'cochons' (pigs) waddling and snorting along, picking up a mouthful here and there. They were healthy looking pigs, big and fat, with a broad band of white around them, as though their black skins had been pieced. Further along, strolled another mixed company, white sheep, black sheep, a brown sheep, several pigs, both big and little, a goat and a dog. An old woman, knitting as she followed the drove with her little daughter, looked at me with astonishment, obviously wondering where so queer looking a creature could have come from.

"At one crossroad I overtook a little French girl. She had run to the corner to get there before me, but was frightened when I spoke to her, asking the way to the next village. She was going there herself she said, and would show me. She was a neat little girl, her black hair tightly combed. For several minutes she could only reply, 'Oui, Monsieur,' to anything I said, but we chatted more comfortably as we went on and she told me a lot of interesting things about the beautiful hill country of Corzeze and its people."

THE LAW OF THE HIGHER MANHOOD.

The law of human helpfulness asks each man to carry himself so as to bless and not blight men, to make and not mar them. Besides the great ends of attaining character here and immortality hereafter, we are bound to so administer our talents as to make right living easy and smooth for others. Happy is he whose soul automatically oils all the machinery of the home, the market and the street. And this ambition to be universally helpful must not be a transient and occasional one—here and there an hour's friendship, a passing hint of sympathy, a transient gleam of kindness. Heart helpfulness is to enter into the fundamental conceptions of our living. With vigilant care man is to expel every element that vexes or irritates or chafes, just as the husbandman expels nettles and poison ivy from fruitful gardens.

For nothing is so easily wrecked as the soul. As mechanisms go up toward complexity, delicacy increases. The fragile vase is ruined by a single tap. A chance blow destroys the statue. A bit of sand ruins the delicate mechanism. But the soul is even more sensitive to injury. It is marred by a word or a look. Men are responsible for the run they work unthinkingly. To-day the engine drops a spark behind it. To-morrow that engine is a thousand miles away. Yet the spark left behind is now a column of fire mowing down the forests. And that devastating column belongs not to another, but to that engine that hath journeyed far. Thus the evil man does lives after him. The condemnation of life is that a man hath carried friction and stirred up malign elements and sowed fiery discords, so that the gods track him by the swath of destruction he hath cut through life. The praise of life is that a man hath exhaled bounty and stimulus and joy and gladness wherever he journeys. To-day noble examples and ten thousand precepts unite in urging every one to become a great heart. Every individual must bring together his little group of pilgrim friends, companions, employees, using whatever he has of wisdom and skill for guiding those who follow him on their desert march. For happiness is through helpfulness. Every morning let us build a booth to shelter someone from life's fierce heat. Every noon let us dig some life-spring for thirsty lips. Every night let us be food for the hungry and shelter for the cold and naked. The law of the higher manhood asks man to be a great heart, the shadow of a rock in a weary land.—NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, in "The Investment of Influence," in The American Friend.

NEWS ITEMS.

FIRST-DAY, the 31st, is Friends' Day at the Colored Home at Forty-fourth and Girard Avenue. The meeting hour is three o'clock, and Friends are cordially invited.

A FRIEND of Oldham, England, has written to one of our subscribers this interesting item of news:

He says, "It will surprise you to hear that we have a Congregational minister and about one hundred of his followers who meet in our lower school-room regularly each week.

"The minister has left his former congregation owing to a difference of view on the war question. He is a strong Peace man and that did not suit a number of his congregation."

The following is clipped from the American Friend.

J. Henry Seattergood has completed his speaking tour, which extended as far west as Haviland, Kansas, on which he has brought to Friends of the Middle West an effective "close up" of our reconstruction program in France and the conditions under which it is being carried on. Since his return from France he has addressed some sixty audiences and spoken in fifteen States. His messages on this tour have by no means been restricted to Friends. For instance, in Chicago, he spoke before the Woman's City Club and in Kansas City before the City Club, an organization of men of affairs there. His reception on the part of all has been most cordial and his message has met the response of hearty approval. The one slight exception, strange as it may appear, was at the "capital" of the Five Years' Meeting, where a citizen reported him to the County Council of Defense for making a pro-French speech!

FRIENDS' SERVICE NOTES.

Friends are earnestly requested to send to our office at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, local newspaper clippings relating to Friends' war relief work. Clippings from past papers, as well as future ones, will be very much appreciated.

We also request the families who have been represented on our Unit in France to loan us any pictures which may come from France. We wish these for cuts and lantern slides. We have found it exceedingly difficult to obtain an adequate supply of pictures from abroad and Friends can render great service by complying with this request. We shall not injure the pictures in any way and shall return them promptly.

We have recently received two additional checks for $2000 each from the Menonite Church. This makes a total of $8000 which the Menonites have furnished within the past few weeks, although as yet only one of their men is engaged in this work.

Richmond Friends report notable progress in sewing and knitting work. At a recent meeting over one hundred women representing four meetings gathered together for a day's work. The four ministers were invited to be present at a box lunch. In the box of each of the ministers was tucked a subject for an impromptu after-dinner speech. Two of the subjects were "The Need and The Needles," and "The Unit and Unity." Members of the American Friends' Reconstruction Unit who sailed recently for France.—Harold T. Allman, Wichita, Kansas; Tracy B. Angar, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Paul S. Elliott, Newburg, Oregon; George O. Holmes, Foster, Nebraska; Clinton H. Longshore, Langhorne, Pa.; Ross C. Miles, Salem, Oregon; George V. Mills, Turlock, California.

Note that six States are represented by the above group of seven men.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, WEEK ENDING THIRD MONTH 23, 1918.

From 22 Meetings	$4,885.68
From 8 Individuals	128.60
For Armenian and Syrian Relief	28.00

$5,042.28

CHARLES F. JENKINS,
Treasurer.

The Executive order defining non-combatant service is given below. Two of the sections are omitted, but the portion herewith printed will show what Friends are interested to know:

The section headed, "Must report all cases," makes it quite clear what will happen to absolutists. Unless we mis-read the order, the President's intention is that the consciences of such shall not be violated.—Eds.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

1. By virtue of authority contained in Section 4 of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled, "An Act to Authorize the President to increase temporarily the military establishment of the United States," whereby it is provided: "And nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing, and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations; but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be non-combatant." I hereby declare that the following military service is non-combatant service:

(a) Service in the Medical Corps wherever performed. This includes service in the sanitary detachments attached to combatant units at the front; service in the divisional sanitary trains composed of ambulance companies and field hospital companies, on the line of communications, at the base in France, and with the troops and at hospitals in the United States; also the service of supply and repair in the Medical Department.

(b) Any service in the Quartermaster Corps in the United States may be treated as non-combatant. Also, in rear of zone of operations, service in the following: Stevedore companies, labor companies, remount depots, veterinary hospitals, supply depots, bakery companies, the subsistence service, the bathing service, the laundry service, the salvage service, the clothing renovating service, the shoe repair service, and transportation repair service and motor truck companies.

(c) Any engineer service in the United States may be treated as non-combatant service. Also, in rear of zone of operations, service as follows: Railroad building, operation, and repair; road building and repair, construction of rear-line fortifications, auxiliary defenses, etc.; construction of docks, wharves, storehouses, and of such outcrops as may be built by the Corps of Engineers; topographical work, camouflage, map reproduction, supply depot service, repair service, hydraulic service, and forestry service.

MUST REPORT ALL CASES.

3. On the first day of April, and thereafter monthly, each division, camp, or post commander shall report to the Adjutant General of the army, for the information of Chief of Staff, and the Secretary of War, the names of all persons under their respective commands, who profess religious or other conscientious scruples as above described and who have been unwilling to accept by reason of such scruples assignment to non-combatant military service as above defined, and as to each such person so reported a brief, comprehensive statement as to the nature of the objection to the acceptance of such non-combatant military service entertained. The Secretary of War will from time to time classify the persons so reported and give further directions as to the disposition of them. Pending such directions from the Secretary of War, all such persons not accepting assignment to a non-combatant service shall be segregated as far as practicable and placed under the command of a specially qualified officer of tact and judgment, who will be instructed to impose no punitive hardship of any kind upon them, but not to allow their objections to be made the basis of any favor or consideration beyond exemption from actual military service which is not extended to any other soldier in the service of the United States.

4. With a view to maintaining discipline, it is pointed out that the discretion of courts-martial, so far as any shall be ordered to deal with the cases of persons who fail or refuse to comply with lawful orders by reason of alleged religious or other conscientious scruples, should be exercised, if feasible, so as to secure uniformity of penalties in the imposition of sentences under Articles of War 64 and 65, for the willful disobedience of a lawful order of command. It will be recognized that sentences imposed by such courts-martial, when not otherwise described by law, shall prescribe confinement in the United States disciplinary barracks or elsewhere as the Secretary of War or the reviewing authority may direct, but not in a penitentiary; but this shall not apply to the cases of men who desert either reporting for duty to the military authorities or subsequently thereto.

5. The Secretary of War will revise the sentences and findings of courts-martial heretofore held of persons who come within any of the classes herein described, and bring to the attention of the President for remedy, if any be needed, sentences and judgments found at variance with the provisions hereof.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 20, 1918.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN NOTES.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia (Penna. R. R.), at 6.21, 8.21 A. M., and 2.45, 3.35, 4.55 P. M., other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telephone, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:

Barton—More Power to You.

Burr—In Deep Places.

Burr—Life and Living.

Collins—Air Men.

DeCroot—When I Was a Girl in Holland.

Grayson—Great Possessions.

Griffis—Hebrews of Japan.

Smikhovitch—City Worker's World in America.

Richards—Abigail Adams.

Russell—Political Ideals.

Vetron—Some Turning Points in Church History.

LINDA A. MOORE,
Librarian.

DIED.—At her home, Merchantville, N. J., on the morning of Second Month 27, 1918, ISABELLA PANDIACH RUSSELL, widow of the late George Russell; a member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting, N. J.

—, at the home of his parents, near Paulina, Iowa, the eighth of Third Month, 1918, HERMAN FRANCIS HENDERSON, youngest son of Joseph and Mary B. Henderson, in his thirteenth year; a member of Paulina Monthly Meeting, Iowa.

—, Suddenly, on the twelfth of Third Month, 1918, at her home, 1250 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, SUSAN WATSON YARNALL, wife of William S. Yarnall; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

—, Third Month 14, 1918, at his residence, in West Chester, BERIAMIN S. HOUSE, in his seventy-sixth year; a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting.

WM. H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS,
No. 422 WALNUT STREET, PHILA., PA.

Let Me Help You

W. J. MacWatters

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic -- -- Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton
"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

SPRINGTIME in the Pocono Mountains is ever a delight to those who admire and study nature. The Birds and Flowers are numerous and varied, and the Trout Fishing in the Swiftwater is wonderful.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for Spring Term, 1918:
"The Teaching of Jesus, History of the Hebrew People, and History of Friends," by Elbert Russell.

"An Introduction to Social Work," Frank D. Watson, of Haverford College.

"History of Religion," Jesse H. Holmes, of Swarthmore College.

"History of Foreign Missions," Elihu Grant, of Haverford College.

"Principles of Religious Education," Charles H. Fisher, of Pennsylvania State Normal School, Westchester.

Spring Term, Fourth Month 1 to Sixth Month 8, 1918.

Send Applications for information or for admission to

ELBERT RUSSELL, Director,
WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

Genealogist

Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 N. Blockley St., Trenton, N. J.

Hajoca

Pedestal Lavatory

Simple and beautiful in design. Its plain, smooth surfaces are easy to keep clean. Equipped with the Hajoca Waste, which prevents backing up of residue from previous ablations.

Come see our model bathrooms. Our showrooms are within easy reach of City Hall. Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES & CADBURY CO.

1130-1144 Ridge Ave.

(at 12th and Spring Garden Streets)

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER
550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.
Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Cheap
Accommodations for Funerals.
BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.
Write for particulars to
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Aves., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades
Cutom of Friends Specially Selected
FRANK C. BUEHL
Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. — PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE.

M. GATCHEL
126 N. 21st St., PHILA.
MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY
'Phone, Spruce 3682

BUSINESS men who are looking for a new printing connection are invited to get acquainted with

THE HOLMES PRESS

J. Linton Eagle, Pres. 1336 Cherry Street, Phila.

MEDICAL ARTS BUILDING
William S. Yarnall
Optician
128 SOUTH 16TH ST. PHILA.

JOSEPH G. FOGG
FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER
S. W. Cor. Sixteenth and Race Streets
Special attention given to Friends' Funerals
Bell 'Phone : Spruce 1646

SHETLAND PONIES
Oldest Herd in United States
Established 1883
Specialty attractive prices just now owing to change in business arrangements
HARTZELL BROS., SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

FOR RENT — EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED Cottage, bath, open plumbing, hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several meals daily, half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are one or more invalids in family. Meals must be taken at Maplewood.
Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES, Jamestown, R. I.

WANTED—A POSITION IN FRIENDS' SCHOOL, either in upper grades or Junior High School, by an experienced woman teacher, a Friend.
Address B. "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—FOR THE ACADEMIC YEAR, 1918-1919, an experienced teacher of Arithmetic for grades three, four, five and six; a Friend preferred. Ability to teach French also is desirable.
Apply to "SCHOOL", care of "THE FRIEND."

SUMMER BOARD IN THE PLEASANT COUNTRY, near Maiden Creek. Season opens Sixth Month 15th. CAROLINE B. KIRK, "Ivy Lodge", Colburn, Pa.

FOR RENT FROM SIXTH MONTH 1 TO NINTH Month 30, 1918, furnished home on Haverford College campus. Nine rooms, two baths, garage.
R. W. KELSEY, HAVERFORD, PA.

WANTED—A COMPANION FOR AN ELDERLY woman Friend in a nice home.
Apply P. "THE FRIEND."

FRIENDS' SCHOOL AT ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. will need three experienced teachers for year 1918-19 for Seventh and Eighth grades, Fourth and Fifth grades, and Kindergarten. Apply to Principal, HELEN L. FORBSTE.

WANTED—GOVERNOR FOR THREE CHILDREN, two-and-a-half, four and six years old. Permanent position for a period of education and ability. Answer by letter to Livingston E. Jones, Wissahickon Avenue, Germantown, Pa.

WANTED—ROOM, WITH BOARD, IN THE COUNTRY, within 30 miles of Philadelphia, and near Friends' Meeting, for a literary man. Address A. G. V. care of "THE FRIEND", 207 Walnut Place.

WANTED—A POSITION AS GOVERNOR AND mother's helper in a family of refinement.
Address V. "THE FRIEND", 207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—BY ONE OF EXPERIENCE, A POSITION as companion dress for invalid.
Address B, Box 208, Haverford, Penna.

SCHOOL PRINCIPAL WANTED AT FRIENDS' Academy, a boarding and day school for boys and girls, located at Locust Valley, Long Island, N. Y. A married man, who is a member of the Society of Friends, preferred. For particular address FRANK'S E. WILLIS, President, Glen Cove, N. Y.

Cheyney Institute

offers an opportunity each year to one hundred picked colored youths to train themselves in leadership. No people have a more just claim on the sympathy and help of others than those colored people who have faith in the future of their race through wise training.

Cheyney Institute offers this training and has proved by its graduates that it merits generous support.

The Managers endeavor to administer the Trust they have assumed, but must look to Friends and others for financial assistance in the work for these one hundred young men and women.

The Institute also offers a unique course for teachers in its Summer School. Most of the Eastern and Southern States are represented at this School and testimonials of the advantages gained from the Summer courses would satisfy the most skeptical.

Leslie P. Hill, Principal, is always ready to offer timely suggestions to any who have it on their hearts to assist in the laudable work that is carried on at Cheyney.

Because of the conditions which must be met, if the School is to continue its good work, the Board of Managers feel free to request Friends to include Cheyney among the charities to which they contribute, and ask that checks shall be drawn in favor of and mailed to

WILLIAM BIDDLE, Treasurer,
119 S. Fourth St., Philadelphia.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. -:- PHILA.

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED

JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILLLAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

Letchworth Cottage Spring Lake Beach, N. J.

Open for the Season 1918

A. C. & S. H. Letchworth

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE

PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Ruce 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1571.

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2084X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2050.

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

Safety and Yield In Investments

MANY short-term notes of ample security offer, at present prices, an unusually liberal yield.

Well-known issues of such securities can now be bought at prices to yield from 5.60% to well above 7%.

Send for Circular PF-156

The National City Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.,
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

THE DOMESTIC ELECTRIC

VACUUM CLEANER

PRICE, $30.00

with attachments, $38.00

The full size guaranteed carpet
sweeper brush makes this the most efficient cleaner on the market today.
Solves the Sweeping Problem in the home or institution.

Ten days' free trial
Time payments at the cash price.

Send for Booklet

F. W. HOFFMAN & CO.

35 S. Fourth St. - PHILA.
ALSO FULL LINE OF HAND CLEANERS

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1896. Experience 40 years. Medical 13

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS, 1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kelsey.
Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FOURTH MONTH 4, 1918.

No. 40.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSTYHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 { DAVIS H. FORSTYHE,
 { MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

(Continued)

The opening session of the Yearly Meeting on Second-day was solemnized in the feeling that "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." An appeal was made for Friends to stand by the spiritual verities of the Gospel of Jesus Christ—the gospel of peace. Men in the trenches and in the midst of the conflict may be held there by a sense that no other course is right for them, but they are emphatic in saying that it is not Christ's work. When the war is over those that are spared will be most keen to join in efforts to establish in world affairs "the better way of life" for which we wish to stand now.

Excepting the formal matters of appointing committees, the session was devoted to the reading of the minutes of the Representative Meeting. These covered double the usual number of pages and were principally concerned with matters relating to military service. These items have been published from time to time in THE FRIEND. A proposition to appoint an executive secretary to carry into effect the decisions of the Yearly Meeting and the Representative Meeting was approved and $2500 was appropriated to cover the expense.

The session of Third-day opened with a consideration of the advisability of reaffirming our Peace position. The meeting was a practical unit in this decision (there was just one dissenting voice), and a small committee was appointed for the service.

The session was mainly devoted to the reading of communications received by the Clerk during the year. These were presented by a verbal committee who had examined them. Those from London and Japan were regular epistles and are printed in THE FRIEND. In both instances they were fresh and inspiring. Four other communications were in response to messages from us last year. The one from the Five Years' Meeting left the door for affiliation still open, in acknowledging the welcome fellowship of fifty visitors from our Yearly Meeting. Twenty members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting had joined in a letter of request for the appointment of a committee to consider the proper co-ordination of religious work now conducted in Japan and other foreign countries with the Yearly Meeting. This committee was appointed upon a joint nomination.

On Fourth-day the Queries were considered. In Philadelphia they still serve to secure a helpful discussion of the "state of society." The minute of exercise is the outcome of this session. It has the force of an epistle to subordinate meetings.

Fifth-day brings together the largest attendance, the present year being no exception to this rule. The Committee to write an epistle to London was asked to write a letter to all our reconstruction workers in Europe, and the Peace Committee to prepare a letter addressed to young men of our membership in the cantonments. The report of the Educational Committee emphasized the need of more teachers. The work of the Committee has been greatly assisted by a liberal gift of $10,000 for present needs.

The Westtown report was voluminous, but held the attention of the meeting. A determination to have the right type of pupil, even though numbers may be small, and the recital of some definite spiritual activities of the family were the outstanding features of the report. The Peace Committee's report summarized numerous lines of active work conducted during the year, and told of the collection and disbursement of large sums of money, mostly for the uses of the American Friends' Service Committee. As was the case a year ago, a large Peace meeting was held at Arch Street in the evening.

Sixth-day, as is often the case, the spiritual tide of the meeting seemed at the highest point. There was no more certain token of this than the gathered solemnity of the body. The reaffirmation of our Peace position brought the meeting into an undoubted unity. It was felt to be a clear, but tolerant declaration made without fear or compromise. The epistles to London and Japan carried the sympathies of the Yearly Meeting in full measure to the oldest and youngest Yearly Meetings. The letter to young Friends and others in reconstruction work sounded a note of encouragement and steadfastness to them as "living epistles" of our high ideals. In somewhat the same note the letter to young Friends in camp gave them the assurance that the meeting was in feeling for them, whatever their position might be.

Full details of the life and work of the Indian School at Tunesassa were given in an exhaustive report of the Committee in charge. The evident progressive policy was welcomed by the meeting.

The report of the Social Order Committee dealt at length with fundamental principles. The practical application of these, demands courageous adventures of faith and practice. The Society has been rich in examples of such in the past and the future activities of this Committee, which was reappointed for three years, may be expected to be along this line.

A memorial of our late beloved Friends, George J. and 1855-1918

PUBLISHED BY THE FRIENDS CONCERNED

Caroline C. Scattergood, gave a vivid picture of their lives of faithfulness. Their "pastoral gift," to use a phrase of the memorial, extended quite beyond the limits of their own meeting. In a sense the world was their parish.

The minute of exercise recorded the hopefulness of an out-stretching unity that had been felt in the meeting to an unusual degree. It will be printed in our next number.

The meeting concluded in a very special sense of gratitude. The women's Yearly Meeting dealt with the subjects noted above and in addition issued a letter to absent members. In their meetings, as in those of the men, it was the feeling that there is a growing interest in Yearly Meeting and an increased capacity on the part of the body at large to enter into exercise.

[EDITORS.]

NOT SERVICE, BUT INSPIRED SERVICE

The London epistle, printed herewith, touches more than one vital point of corporate life and activity. Perhaps nothing in it is more noteworthy than the fine discrimination between service and inspired service. It is a time of great concentration of authority and effort. This is directed almost entirely to secure efficiency. Religious as well as material interests are involved. Thus the Christian work for the shattered world seems to centre almost entirely in the Y. M. C. A. The church organizations find themselves overshadowed and their working force is drawn away from them in a manner that has produced some feeling of dismay. In degree the service thus instituted is inspired. It demands, often, extreme self-sacrifice. Its ideals are in large measure Christian, even when they serve creature needs and are arranged for what are regarded as necessary diversions. There is, however, a world of difference between this organized service under a highly perfected system and the direct personal surrender to duty in the form so long known to us in the Society of Friends. These calls to duty may use organization and recognize the need of orderly system. Nothing in the gift of the Society of Friends as an organization from the seventeenth century to our day, is more notable than the provision to preserve intact the individual character of revelation. If a man or woman is called to an inspired service the Monthly, Quarterly and even the Yearly Meeting may share the responsibilities and privileges. It is doubtful whether there is anything more essential to the life of the groups than this call to enter into "inspired service" in this way. So London Yearly Meeting is calling us back to fundamentals. Have we come to consider that no concerns of members other than those in the ministry are to engage the notice and co-operation of the Monthly Meeting? If so, we may know why such meetings seem dead and formal. Is it not true that every social, educational or remedial effort may be truly inspired in the individual members of a meeting?

Over against a system that works as our meetings are intended to work, we may set a highly centralized church organization such as most denominations of our fellow-Christians have developed. In that case we may make some apparent gain in efficiency, but is the "redemptive force of positive personality" best increased by this means? A certain type of leadership may be better trained under the more centralized system, but the service of the many may atrophy by this very result. If Quakerism is to be a real democracy must it not preserve the democratic form of having Monthly Meetings share in the inspired service of its members and foster such service?

J. H. B.

FROM LONDON YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS, HELD IN LONDON, FROM THE TWENTY-THIRD OF FIFTH MONTH TO THE THIRTIETH OF THE SAME, 1917, TO PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING:—

Dear Friends:—

It is with no formal friendliness that we address you at this time. Outside the precincts of the meeting-house where we are gathered, the thronging streets of the city display the banners of the United States and of the United Kingdom side by side. It is a sight to thrill and at the same time to solemnize. We hardly dare to think what this may mean for ourselves and for you. Both our nations have grasped the weapons of war. Can we use them? If not, by what other weapons shall we meet the onset of evil? We can no longer evade the issues at stake. We are called upon to come out into the open and relate ourselves, our beliefs, our practices, even our everyday occupations to the world's needs. This common call to a common service has brought us into close sympathy with you. In the session of our Yearly Meeting devoted to the consideration of our relations with Friends in America, we felt that the seas no longer separated us and that we were indeed one body.

It is with joy we accept the expressions of affection and sympathy contained in your epistle, and it is with much gratitude that we have received all the generous support you have given to our different activities on behalf of the victims of war. The prospect in the near future of the personal help of many younger Friends from your side of the Atlantic draws us still more closely together. Faced as they now are with the duties and responsibilities belonging to a country at war, we can well understand their eagerness to give their active powers of body and mind to the relief of suffering and misery. In the many calls and claims of to-day we greatly desire that each of us may be truly led of the Spirit. It is not merely service the world needs, but it is inspired service. It is men and women with the mind of Christ, who will bring to the world's wounds not only alleviation but healing. Christ alone can speak to the world's condition; and the human lives and human lips and human hearts through which He speaks must be freshly inspired from His heart of love. Our peace service and our peace testimony must be founded on peace experience. Those who have known how the Spirit of Christ can make a way where there seems no way, can enable them to "stop the mouths of lions and quench the power of fire," may well follow where He leads to new adventures, even to the escaping of the edge of the sword and the subduing of kingdoms. They will long to carry into a wider world the faith that has led them so far. No explorer demands to know beforehand the course he shall follow, nor quails before the dangers of the untried; his glory is in the unproven path, in his compass and in his guiding star.

The months that lie before us are dark with clouds and uncertainty, but full also of possibility and hope. May we all be ready for the coming of our Lord, and watch for His appearing.

Signed on behalf of the Meeting,
JOHN H. BARLOW, Clerk.

TO PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING:—

Our Dear Friends:—

This letter brings you our cordial greetings in Christian fellowship. It is a great blessing to realize that to God's eye the East and West are one, and in His unlimited love you and we all can come together into His fold as one flock.

We most thankfully notify you that we have been led by the grace and guidance of our Heavenly Father and Lord Jesus Christ to organize Japan Yearly Meeting at the annual meeting held in Tokio, Fifth Month 10 to 14, 1917.

May His grace be always with your meeting and ours, and His name be praised and glorified above all things.

On behalf of Japan Yearly Meeting,
TASUKE NOMURA, Presiding Clerk.
TORI IWASAWA, Corresponding Clerk.

ARE WE STILL GROWING?

ALFRED LOWRY, JR.

The investigations of those psychologists who have been devoting themselves more especially to the study of "sub-normal" and defective mentality in children have made us all more or less familiar with the term moron. This word, if I correctly understand it, is applied to those whose mental development proceeded, perhaps quite normally, to a certain point (say three years, five years or fifteen), and then, for one reason or another, stopped short, so that the individual remains throughout his life a child of three, five or fifteen.

Reading once more, not long ago, the account of the boy Jesus in the temple, as it is recorded towards the end of Luke ii, I had to stop to ask myself whether my own experience paralleled that of the Master. At twelve years He was vividly conscious that He must be about His Father's business, but upon returning with His parents to Nazareth He "increased in wisdom and stature."

Are there not, in addition to physical dwarfs and mental morons, those forming a far more numerous class, whose spiritual development has stopped short? Just as a twelve-year moron never develops beyond that age, so there are those souls which never get beyond the twelve-year experience of the child Jesus. They have early realized, more or less clearly, that they, too, must be about their Father's business. But there they stop and never do they give signs of really putting away childish things and growing up into strong men and women in Christ, the sort in whom God can have faith and to whom He can entrust great things.

Wonderful results are being obtained in various modern training schools towards making the children there contented, useful workers in agricultural and industrial lines, but always, of course, under carefully-trained supervision. Never can such persons become what we call "good citizens" or assume any real responsibility in the life of the community or nation. Just so God can make a certain use of the more tractable spiritual twelve-year olds, but they can never, in that state, become candidates for responsible citizenship in His kingdom. Now, if ever in history, He has need of men and women in whom He can have confidence. We must grow up.

But it may be asked, what about Christ's words, "Except ye become as little children," or "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven?" Do not they exactly specify that we are to remain in a child-like state?

Yes, by all means. But what is there more characteristic of childhood than the fact of continual growth and unfolding? Nothing, except perhaps that which goes along with the development of young life, a certain tenderness and a plasticity ever sensitive to fresh impressions. As soon as the normal child (I am not speaking now of morons) stops growing, he ceases to be a child. Neither hardening of the arteries nor a hardening of the heart are conditions natural to childhood.

Let us seek to get beyond the spiritual age of twelve, where we are vaguely aware that we should be doing something for God, and grow up all our lives long into the knowledge of the fulness of His glory. We shall keep young and valiant in heart, yet strength and wisdom will come to us and we shall be able to play a man's part in God's service. Has anyone better expressed this ideal than William Penn in that splendid tribute to George Fox: "For in all things he acquitted himself like a man, yea, a strong man, a new and heavenly-minded man."

To "live in a house by the side of the road and be a friend to man" is one of the highest desires to which we ever attain. The recluse, holding himself apart from contamination that he may be pious in safety, and the saint dispensing rebukes and homilies from some pedestal far above the common mass of mankind have had their day. Now he who would help his fellow-man must do it as the Man of Galilee did long ago—by the roadside, by the seaside and in the market place.

QUARTERLY MEETING ACTIVITIES.

Mostly, in our system, the Quarterly Meeting has become little more than a clearing-house through which business, transacted by subordinate meetings, is transmitted to a larger circle of members, or through the Yearly Meeting to the largest circle of our organization. In 1905, largely under the concern of E. Ernest Taylor and a group of young Friends who had responded to the concern, a large committee was appointed in Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting (England) for such activities of a religious nature as might be called for. This 1905 Committee has made the way for a marked expansion of Quarterly Meeting functions. A late report from this Committee, printed in The Friend (London) gives some idea of the possible scope of work for a Divinely led Quarterly Meeting group:—

Under the title "Spreading the Truth," the Yorkshire 1905 Committee issues its twelfth report, a document containing many points suggestive for the whole Society. In connection with the Committee's Educational and Propagandist efforts, which have included lecture courses, tutorial classes, study circles, week-end settlements and addresses, the Committee refers to the suggestion made by the Yearly Meeting of 1917 in its Minute 25, which has lately been considered in the Quarterly Meetings. They say:

"We are glad that the Yearly Meeting has recognized the great importance of providing better opportunities for the after-school education of our members. Our experience in Yorkshire during recent years makes clear the following points:

"(1) That in many of our meetings there is both a need and a demand for constructive teaching.

"(2) There is in many places a good response to special efforts made to reach the public.

"(3) In the larger centres (especially the Branch meetings) there seems to be room for considerable development of the system of teaching classes." The number of those who are called upon to help in this kind of work is far too small. (The pressure of present circumstances doubtless accounts in part for this.)

"The importance of discovering and training fresh leaders for work of this kind is constantly before us. It can hardly be too strongly emphasized that the purpose underlying all this educational effort is the better equipment of our members for the service of the Kingdom of God."

The Committee has circulated 41,775 pamphlets and leaflets during the year, while the Northern Friends' Peace Board (representing five Quarterly Meetings) has distributed about 30,000 additional Malton leaflets. Visitation of the meetings has been maintained as far as possible, and it is remarked that "the value of this work can hardly be over-emphasized at the present time, when meetings are feeling depleted of their young men, and Friends who remain have to bear increasing responsibility for their meetings as well as added business pressure." Numerous group visits have been paid, and the Committee remark:—

"We are continually impressed with the value of visits of this type. They have a place quite distinct from individual visitation. The impact of a group of personalities coming under concern, the opportunity afforded for lectures of an educational character, the distribution of the service in connection with the many engagements, and the opening of the homes of Friends to the visitors—all have a stimulating and inspiring effect upon a meeting. These visits have often proved to be the starting-point for the development of fresh life and activity."

Three characteristics of the present period are noted by the Committee as follows:—

"(1) The number of persons who are seeking for spiritual fellowship is a considerable and steadily increasing one. Some of them are turning with eager expectation towards the Society of Friends and are attending our meetings, both in prison and out of prison. We are thankful to know that many have been greatly helped by attending our meetings, though we believe that some miss the fulness of fellowship they are seeking and at times do not receive through the vocal ministry the inspiration and power that they need. Men and women are seeking for a new way of life based upon a deep first-hand experience of God, which brings the sense of certainty into the confusion of our time, and creates the spirit of hope in the presence of despair. The religious instinct of the people demands that Christianity shall have the touch of reality about it, and prove itself as a regulative and governing moral force in all the relations of life.

"(2) Everywhere there are to be found great stirrings of life. Strong convictions are being formed as to the future organization of society. Various programmes of social and industrial reconstruction are being framed and freely discussed. . . . It is becoming increasingly clear that what we need supremely to-day is to revolutionize our Christianity so that it may express more truly the spirit and teaching of Jesus.

"(3) There are others who are seriously troubled by intellectual difficulties in relation to the Christian faith. For many, these difficulties have been accentuated by the sorrows and trials brought about by the war, and they need our help and guidance. The Committee is endeavoring to provide pamphlet literature to meet their particular needs, but the printed page can never take the place of personal association with those who in a spirit of sympathy and understanding can give a reason for the faith which they hold."

NOTES FROM JAPAN.

E. F. SHARPLESS.

A COUNTRY KINDERGARTEN.

There are many ways of doing the work of the Kingdom of Heaven, but I sometimes think that the starting of little children on the heavenward path is the most fundamental way of all. Of course this is the work of the home, but if the home through ignorance or carelessness fails to live up to its high calling, there have to be substitutes, and one of these, I have learned lately, is the kindergarten.

There was a little girl in America who was called out of her earthly home when she was three years old, and she left a little saving account—something less than fifty dollars—and her father and mother decided to let her life go on through that money in the lives of Japanese children. Although such a small amount, it has made possible the opening of a kindergarten where twenty-five little ones are being taught that heavenward path.

Her teacher is the wife of one of our Friends' workers, and the kindergarten is held in their own house, both husband and wife working together to make the children feel at home and happy. He was a teacher in the public school before he became a Christian, and since then has always wished to have again some connection with the education of little children. To western ways of thinking, it sounds odd to say, that he decided he would marry a kindergarten, but that is just what he did and has found a very nice wife at the same time. Their home is on the seashore about ten miles from Mito, and some five days after the kindergarten was opened, I had an opportunity to visit it.

It was an icy morning and I went in a rattling old bus, with a horn to announce our coming to would-be travelers, through frozen rice fields and past thatch-roofed farm-houses, and finally down into the little seashore town, with its one dingy, crowded street. The children were already collected and the house and garden were pretty largely given over to them. Some were warming their fingers over the charcoal fire, some were digging in the sand box, and some were bouncing their rubber balls on the boards of the outside passage-way. They all seemed happy and the spirit of home was there already. Later the bell rang and they formed a ring in the rather narrow quarters which the house affords—a 12 by 12 room for twenty-five children does not allow much space for wriggling—and the rosy, smiling faces were met with gentle discipline and encouragement. For a short time the little heads were bent in the worship of a Heavenly Father, who is strange to them now, but who will become more and more real to them from this time on.

It is not only the children who profit. Twenty-five homes have shown openness to receive Christian teaching, and twenty-five little teachers will be carrying the message to their homes day by day.

As I turned home, I felt indeed happy that the little American girl's life could go on in this way, among her brothers and sisters of Japan.

OUT IN THE DEW.

HANNAH P. MORRIS.

There is for the lover of nature, a peculiar charm in following her in her shy moods, being intrusted as her confidant, and knowing that few men reach the secret.

Hence I took especial delight last summer in discovering those rare and ephemeral products of the soil, mushrooms, and for a month seldom missed a day in visiting their retreat. It was an unusual spot. One expects to find them in an old meadow pasture, where the plow has not made its furrow for many a long year, where the sheep, treading daintily and leisurely, scarce leave a foot-print.

In such places I searched in vain. But one choice morning, late in Summer, while crossing a corn-field, I stood in amazement! Could my eyes deceive me? There at the roots of the tall stalks rose a cluster of mushrooms. I gathered them, smelt them, tasted them. And then glancing around, I saw similar groups in every direction. Collecting as many as could be carried, I bore them home in triumph, and a most savory supper was the result. The next day, I shared a goodly basket-full with a neighbor, and perhaps sighed secretly that such quantities were not at the disposal of some poor boy, who might sell them in market for sixty cents a quart.

But this most mercenary idea was soon banished. Was it not compensation enough, to rise early every morning while the air was cool and pure, to join in the matin hymns of the robins and larks—to see the sun through a golden horizon, to brush the glittering dew from the grass, and finally to reach the corn-field?

A view from the fence must not be overlooked, for a broad stream lay in the valley, and a fleet of ducks was sailing gallantly on its surface.

A rabbit scudded across the furrows, scarcely touching the ground in his long leaps, but breaking unwittingly, as I did also, the gossamer-webs which the spiders wove busily all night, to them a cruel act, but a happy release for their prisoners.

On the hillside spread the broad expanse of corn, its thousand leaves rustling as I threaded my way down the green aisles, and wetting my cheek with moisture. No far-away view now, except toward the sky, the tall plumes of the stately plant hemmed me in on all sides, and some verses from a Western writer chimed in my memory:—

"The wide, wide lands that stretched away
Before my eyes in the days of May;

Stately mansion and hut forlorn
All are hidden by walls of corn.

All wide, the world is narrowed down
To walls of corn—soon sear and brown.

What do they hold? these walls of corn
Whose banners toss on the breeze of morn.

The pillars are hung with gleaming gold
Left all unbarred, though thieves are bold.

Clothes and food for the toiling poor
Wealth to heap at the rich man's door."

The maize is so thoroughly American that one could wish its virtue might be enblazoned as a national emblem, how well could it compare with the fleur-de-lis or the tistle! From its earliest growth, green and tender, through its summer luxuriance until it is cut, and stands in tented shocks in the Autumn, it is a pleasure to the beholder.

The Indian legend of "Mondamin," so beautifully rendered by Longfellow, tells us how Hiawatha brought this blessing to his people. It also shows how these children of the forest, comprehended in their limited way that labor is essential to success, and that in the sweat of his brow man shall eat bread:

"From the Master of Life descending,
I, the friend of man, Mondamin,
Come to warn you and instruct you,
How by struggle and by labor
You shall gain what you have prayed for,
Rise up from your bed of branches,
Rise, O youth, and wrestle with me!"
.....
At his touch he felt new courage
Throbbing in his brain and bosom,
Felt new life and hope and vigor
Run thro' every nerve and fibre.
.....

During the seven days of fasting, they wrestled thrice until,

"Suddenly, upon the greensward,
All alone stood Hiawatha,
Palpating with the struggle, lifeless,
And before him, breathless, lifeless,
Lay the youth with hair dishevelled,
Plumage torn and garments tattered,
Dead he lay there in the sunset.
And victorious Hiawatha
Made the grave as he commanded,
.....
Laid him in the earth and made it
Soft and loose and light above him,
Day by day did Hiawatha
Go to wait and watch beside it,
Kept it clean from weeds and insects
Drove away, with scoffs and shoutings,
Kagalgee, the king of ravens.
Till at length a small green feather
From the earth shot slowly upward,
Then another and another,
And, before the summer ended,
Stood the maize in all its beauty,
With its shining robes about it,
And its long, soft, yellow tresses,
And, in rapture, Hiawatha
Cried aloud, 'It is Mondamin,'
'Yes, the friend of man, Mondamin!'"

My reveries in the corn-field are broken by a sight of the mushrooms, delicate little "boutons," so prized by the epicure, with their rounded egg-shaped whiteness, their salmon interior, the tiny column that supports them, all risen from the dark mould within a few hours, and as soon to return to it again, a shapeless mass, unless I capture them—is not this an incentive? My basket fills rapidly, for some of them are three inches in diameter, but I remember a story told me by a military officer from Wyoming Territory, of his eating mushrooms there a foot in width, so that one, properly broiled, would make him an ample breakfast. I am quite content with these, however, for much of the charm consists in the search for the dainty clusters.

With what pleasure do I recall a recent lecture by Dr. Rothrock, in which he assured lovers of mushrooms that there are unmistakable signs by which they may be distinguished from toadstools, and that the Agaricus Campestris is both edible and nutritious. 'Tis safest to confine ourselves to this, although there are a few other fungi which are not poisonous.

All this division of the vegetable world differs from the rest, in that its elements are nitrogenous and therefore resembles animal food. In many mountainous regions are varieties which might be wisely utilized to aid the spare diet of the people, could they only be instructed as to the delicate pink tint of the under side and the shape of the stem; every child should be taught these distinctions.

In France, the seed is sown in caves and the crop then gathered as an article of commerce; we learn from a reliable authority that from one of these plantations at the height of the season three thousand pounds of mushrooms are sent daily to the Paris markets, but this is very practical compared with our "volunteer harvest."

To return to it! Hark! a rustling, a footstep, my heart stands still! What a lonely place to meet a stranger, perhaps one with evil intent. I glide away through the dripping leaves, but soon confront a neighbor's boy, whose tin-kettle, half-full, reveals that our errand is the same. I am no longer the sole discoverer, we exchange a few words, agree that we will keep our treasure from the rest of the world and monopolize it in partnership.

A few days more, and we find a change, the damp sultry nights are succeeded by a drought, the ground becomes parched and the "boutons" no longer can pierce the soil. In vain one scans the furrows and is lured here and there by a rounded stone or an oyster-shell—the weeds are beginning to take possession, for cultivation of the corn is over, the leaves and roots are too widespread to admit a harrow. The pumpkins spread their graceful tendrils, and the green fruit baskets in the sun until it is golden. Overhead, the crows rejoice in their harsh dialect at the coming harvest—but our mushrooms are gone—the nights grow cool, the early Autumn has begun when "Sweet calm days, in golden haze, melt down the amber sky."

Next year rye is to fill the field; as I write, its green blades are piercing the snow nature's kindly forces are at work recruiting, mellowing, vivifying, but I doubt whether she can again tempt the germs of my mushrooms to strew that sunny hillside.

CONFERENCE ON "THE MINISTRY."

[A Committee under appointment of Concord Quarterly Meeting has been holding a series of conferences at certain centres within the past eighteen months; the one held at Media, Pa., on Third Month 17th was well attended. The topic for this special meeting was "The Ministry." The following brief review has been prepared at our request and we hope in later issues of THE FRIEND to publish the three papers read on the occasion. The papers were written by young members, but they call for no apology on the part of those who prepared them.—Eds.]

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING CONFERENCE, HELD THIRD MONTH 17, 1918.

Perhaps we have been justly accused recently of the dearth of ministry in our meetings for worship, but if one may judge by the large group of attenders at the Concord Quarterly Meeting Conference on "The Ministry," it is certainly not from lack of interest or appreciation of the subject.

With J. Passmore Elkinton presiding, the meeting opened with a brief period of devotion.

Wilbur W. Kamp told us very clearly how a living silence had impressed one who had not always been used to silent meetings. He brought home to us the fact that our attitude in meeting often shows we are not experiencing a vital, living silence, for instance, when we turn around to see who is coming in late. On the other hand, he made us feel how helpful and truly devotional silence can be. He, with his short experience, had already discovered that for a meeting to be helpful or not depends upon the individual and his spiritual condition.

William C. James' paper on "The Resulting Ministry" emphasized a greater need for willingness, a fresh consecration to God's will, and the emptying ourselves of selfish thoughts and feelings when we come to our meetings.

A Symposium of Group Discussions, prepared by Edith Stratton, showed us types of ministry which have appealed strongly to individuals. Perhaps the most impressive fact about the symposium was the evident seriousness and thoughtfulness of the answers to the topic, "The Best Preaching I Have Ever Heard." These had been written by members of the Fellowship Groups in Media, Lansdowne and West Chester. Edith Stratton called attention to the value of united worship where we help each other, and that the greatest preachers must be those who are in vital touch with God and with men.

It is difficult to express adequately our appreciation of Rufus Jones' address. He pointed out first the great universal need of leaders and ministers at the present time. Strong, clear messages are needed to mould the lives around us. We should not lose sight of personality, and the human side, for these help to make our messages truly practical. He referred to L. Violet Hodgkin's book—"Quaker Saints," in which she tells of a child who having seen a saint's head on a cathedral window developed the idea that a saint must be one who lets the sunshine of God through, so our ministers must let God's light shine through them and must always be ready to bring God's message of love to needy men. He reminded us that we can not be ministers without being charged, we must have something beyond ourselves. We can have such people today. It is our fault if we do not. We must remember always, there are no limitations to spiritual things. When we expect great things we realize them.

The Conference ended with a half-hour devotional period, which fittingly closed this most valuable meeting.

M. S. JAMES.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"I WILL GUIDE THEE WITH MINE EYE."—(A True Narrative)—In Bible times we read of the leading of the Holy Spirit; prophets and apostles were guided by it in miraculous ways; our early Friends we know trusted implicitly in this Divine guidance, often finding themselves to their own astonishment led into unexpected places, watched over and made to minister to others.

We are apt to consider these incidents as past history, but that our Heavenly Father does continue even now to lead and guide His dependent children in ways they cannot discern with their outward vision, is unmistakably shown in many of the experiences which go to make up the warp and woof of our daily lives. Such are the incidents here related—Amos Brown (that is not his right name) being the author who has felt that perhaps this recital may strengthen the faith of some who may be doubtful as to the reality of God's still leading "with His eye" all who trust Him implicitly.

In the year 1802, Amos Brown, a member of the Society of Friends, was engaged in business in West Philadelphia, with a young man, a member of another religious organization. This man, Charles Dent, while he had been brought up in a religiously-guarded home, became so fond of pleasures and amusements that his ability for business became impaired so that it seemed best to close the partnership; in doing so a balance was due Amos Brown for the payment of which Charles Dent gave his note for three months, the amount being agreed upon through a legal adviser.

The ways of the young men then parted, and although Amos kept alive an anxious solicitude on behalf of his late companion for whom he had long entertained a deep friendship, the two men did not meet or hear of each other for twenty-four years; the note, of course, remained unpaid.

In 1826, Amos received a letter from Charles Dent saying that he had for some time felt anxious to meet his old friend again to talk over old times; he had with considerable difficulty succeeded in locating Amos; he still remembered the feelings of solicitude shown for his best welfare in days long past and wished to know how to obtain an interview with him. This note was responded to by a cordial invitation to visit Amos in his home, which brought by return mail a registered letter from Charles containing a cheque for the amount of the note given twenty-four years before, with the explanation that the Lord had been telling him for some time that all was not right between them and that he must send Amos this cheque; at the present time he did not know what it was for; the circumstances of the closing up of their business affairs were all a blank to him, but the command had been clearly given to send the cheque. Amos having still kept the note, more because it bore the last signature of his friend of earlier days, whom he had so often committed into the hands of Him whom he believed to be able and willing to bring the wanderer home, than for any hope of the note being redeemed, now returned it to Charles as being the only thing for which he could accept the cheque. Another letter soon came from Charles bringing the full interest to date of the note returned, asking forgiveness for all past mistakes and desiring a renewal of the friendship of years ago; he added that the Lord had met him by the way some twelve years before, that he had been endeavoring to follow His leading and was experiencing much true peace in obedience to His requirements; he had been made to give up all those worldly pleasures and amusements he had so delighted in, but through the mercy and loving-kindness of his Redeemer, he felt that the reward far exceeded all the sacrifices made.

Since his surrender to the Master, Charles Dent has been blessed in his business and much of his income is spent for the unfortunate. With the help of a religiously devoted wife, their home-life is such that the motto which hangs on their wall, "The Lord is the head of this house," can be felt to be a realized truth.

Charles Dent at one time related to his friend the way in which he had been led to restore money which he had wrongfully gained in his younger years from the sale of a horse.

Several years after he had turned his face heavenward, he continued to be impressed with the fact that he had wronged the man to whom he had sold the horse and that he must return the overcharge. While he remembered the man's name, he had no idea how or where to find him, so as in all other difficulties of latter days, he asked the Master for His guidance and promised obedience if it should be given. One day he felt that the time had come for him to start out on his search for the man; in setting out he felt that he ought to put fifteen dollars in his pocket above the money needed for current expenses; this he did and awaited directions; he felt that he must take the trolley running from Philadelphia to Media; taking a car on that line he rode on without any further intimation as to where he should go until he reached the edge of Media, where that line crosses another going to Chester; here he felt he must get out at once; the car for Chester coming immediately he was told to get on it; this he did and rode on for several miles without further direction until the car made a change in its course when he felt he must get right off; doing so, he was led to go up the road in the opposite direction; soon he came to a house where he felt he should inquire for the man he was seeking; response was made that the family were strangers there, having just moved in, but they thought the man at the next house could direct him; upon inquiry there he received the answer that the man he was seeking had lately moved out of the house first called at, and he was directed to his present home. Here Charles found the man; time, however, had changed both of them past recognition. Charles asked him if he remembered buying a horse years ago from a young fellow at Winston, to which he quickly responded, "I have good reason to remember that deal for I lost fifteen dollars on it." Upon which Charles took out the money he had felt he should put in his pocket that morning and gave it to the man saying, "Well, here it is. I am that young fellow and the Lord has sent me to bring you your own."

The man was much impressed by the circumstance and wanted Charles to give him a written account of the way he had been brought there, that he might have it for his Bible class as a further proof that the Lord does still lead His children.

Charles returned home with the peaceful assurance that always follows implicit obedience to that Voice which speaks as never man spake.

Truly in this twentieth century as well as in earlier times, the Lord doth guide His children.—F. S.

"No man is weak, who knoweth himself to be supported by God."

LETTERS OF FRANCIS W. PENNELL.

(Continued from page 508.)

BOGOTÁ, Colombia, Tenth Month 27, 1917.

At last I have the quina cuprae bark fairly dry and am shipping it. I find the best arrangement I can make is to send it collect from Barranquilla to New York, prepaid from here to Barranquilla.

Seventh-day last, as projected, a small party of us went to Zipaquirá. There after a picnic-lunch, Señor Osorio, superintendent of the salt-mines, met us and showed us through. We had not only the superintendent, but also one of the chiefs from Bogotá, and could not have been better toured through the mine. It took about two hours. There are about three miles of passages already excavated within the depths of a solid hill of rock-salt. These passages are electric-lighted, and a modern system of tracks and cars is employed. The mines are government property.

I was disappointed in my expectation of beautiful white-walled and roofed passages. The salt-rock is dark, nearly black, but here and there, where moist, would be snow-like deposits of salt, occasionally, even, small hanging white stalactites.

The Birtchets and a small flock of boys from the Colegio went back to Bogotá at 3.30 p. m., and I stayed on at Zipaquirá till this past Fourth-day. Zipaquirá is a town of some size, with a large cathedral and quite a good hotel. I had in the hotel a corner room, with the rare luxury for Colombia of two windows (most of the rooms had no windows). In the evening I could read (having taken books with me) in one or the other of two large parlors, so time passed pleasantly and rapidly enough. The rate for four days was $1.00 per day, cutting in half what I pay here in Bogotá. As soon as funds arrive, if not conflicting with duties, I mean to leave for new fields for botany and cheaper living. It will be for lower warmer lands.

I'm used to the cool here, and find it delightful for tramps. But with these open houses it is difficult to keep warm in the evenings. Here in Bogotá the temperature is practically stationary the year round, never falling to 50° F., and rarely rising to 60° F., a sort of everlasting Spring, only lacking the freshness of Spring, perhaps it's an everlasting Autumn. I think I prefer about ten degrees warmer, probably Esperanza or Pandi. But to return to Zipaquirá.

Of course, each day I tramped out on the mountains, and one day I went to Nemacón, the present terminus of the railroad. But one day, Second-day, proved much the most interesting and is the only one worth giving any account of.

From the open summit of the mountain above Zipaquirá I had, the afternoon before, looked across to the higher slopes and summit of El Chuscal, a mountain of the westernmost of the parallel ridges of the Cordillera Oriental. I wanted to visit this, not only because it looked interesting, but because I had not yet been on this western chain. So Second-day I started from Zipaquirá, over a good trail (road, but not for vehicles), over a lower gap in the chain above Zipaquirá, then for some miles along the valley of the Rio Frio, a small cold rocky mountain creek. At last, after cutting across country through difficult thickets, I reached the base of Chuscal; then up through a difficult thicket, having found no path, aiming for the open grassy slopes. Luckily enough I soon came to a trail, and then all was easy, although steep.

All these mountains are, on their upper slopes, above 3000 and 3100 m., covered only with short grass and small herbs (paramo). After I had climbed the slope, away from the thicket on to the open, I found above a broad valley and stretch of paramo, a mile or more across to the highest point of all. It proved excellent interesting collecting, but the actual summit I did not reach.

What interested me the most was that up at this paramo elevation, above normal tree-line, in little valleys sheltered from the winds by steep slopes, were little islands of forest. And, doubtless because protected one by another, the trees within these were far larger than I had supposed possible, trunks 1½ to 2 feet in diameter and certainly 50 feet high. Because so high and so steadily in the clouds the branches, kept moist, were excellent places for air-plants, and each must have been clothed for nearly a foot thick with green, mostly moss, but with ferns and small orchids abundant. It was all most fascinating, but I had little time here: fortunately it was clear and pleasant. Before I had returned far I saw the cloud low over these slopes, and know had I stayed I should have had fog. Unfortunately enough, I had not taken my camera.

I found the trail back good and direct, had I but known of it going I'd have gained at least an hour of most valuable time. It branched off from the main highway just beyond a little schoolhouse, opposite which I'd obtained specimens of a splendid scarlet parasite, I think of the mistletoe family. The main highway leads on to Pacho, a place evidently of some size and in the forests consequently lower. Cargo after cargo passed me, on oxen, horses and burros, of boards (about six make an ox-load), of skins inflated with what proved to be honey, of many things more, all coming from Pacho. On the way out I fell in with a young Colombian walking to Pacho, and he told me much of the contents of the cargoes met. For such an amount of traffic a railroad spur would seem abundantly worth while.

I rode to Zipaquirá by the Ferrocarril de Norte (strangely enough notices and even the locomotives have the title in English, "Colombian Northern Railroad"), behind a locomotive made by Baldwin's. I rode first-class, $8.85 for about 35 miles, in a car with cane seats. I rode on to Nemacón, 9 miles, for $3.30, first-class. But from Nemacón to Zipaquirá I economized, returning third-class, $1.10, in a car with wooden sideway seats. Third-class is all right if not crowded (as it wasn't at the end of the road). Returning from Zipaquirá to Bogotá I tried second-class, $7.00, normal seats, but of wood. Our train carried 5 to 6 third-class coaches, crowded ($3.30 from Z.-B.), 2 second-class and 1 first-class, abundant room, coaches, so you see proportion and cheapness of travel. If only there were enough railroads I could certainly see Colombia cheaply enough. But horse or cab travel is high. It seemed out of all proportion to have come in from Zipaquirá, 35 miles for $7.00, and then to pay $3.50 for 15 blocks to the hotel, but my huge bundle of specimens made it imperative to get a cab.

Specimens still make and when funds arrive I plan to make a shipment. Zipaquirá was good, but not to the degree of the three days of Sibate. These plants are interesting to collect, but lots of work, and I wonder when they'll ever get named. I hope Rusby tackles the job, for outside of Scrophulariaceae, I've little desire to spend time on them. I am amazed at the number of orchids. Every trip gets something more. I've a quantity of live orchids to send.

(To be concluded.)

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

LOUIS S. GANNETT.

SPIRITUAL?

"That was the first and only time that the spiritual side of the work had been mentioned at all," a Friend wrote after reading a recent article from France in one of the Friends' papers.

It is queer, if it is true, for the spiritual side of the Friends' work, is, after all, the reason for its peculiar success and its peculiar value.

When the American Red Cross does work of agricultural reconstruction, one of its fundamental purposes is to grow more wheat to save food ships for the Allies, and make the transportation of more American troops possible. Inevitably, working on a big scale, it cannot be so much interested in a poor farmer whose wheat is mostly chaff and whose land is divided into infinitesimal parcels. But the Friends come to their work from a different angle. They are more interested in the individual, in renewing his confidence, his faith in life and its possibilities, than in the number of bushels threshed; it makes no difference to them whether he owns one acre or one hundred.

"Perhaps in the things we have been writing," said an answer which went back to the friend in America, "we have not emphasized enough the spiritual side of our work, but there can be very sure that it is very deep and very real. I had a letter the other day from a boy who had just made a prayer in French at the funeral of an old woman, a Protestant, who had lived all her life in a Catholic town, and from the things he didn't say, and some of the things he did say, I had a feeling that he had come very close to the family of that woman. Another boy came in the cross of France. For four months he had been in a little cross-roads village up in the Somme, and he knew every child in the village by name, and from some of the stories he told of their good-bye to him I had a feeling that, although he had slated a lot of roofs and put up a lot of rafters, his friendship with those children had left a more lasting impression in Gruny than all the bricks and slates and boards. A few weeks later we had a letter from another man in Gruny telling how the children were still asking after the man whom they had christened Monsieur Victor—no one knew why. They can feel sure that the children's stories in French will count for more in that story-bookless country than any other stories that your bookseller ever sold you."

The boy who made the prayer in French was working in the construction camp at Ormans, where the men work all day pushing boards through the saw mill and doing work which seems, as far as any work can lack them, to lack spiritual possibilities, yet even there the boys have come into the life of the town and have made themselves a living, vivid part of it. Their Christmas celebration was witness to their friendship with the children of the town, and every such celebration strengthens the links and opens new possibilities.

The boys at Le Glandier who have brought fresh color into the cheeks of the six hundred lonely children refuged there, by teaching them American games, and enlivening their hours on the playground and playing with them, have probably meant more to those children in a spiritual sense than any number of consciously spiritual advisers could have done—and it would never occur to those boys in writing home to speak of their work as "spiritual."

The girl who is living with a dozen old women at Charmont probably doesn't write home about the spiritual side of her work, any more than the women who have cared for little refugees in the children's home at Bettancourt, but anyone who has seen those children, squatted about their low benches for the noon meal, look up and break into smiles when one of the Friends comes in, can guess something of what those women have meant in the children's lives.

There is a boy at Troyes whose job consists in riding about and escorting furniture to refugee families, taking it, in parts, up the narrow stairs, or sending it up by a pulley and in through the window, where the doors are too small. It doesn't sound spiritual, but that one man can tell you the intimate life stories of hundreds of families,—such stories as are told only to a man who is felt to be in a very intimate sense a family friend.

Spiritual? Well, perhaps the letters home don't use that word, but the impelling motive behind all of the Friends' service is a deeply spiritual one.

RULING ON NON-COMBATANT SERVICE.

The recent ruling of the President defining non-combatant service, as the term is used in Section IV of the Selective Service Law, does not practically affect the situation so far as Friends are concerned. The only three general classes of service mentioned are service in the army—namely, the Hospital, Quartermaster and Engineering Corps, which the order states to be military service. Those who might be able conscientiously to accept such service have had the opportunity to enter such forms of service from the beginning. As stated by the recent Five Years' Meeting, "the principles of the Society of Friends require that the non-combatant service to which they are liable under the Selective Service Law be a service that is not a corporate part of the military organization."

The ruling of the President expressly recognizes this position in stating that persons will be assigned to the forms of military service mentioned only "to the extent that such persons are able to accept service as aforesaid without violation of the religious or other conscientious scruples by them in good faith entertained."

The order goes on to state that persons who are unable to accept such non-combatant military service in the army are to be segregated, not punished, and reported to Washington for further directions as to the disposition of them. The exact language of the order is as follows: "On the first day of April, and thereafter monthly, each Division, Camp, or Post Commander shall report to the Adjutant General of the Army, for the information of the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, the names of all persons under their respective commands who profess religious or other conscientious scruples as above described and who have been unwilling to accept, by reason of such scruples, assignment to non-combatant military service as above defined, and as to each such person so reported a brief, comprehensive statement as to the nature of the objection to the acceptance of such non-combatant military service entertained. The Secretary of War will from time to time classify the persons so reported and give further directions as to the disposition of them. Pending such directions from the Secretary of War, all such persons not accepting assignment to non-combatant service shall be segregated as far as practicable and placed under the command of a specially qualified officer of tact and judgment, who will be instructed to impose no punitive hardship of any kind upon them, but not to allow their objections to be made the basis of any favor or consideration beyond exemption from military service which is not extended to any other soldier in the service of the United States."

It thus appears that those who have been segregated for the past several months under a previous order of the War Department, awaiting permission to take up service outside of military control are to be continued in segregated quarters, unpunished, and reported to Washington for early action in their cases. The ruling appears to be the final sifting process, determining those who are really conscientiously opposed to military service. The War Department through its legal advisers has taken the position from the first that the only forms of so-called non-combatant service contemplated by the exemption clause of the Selective Service Law are forms of service in the army. It has taken the view that the provisions of the Selective Service Law are not broad enough to cover those who are conscientiously unable to serve in any part of the army. This class of men, in which, of course, Friends are included, apparently are to be dealt with under authority which the Secretary of War has recently received to permit men to engage in civil occupations. The provision in the order whereby the names of these men are to be reported to Washington the first of each month, it is believed will open the way to their being allowed to enter Reconstruction Work or other forms of work under the American Friends' Service Committee.

Signed,
AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

STRIKING THE LAST BALANCE.—What will your life be when it is finished? When you wind up all your affairs in this world? Blessed will you be if you can look upward and say, "Father, I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do." If you have lived merely for the gratification of sense and self, what an awful review of the past your last moments will reveal! What an awakening when the last day of your life is being finished! One hour would have been enough to have claimed by faith Christ's finished work, to have entered into partnership with Him in this life, and in heirship with Him in the riches of His eternal life.—The Christian Herald.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

GRUNY, First Month 27, 1918.

On Sixth-day, as I was walking along the road, I found a daisy in full bloom and the birds which had been pretty scarce during the cold snap are back again. It is very wonderful how one can set out in this village with a search warrant and find anything wanted. I had been patching up a window and after getting the frame together I had broken out one of the screws because the tongue on the top piece was rotten, so I had to brace it and before I made the brace on the forge at the Agricole Equipe I set out to find some. I had only the vague idea that the Bosches used these on their windows, but I thought their old blacksmithing shop would be a good place to hunt in. I found nothing there, but as I left I determined to hunt through the house opposite which is ruined and deserted and there the first thing I found was a sash made with these braces. I lost no time in taking them off and after putting them on my window frame and planing down the sash a little the thing worked like a charm. We are beginning to get to work on roofs now, and I have begun on the one where Henry Scattergood left me last Autumn, but on the other side where all the tiles and laths are gone for about five metres on the end. I ripped off the sheathing and put in three new rafters yesterday and to-morrow I shall be able to go on with the laths and the tiles and will have it roofed in pretty soon.

The Committee can't be too careful about picking men who should all be sincere C. O.'s, for otherwise there is great danger of arguments and divisions in the different équipes. Anyone with the least suspicion of laziness and selfishness should be left out, we all get selfish and lazy enough over here fighting for our sugar ration, etc. Meanwhile, our work goes on and we are more and more popular with the inhabitants, who are a very decent sort of people. If we are turned out of here, of which there is some danger, we shall go very much regretted by every one. I'd like to tell thee why, but fear the censor would mark it up against me if I went into details. I am afraid I haven't news to retail this week, our happenings are mostly small and our triumphs and successes are such little things, as my cupboard for Mme. Varley and the window I fixed for Mme. Normand, of which I am inordinately proud.

My successes in such things make me feel very strongly the value of college education, for I find I can sit down and study out the problems though I have never been up against them before and of course I can carry out the hints and suggestions of people that are more used to them than I am.

GRUNY, Second Month 3, 1918.

We feel very insecure here, our permits have only been renewed for ten days, and we are awaiting a ruling from headquarters on the advisability of lifting the ban against such organizations as ours, behind the British army. I don't see how it is possible to expect them to do it. This week I finished up Cavenel's roof, except putting an edging board on the end of the house, which means a lot of trimming of tiles and have begun work laying a floor for the Jacquelines. This seems to go all right, but slowly. The weather has been frosty, but not cold, with considerable mist and clouds and no rain, and we are now without rain in our water barrels for the first time since Autumn.

I have heard from Wm. Whitall again, he has continued at his threshing all winter, but they are now beginning to see the end of it. I don't know what kind of work he will be put to after that, but I should think his muscles would be ready for anything. Our work here keeps progressing slowly and houses here and there are made ready for families to move in. The agriculturists have started their tractor ploughing and are making a large impression on the fields.

SECOND MONTH 9, 1918.

You are beginning with Garfield's order to find out that war isn't all "beer and skittles" even for those left at home. There are other nations that have known the same thing for three years now and as for the men in the trenches! ! ! When the Germans were here, the officers would send all the game they shot home to their wives and they bought the chickens from these people whom Hoover was feeding to send back to Germany. I am sitting in my room without a fire, in fact, I have not had one for a week and am very comfortable. Snowdrops are trying to come out and to-day was almost like Springtime at home. But the mud is everywhere.

I have made a mantelpiece out of planks from an underground ammunition dump of the Bosches this week besides finishing the floor at Jacquelines, with which we were very pleased and I believe the inhabitants were, too, they gave us a glass of wine every afternoon, which I prefer to coffee, for I have been rather sleepless lately, but I got a good rest last night in spite of my alarm clock going off at twelve midnight.

I have been breakfast orderly for the last three days and when I was wakened by this infernal machine I thought it was six o'clock, jumped up, put on my slippers and overcoat and made the kitchen fire, started the water for the oatmeal and then went out to our dugout to wake Maxwell Wray. After shaking him hard for several minutes I was recalled to the seriousness of the occasion by Kenneth Cross, who said he hadn't been asleep yet and it couldn't be six, so I went back to look at the clock and to bed, where I slept like a top. The weather has been rather depressing lately.

I find I am much influenced by a cloudy, damp day and then I decide to return to the U. S. A. as soon as my enlistment is up, but days like to-day find me very much more cheerful and willing to put up with a lot and much more inclined to stay on. There doesn't seem to be much hope of peace at present, but the next big offensive by either side may change people's minds all around. We are having a great time with our permits or carnets and the uncertainty as to whether they will be renewed is still very great, they have all been sent in to-day and we shall know, I suppose, in a week what the decision of the British authorities has been. No doubt there has been in the papers that they have taken over this part of the line and we are now subject to their regulations, instead of the French method of taking us for granted. They have rules which would seem to bar us from staying in their military area, let alone their desire to use this house and No. 1, our little cottage at the end of the village. But there are many hopeful signs and of course the French officials want us to be allowed to continue our work and the American Red Cross, which is taking great credit to itself for our work and is supporting us with money—which doesn't mean that we don't need all that Friends can get to us—is trying to keep us where we have been.

SECOND MONTH 10, 1918.

The weather to-day has been milder than ever and though we all fear another cold snap, though not so cold or so prolonged as the last, the back of winter must be pretty well broken. The birds are back and singing away for dear life. They weren't gone very long, but I suppose we must wait for the proverbial swallow before we are sure of summer.

SECOND MONTH 17, 1918.

I have begun repairing another slate roof, which is a very good one, but it is very hard and cramping work. It also is very slow. You must take so much time preparing your ladders for each patch and cutting out the broken slate, together with the nails that hold them from under the good ones, it takes two or three times as long as putting on the new work. That leather coat is a great comfort in work like that, where you are exposed and not getting much exercise. Yesterday it turned cold again and froze and to-day is colder yet. At this time of year though we can look for relief pretty soon, and I expect Spring will be really here in another month.

SECOND MONTH 24, 1918.

Extract from the minutes of the Executive Committee F. W. V. R. C.:—"Chas. Evans read a letter addressed to Ruth Fry by Vincent Nicholson of the Friends' Service Committee, promising a monthly remittance from American Friends of $15,000, from First Month 1st to Sixth Month 30th, for the work in France. The Committee earnestly hope that in consideration of this promised aid and that this sum is in excess of the total monthly estimates of expenditure in France.

So for the present we ought to be pretty well taken care of. This doesn't relieve American Friends of the necessity of raising large sums for the resources of English Friends are being exhausted and it may soon be up to us to support the whole mission. We ought to do this gladly, for without the English this work would be largely impossible—our repairs can hardly go on without them. Our architect is English and the only practical builder here is English and without them and their French we could hardly get along. We couldn't do any masonry or plastering or keep proper accounts of what we do nor could we get along so well with the French people and officials. This makes our present uncertain position very trying—for we expect the British will order all British subjects out of the war zone any day.

Whether we can go on even to finish the work actually begun is very doubtful. Edmund Harvey paid us a surprise visit yesterday, and Kenneth Cross, the architect and I went over the situation as thoroughly as we could. We want to stay on here to finish up and shall certainly try to finish the roofing even if the British go as that is the simplest, but it is cramping. I have been all week on Mme. Varlet's roof, except two days, when I was chopping wood and it is very disagreeable work. You are never in a natural position except when you come down to the ground. I have only got one side three-fourths done and the worst hasn't yet been uncovered. The miserable Bosch repaired the broken slates, etc., by nailing down tar paper through good slates and bad and every nail hole has to be treated as well as all broken slates ripped out and replaced, a most tedious, trying job and hard on the fingers.

We are going to have to surrender all our cameras, but fortunately we have permission to send them to Paris, so that we can get them again and probably the two photos I enclose will be the last I can get for some time.

GRUNY, Third Month 3, 1918.

We are having a return of bad weather—the first was windy and squally, but we finished up the tiles on the Maire's barn on one side in spite of it, it was the first day I had worked on it and it was very good fun tossing the tiles from one to another up to the top of the roof and seeing the covered portion grow and become beautiful with the new, shiny tiles. Yesterday the wind was worse and the thermometer below freezing, so that no work was possible. I went in to Royce to meet Tom Cope and Folger Howell, who have just been despatched to join our group, but they did not arrive on the noon train, so I had my lunch at the Café de la Paix, where Mme. Groet and her family seem very fond of us—waited there all the afternoon playing with her little granddaughter, Gillette, getting French lessons from her and teaching her "Peace porridge hot." Soldiers aren't allowed in cafés between two and six o'clock, so I and the family had the place pretty much to ourselves, and I found it very homelike and a great rest to get absolute change of companions. I went down to the station again about six o'clock and waited for the train from Amiens, which might have brought Tom and Howell if they had failed to make the correct changes en route, but they did not show up so I was reduced to another lonely meal at the Café, filled this time with British Tommies and their tobacco smoke. I wasn't lonely for the two intelligence department men, who have charge of this district, were at the next table taking a lesson from a Frenchman and we threw remarks back and forth as we felt like it. They are very likable fellows, indeed, but we can't see much of them as they and we are too busy.

I expect to be in Paris next week for the meeting of the General Committee and shall have a good talk with Chas. Evans and the other members of the Committee, an opportunity I shall enjoy to the utmost.

I had such a walk home last night against a fierce north wind that I was very glad of the heavy sweater, I wore my leather coat which kept the wind off and was as warm as toast. It was a dark, cloudy night and the moon hadn't risen, but the snow on the ground made things so visible that I took the short cut across fields and was glad to find fresh cart tracks which I could easily follow in the snow. I wish I could be as good about writing as you are to me. I am not like Carleton Macdowell who magnifies the picturesque side of everything and sees an adventure in every old woman who brings him a cup of coffee. He expects some time to write a full history of Gruny, which I could no more do than fly, and he coaxes out of people their story of the German occupation. Day before yesterday he was talking to the Fentry family, for whom he and Kitty Russell are putting on a new slate roof and found out that they left here in 1914 about five hours ahead of the Germans' arrival; Mme. Dulot's house, where I did my first slating, was in flames and they had a rather weary journey, there were eight children and are now nine, were hungry at times and finally reached a place of safety in the Oise, where they lived in the granary (granary) of a very kind and hospitable family, for whom they worked they asked asylum for five days, and stayed three years! They left Mme. Fentry's parents here and found them safe and sound when they returned last Autumn, but not a stick of furniture. Fentry was a prosperous farmer and they seem to be on their feet again, with cows and chickens, a market cart and horses, and I do not suppose they need help to get really prosperous again. There are many people here like that and are a really decent and self-respecting people. I want to talk to the Maire about a couple of families I have on my mind and do something for them if he approves. I hope that the weather begins to improve soon so we can get to work in earnest.

On the 6th we have to set our clocks forward an hour, which will mean getting up in the dark again, a very disagreeable proceeding, but we shall have supper in the daylight in consequence, a very great saving of light and pleasanter than the dark with the shutters all closed.

We had a real American dinner to-day—mutton, hominy and sweet potatoes. I have just been having a talk with the Maire about the more necessitous families here and he has pointed out four or five whom I shall interview with Maxwell Wray's help as to the things they are most in need of and try to get them.

J. H. H.

NEWS ITEM.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE FOR WEEK ENDING THIRD MONTH 30, 1918:

From 22 Meetings	$14,067.47
From 7 Individuals	100.00
For Armenian and Syrian Relief	90.00
For Supplies	79.50

$14,405.97

CHARLES F. JENKINS.

NOTICES.

NORMAN ANGELL will speak at Haverford College on the evening of Fourth Month 10th, at 8 o'clock:

"Political Factors of Allied Success."

WESTTOWN NOTES.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia (FOUR. R. R.), at 6.21, 8.21 A. M., and 2.45, 3.25, 4.55 P. M., other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

MEETINGS from Fourth Month 7th to Fourth Month 13th:—
Burlington Monthly Meeting, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 11, at 10.30 A. M.

Is Your Life Insurance Adequate?

You will need more than $9000 to guarantee to your family a monthly income of fifty dollars for twenty years.

Write for information.

The Provident Life and Trust Co.

Of Philadelphia, Pa.

N. W. Cor. Fourth and Chestnut Sts.

H. F. BRUNER

S. D. HALL

H. F. BRUNER & Co.

COAL

OFFICE AND YARD

16 N. TWENTY-FIRST STREET
PHILADELPHIA

TELEPHONES: Locust 243
Rack 661

A COMPLETE LINE

OF

NURSERY STOCK

FRUIT TREES,

ORNAMENTAL TREES,

SHRUBS,

SMALL FRUITS,

ROSES,

CLEMATIS,

HEDGE PLANTS.

The Rakestraw-Pyle Company

KENNETT SQUARE, PA.

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.

Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

ALBERT C. RIDLEY

1714 SANSON STREET

Engraving and Printing

FINE BUSINESS STATIONERY

Wedding Invitations, Calling Cards, Greeting

Cards, Die Stamped Writing Paper,

TELEPHONE—LOCUST 1782

RESIDENCE: 254 S. 44th St. BELL 'PHONE: Baring 2054X

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor

ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL 'PHONE: Filbert 2666.

Pocono Manor Winter Inn
POCONO MANOR, PA.

SPRINGTIME in the Pocono Mountains is ever a delight to those who admire and study nature. The Birds and Flowers are numerous and varied, and the Trout Fishing in the Swiftwater is wonderful.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Courses for Spring Term, 1918:

"The Teaching of Jesus, History of the Hebrew People, and History of Friends," by Elbert Russell.

"An Introduction to Social Work,"

Frank D. Watson, of Haverford College.

"History of Religion," Jesse H. Holmes, of Swarthmore College.

"History of Foreign Missions," Elihu Grant, of Haverford College.

"Principles of Religious Education,"

Charles H. Fisher, of Pennsylvania State Normal School, Westchester.

Spring Term, Fourth Month 1 to Sixth Month 8, 1918.

Send Applications for information or for admission to

ELBERT RUSSELL, Director,

WOOLMAN SCHOOL

SWARTHMORE, PA.

W. B. WEAVER
UNDERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5th St., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL 'PHONE : ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.

10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERSTON'S SON

902 SPRING GARDEN ST. PHILADELPHIA

Store open until 10:30 A. M. Any other time by appointment only

Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.

ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL 'PHONE

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS,
1655-1917.

By Raymond W. Kelsey.

Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE.

304 Arch Street

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WE don't maintain two shifts here, but we have been known to work 36 hours at a stretch to get hurry-up jobs through on time. We do work night and day when we have to.

THE HOLMES PRESS

J. Linton Engle, Print. 1336 Cherry Street, Phila.

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. Cor. Sixteenth and Race Streets

Special attention given to Friends' Funerals

Bell 'Phone : Spruce 1646

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest Herd in United States

Established 1883

Special attractive prices just now owing to change in business arrangements

HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO

Importers and Breeders

FOR RENT—EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED COTTAGE, bath, open plumbing, hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several mails daily, half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are one or more invalid family members must be taken at Maplewood.

Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES,

Jamestown, R. I.

WANTED—A POSITION IN FRIENDS' SCHOOL, either in upper grades or Junior High School, by an experienced woman teacher, or friend.
Address B, "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—FOR THE ACADEMIC YEAR, 1918-1919, an experienced teacher of Arithmetic for grades three, four, five and six; a friend preferred. Ability to teach French also desirable.
Apply to "SCHOOL", care of "THE FRIEND."

FOR RENT FROM SIXTH MONTH 1 TO NINTH Month 30, 1918, furnished home on Haverford College campus. Nine rooms, two halls, garage.
R. W. KELSEY, HAVERFORD, PA.

FRIENDS' SCHOOL, AT ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. I will need three experienced teachers for year 1918-19 for seventh and eighth grades, fourth and fifth grades, and kindergarten. Apply to Principal, HELEN L. FORSYTHE.

WANTED—GOVERNESS FOR THREE CHILDREN, two-and-a-half, four and six years old. Permanent position for a person of education and ability. Answer by letter to Livingston E. Jones, Wissahickon Avenue, Germantown, Pa.

WANTED—A POSITION AS GOVERNESS AND mother's helper in a family of refinement.
Address V, "THE FRIEND,"
207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—BY ONE OF EXPERIENCE, A POSITION as companion nurse for invalid.
Address B, Box 308,
Haverford, Penna.

SCHOOL PRINCIPAL WANTED AT FRIENDS' Academy, a boarding and day school for boys and girls, located at Locust Valley, Long Island, N. Y. A married man, who is a member of the Society of Friends, preferred. For particulars address FREDERICK E. WELLS, Pleasant Glen Cove, N. Y.

WANTED—MIDDLE-AGED FARMER (FRIEND) of education and wide experience in his line desires position as manager of large farm or country estate.
DAVID HOFFMAN, FRANCESKI Island, R. I.

A YOUNG FRIEND WITH SOME EXPERIENCE IN Bookkeeping and office work desires clerical position.
Address MEROGVAL FURNACE
Y. M. C. A., 32nd and SHADON Streets.

FOR RENT—OCEAN CITY, N. J. LARGE furnished Cottage for seven and eighth months. Five chambers. All conveniences. Garage.
W. H. HAROLD TOMLINSON,
114 Yale Avenue, Swarthmore, Pa.

Belt Satisfaction

A MICHIGAN corporation is well pleased with the 38-inch 3-ply Rhoads Belt shown above. They also have a 20-inch double that has been pronounced by several men the straightest running belt they ever saw.

You can save stops and reduce your belt trouble by using Rhoads Tannate Lace Leather. Such stops cost more than the lace. Tannate outlasts rawhide from two to five times.

J. E. RHODS & SONS

PHILADELPHIA: 12 N. THIRD ST.
NEW YORK: 102 BEEKMAN ST.
CHICAGO: 322 W. RANDOLPH ST.
BALTIMORE AGENCY: 37 S. CHARLES ST.
FACTORY AND TANNERY, WILMINGTON, DEL.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. PHILA.

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST.

We recommend the use of
RAG FEATHERWEIGHT

(Antique Finish)

As the paper for high-grade Books and other Publications

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

ALFRED C. HAINES
Building Glass and Paints
56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.
CONTRACTORS AND BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Letchworth Cottage
Spring Lake Beach, N. J.

Open for the Season 1918

A. C. & S. H. Letchworth

Established 1870 in Both Places

Frank W. Taylor & Son

*Roofers in Tin, Tile, Slate,
Copper and Slag,
Manufacturers of Ranges
and Furnaces*

FURNACES, RANGES & HOT WATER SYSTEMS
installed and cared for by expert mechanics

259 S. FOURTH ST., PHILADELPHIA

Genealogist

Elizabeth B. Satterthwaite
42 N. Blockley St., Truxton, N. J.

If you are interested in Government Bonds
Foreign Government Bonds
Railroad Bonds
Municipal Bonds
Public Utility Bonds
Industrial Bonds, or Short Term Notes

the facilities and assistance of our various departments, each specializing in one class of securities, are at your command.

When requesting offerings or information
please mention PF-157.

The National City
Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.
Telephone—555 Locust
Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

482 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE
PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET
PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FOURTH MONTH 11, 1918.

No. 41.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSTYHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
 DAVIS H. FORSTYHE,
 MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

THE APPEAL TO CÆSAR.

A young Friend detained as a C. O. in a large cantonment in the East remarked in conversation recently, that the opposition to him and his views among his fellows most frequently took the form of an appeal to that declaration of our Lord which Luke records in the twentieth chapter.

The picture, we will recall, is this—Jesus had come into the temple and there had flocked about Him, as so often happened, a crowd of eager listeners, when the chief priests and scribes came upon Him with their cunning questions.

On this occasion there were four questions put to Him so far as recorded, and they included the one my young friend said was so often addressed to him.

Were we reading the twentieth chapter of Luke simply from the standpoint of one who recognized in it the well-arranged rejoinder to a crafty company of men, we would find in the answers a full measure of satisfaction, how much fuller in measure must be the message as it comes to this twentieth century youth, whose lot temporarily is cast in the company of men, who but a few months ago would have seemed of the same class with himself, but who to-day fail to interpret as he does this message that was delivered so long ago to the high priests and their company in the temple at Jerusalem.

Our present interest centers in the second of the four questions put to our Lord. Introduced by a word of fawning flattery, the high priests asked Him—"Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar or not?" He gave the very answer they wished to have. Had they been allowed to cast the mould for the words He uttered they would not have had it different. "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's." That is as far as that company of men took note of what was said. It was tribute money they were speaking of and they had the message they wished for from this strange Teacher who had appeared among them, and whose life and teachings were already working great wonders upon the people.

How often in Christ's lessons do we find that He seems to satisfy the hopes of his questioners, while His real intent would be to lift them up to a higher level of thought and purpose, so on this occasion, He had granted their contention that the taxes should be met when the right to levy them had been admitted, but He adds, there are higher obligations than these of tribute money; God demands a surrender in full to His will, and to know this will and to do it is man's supreme duty.

It ill becomes us at any time (least so now) to sit in judgment on the findings of other men's consciences, but it is supremely important for us to know our own.

Good citizenship is demanded of every individual who claims allegiance to a state. No private claim can stand in the way of this service. It must be full, faithful and free, but it has its limits, or when the question was put to our Master, He would not have added to the answer He gave to the high priests, "but render unto God the things that are God's."

The young man who reads clear through this message and sees his highest duty in this service to God may find no place for questioning the actions of others, but he will stand like a rock to the position he has assumed for himself.

Such as are in whole loyal to God will in the end be true promoters of the interests of state, and will achieve the greater service in the advancement of its best interests.

Religious liberty and all forms of broad toleration had their origin in a spirit of this kind, and what growth they have experienced with the passing generations of men has been due to the same kind of steadfast faithfulness.

D. H. F.

A STATEMENT BY PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS, THIRD MONTH 29, 1918.

This decisive hour of history summons our Society to make its utmost contribution to humanity's deepest needs. Believing that this requires us to meet the moral and spiritual issues of the times simply and fearlessly, we feel called to make clear our Christian faith as applied to war.

Our Society's opposition to all war as un-Christian has been maintained throughout its history. In 1660 our forefathers declared:

"We utterly deny all outward wars and strife, and fightings with outward weapons, for any end, or under any pretense whatever; this is our testimony to the whole world. The Spirit of Christ by which we are guided is not changeable, so as once to command us from a thing as evil and again to move unto it; and we certainly know, and testify to the world, that the Spirit of Christ, which leads us into all truth, will never move us to fight and war against any man with outward weapons, neither for the Kingdom of Christ, nor for the kingdoms of this world."

These convictions have been re-affirmed by Friends in all generations and during the present war our Yearly Meetings throughout the world have given clear evidence that they are steadfast to the same principles.

The basis of our opposition to war is much more than any single command of the Old or the New Testament. It is our faith that the way of love by which our Master, Jesus Christ, met and conquered evil, remains for His followers to-day the true method of combatting wrong. For us, as for Him, this involves refusal to use means which, like war, violate love and defeat its ends; but it does not mean a weak neutrality toward evil. For us, as for Him, it means a life of action devoted to the heroic purpose of overcoming evil with good. The unspeakable sufferings of humanity are now calling us and all men to larger sacrifices and more earnest endeavors to put this faith into practice. To such endeavors we dedicate ourselves.

1918 COPY RIGHTS COOPER

In accordance with this faith, we desire to maintain all our relationships to-day.

To our beloved country, we affirm the deep loyalty of grateful hearts. We long to help her realize her noblest capacities as a great Republic dedicated to liberty and democracy. But we believe that we best serve our country and all humanity when we maintain that religion and conscience are superior even to the State.

To President Wilson, we declare our appreciation of his steadfast and courageous efforts to keep the aims of the United States in this great conflict liberal, disinterested and righteous.

To our fellow-countrymen, who are following the leadings of conscience into ways where we cannot be their comrades, we give assurance of respect and sympathy in all that they endure. Finally,

For all men, whether they be called our enemies or not, we pray that the sacrificial love of Christ, stirring us to repentance, may reconcile and unite all mankind in the brotherhood of His spirit.

THRESHING ONE THOUSAND TONS OF WHEAT FOR THE WAR VICTIMS OF FRANCE.

The bare statement that the American Quaker workers have threshed almost one thousand tons of wheat, barley or oats since they arrived at Sermaize, in the Marne, last autumn, may not at first carry its full weight with those accustomed to the large methods of the West. It is necessary to understand the organization of French agricultural life to understand how much hard work it has entailed.

Nothing could be less alike than French and American agricultural conditions. America is the home, par excellence, of the large farmer. In France peasant proprietorship is driven to its logical and exasperating conclusion.

One must begin by trying to picture a typical French village before the war; "communes," they are called, though anything less communal it would be difficult to imagine. A village consisted chiefly of twenty or thirty cultivators who have their holdings in the adjacent land a mile or two around. In addition to these cultivators were only a grocer and a general store, and a few skilled workmen, such as a wheelwright, a leather merchant, a blacksmith, etc., the officials of the Mairie, the Curé, a couple of wine merchants, perhaps, and one or two cafés.

But this small unit was as far as possible self-contained and self-supporting; it may even have spoken a slightly different "patois" or dialect from that of its neighbors. It went occasionally to the nearest town to buy agricultural machinery, stocks of groceries or the more important purchases, but as far as possible it got everything within its own boundaries.

And just as it was the ambition of every commune to be independent, so was it the ambition of every individual inhabitant. Law and history combined to make his acres few and subdivided; cultivator often owned thirty or forty strips of land several kilometres apart and amounting in all to some twenty acres, which he cultivated intensely for himself and his family. He had his own barn (he rarely made stacks in the field), his own mowing machine, his own binder, drill, horse rake, rollers, etc., and even his own threshing machine or "triptouse," a horse-driven machine, working on an inclined plane, somewhat in the manner of a tread-mill, and for one or two horses.

The waste of labor can be pictured. As far as possible, nobody did anything for anybody else or expected anybody to do anything for him. French temperament is vivacious in the extreme and all the houses are huddled together, so that the population filled up any emptiness in their existence by violent political quarrels and village cliques. In many ways they led a contented life. Owners of their own soil, they were not burdened with rent; they were thrifty, and their needs were small. The commune provided them for practically nothing, with fuel and other materials. In fact, if you did not look too deep, the picture seemed almost ideal.

It is not difficult to imagine the ruin war would bring to this egotistical, conservative, unenterprising community. Their barns, their houses, the greater part of their machines, were destroyed. Their independence was shattered, and they had nothing to put in its place. The spirit of co-operation was lacking, and the means of fending for themselves were gone. This is what makes so hard the work of agricultural relief in France. Nevertheless, each individual cultivator has worked tremendously to right himself, and some are even learning the advantages of co-operation. With this foreword we will now try to picture the life of a Friends' Mission threshing during the autumn and winter months.

Some harvesting machines were not burned, and the richer farmers have bought new ones. The Missions have given or lent a good many others; and old men, women and children aided by occasional soldiers on leave or on "repos," have managed to get back into cultivation a considerable portion of the land.

As the autumn approaches it is necessary to decide to what villages it is best to send our "batteuses" (threshing machines). This is not very difficult; those that have suffered most from the war naturally come first, and our work during the harvest has given us in some cases a detailed knowledge of the inhabitants of many communes. The Mayor is asked to draw up a list of the sinistrés (i. e., persons whose worldly goods have been burned in the war) who wish to use one of our machines; and after a short interval has elapsed some sort of list arrives, though it usually undergoes many alterations before the end of the season. Then, as soon as may be, our "batteuse" grumbles off with its equipment of two workers, one to look after the engine and one to "engrain" or feed the sheaves into the machine. The "batteuse" is of small force, the engine not having more than seven horse power. Larger ones cannot well be moved through the swampy fields or into small barns, and to be worked efficiently, need more labor than the village can usually supply.

The village where the American workers arrive may be an old friend, where the mission is already known and has inspired a certain measure of confidence; or it may be one where we have not worked before. In this case the most pessimistic views as to ultimate success may well be held. The French share to the full the usual contempt for foreigners, though to do them justice they despise themselves almost as much, and their extreme critical faculty sometimes degenerated into a more unintelligent suspicion of anything strange. The success of weeks may well depend on getting a good start, which, as our "batteuses" are mostly old creaks, is always rather problematical. Should the bottom of the water tank fall out, the magneto fail to spark, or a lot of water be found in the gasoline (which is nobody's fault), our reputation will be gone forever.

But we will assume that everything is to go well. A room in the village has been procured in advance, with any luck a bed for each person; or it may be that our workers will pitch their camp beds with French soldiers, in a barn-loft, or in the stables over the horses.

In any case it will be fairly uncomfortable or frightfully cold, though there is the consolation of knowing that one is living as the French live. Or one may have the luck to drop into a gigantic French bed—huge, deep, soft and warm, the most comfortable thing in the world. Bed comes soon after the nightfall, and one gets up just before dawn. It is probably either pouring rain or freezing cold, the wind driving unimpeded through the broken rafters. Our fellows stumble into their clothes, decide to put off washing till later, and tramp through the village to take breakfast with the people for whom they are threshing. We have our meals with the family, who also pay the price of the gasoline, grease, etc., which now amounts to about a franc a litre, bringing the average cost up to about sixteen francs a day, excluding food. The machine and our labor are free.

A company of six or seven people have assembled, two or three men, as nearly able-bodied as the village can produce, two German prisoners, perhaps, or French soldiers "en repos," two girls to do the lighter work, and an old Trojan woman over sixty, whose heart never fails and whose spirit never flags. Bowls of coffee and milk (made as only the French can) with two or three hunks of toast are produced.

Breakfast takes but a few minutes, and soon our friends are tramping once more through the frozen slush towards the machine. It is probably about half-past seven. It is difficult to believe that one can ever be warm. The same doubt afflicts the engine, which will not start for some minutes, to the evident contempt of the French members of the party. But nothing gets the blood circulating like continued cranking, and eventually, with a groan and a gasp, the engine gets under way. One of the Americans leaps up to "engrain," the other stays down to look after the engine and tend the rapidly-filling sacks. The forks work in unison; the hoteleurs (those who tie the straw into sheaves), labor and sweat, the bags fill up, the sheaves swish through and the engines pound on in delightful harmony. From the deepest misery spirits rise to bursting point. It is the most delightful part of the day. The first flush of enthusiasm has not given way to incipient exhaustion and the air is not yet thick with floating dust. The first halt is from nine-thirty to ten for the "petit goûter." The engine is stopped, and everyone settles down to eat. Large slices of bread and cheese are greedily devoured, with occasional slices of sausage.

Then everyone takes his place as before and works away till lunch time. If we are threshing out without too many weeds and thistles, and all goes well otherwise, twenty-five sacks weighing about seventy kilograms (one hundred and fifty-four pounds) each ought to be lined up along the edge of the barn, when in good mood, everyone trudges back to lunch. A huge pot is boiling in the open chimney. Everybody is too hungry to talk. "Soupe au lard" or "soupe au chou" is handed around and swallowed as noisily and greedily as possible. After this some square pieces of salt pork are produced out of the same bowl, and then again, a dish of boiled vegetables, potatoes, carrots, leeks and turnips.

The first agonies of hunger are now appeased, and the host starts the conversational ball rolling. The iniquity and stupidity of the French Government is explained; the slackness of the local authorities is commented upon; the villainy of the Mayor is exposed; and the character of everybody else in the village is treated with great wealth of expression and in tremendous detail. Society is seen to be seething with corruption from top to bottom. Some unintelligent person with a zest for information asks how it is that American and English understand each other, and linguistic questions are discussed. This leads the conversation back to politics, and the motives behind America's entry into the war are ruthlessly examined. The bread and Camembert stage has been reached. Coffee and sugar (in large quantities) are produced. Spirits have now mounted high. Our fellows are asked if they are married; if not, if they are engaged; if not, they are told that the charming mademoiselle opposite will be only too glad to marry anybody. Mademoiselle blushes and remarks, "Penses-tu?" ("Do you think so?")—amid general laughter.

By now it is half-past one, and a return is made to the "battuse." The weather is warmer; the engine starts without its usual coquetishness; the work swings along till about three-fifteen, when it is necessary to "casser le crouté," a repetition of the "petit goûter." Then once more to work till it is too dark to continue. With luck, perhaps, the twenty-five sacks have been increased to fifty; the engine is locked up and the barn closed until the next morning.

Our workers go back to their loft and heroically wash in icy cold water to scrub away the layers of dust settled on every available inch. A little freshened, and now feeling permanently tired, they go around to dinner.

Everybody also has already arrived, not having felt a wash indispensable. Once more they proceed to soupe au lard, pork, vegetables, bread, Camembert and coffee. The conversation pursues its normal course, a little less vivacious, perhaps, than at lunch time. Shortly after the party breaks up; the company is abed by eight, to sleep like a log till six the next morning, when another identical day begins. Food and sleep are the chief concerns of a thresher's life.

On an average, after three days such as that described, the cultivator's crop is finished and a move made to another barn at the extreme other end of the village. Are any of our present group of laborers accompanying us? Good gracious, no! No one can work for Monsieur So-and-so. He is much too stingy. You never get enough to eat; you don't get a decent wage and never get paid what you are offered. He is much too "chien" (good-for-nothing). You won't like him a bit. He has never done anything for anybody, so naturally nobody does anything for him. This information is not very alarming; it has been heard so often before, and there is no reason to suppose that Monsieur So-and-so is not a perfectly amiable person. But it is a case of "au revoir" for the moment and a general handshake all around, with a passing gallantry to mademoiselle for the gratification of herself and the company.

After two months, threshing in the village will have been finished, and our workers will pack up their traps and be off to a foreign country some three kilometres distant, where they will dig themselves in once more.

Such is the life of the thresher with most of the irritation left out; the irritation of coughs and colds caught from the dust; the irritation of people who will not work together, who put you off at the last moment, who will not lend their horses, who have no sacks; the irritation of cold, rain and snow, of bad gasoline and continued repairs, of losses, of breakage and thefts.

But the brighter picture is the truer one, and the thresher carries away with him a wealth of memories that he will not easily forget.

FRANCIS BIRRELL.

EXTRACTS FROM HOME LETTERS, SECOND MONTH 26TH TO THIRD MONTH 5TH.

CHATEAU HACHETTE.

At last something seems to be about to change my position here as steadfast custodian of the whitewash brush and pocket-knife—used to pull paper off the wall. This afternoon brought a telephone message saying that I was to proceed to Paris to-morrow temporarily for the day, to see about equipment to go out to G.

PARIS.

I wrote to you last night but here goes again. I have spent two sugarless, butterless, almost breadless happy days here, despite all the packing I have had to do. Dinner last night with Charles Evans was most delightful.

Paris has undergone yet another change or rather a few more. There are more gendarmes than ever of all sorts of special kinds and uniforms. Saccharine is very much in vogue, and you see sugar in the hotel life nowhere. I haven't seen any butter either and the Pâtisseries are completely closed. It is, of course, all of it quite right and just, for it gives that much more to those who really need it. It is the first time I have noticed any stringency to speak of since I have been over here (early last Summer), and I have yet to feel or suffer from it of course. According to the evening papers the German offensive so long waited for has at last broken loose. One wonders whether this is the real thing, though.

EN ROUTE.

This is one of those delightful little French hotels. . . .

The explanation is that we got about half way out and found that a de notre correspondance had been suppressed so we have all to-day and all to-morrow and even to-morrow night to fool away. Fortunately I have my books. . . . But it is snowing, not hard, but piercingly, and the wind rips the dun-colored river mercilessly—and incidentally pierces our overcoats, uniforms and sweaters. . . . I am hoping to-morrow may ameliorate the weather and then I may go in search of churches and other points of interest. . . . I would of course tell you where I was if I thought it were allowed.

At last I am out. The train got balked not far, but too far to walk from our destination, by the locomotive's splitting a switch while shunting cars and digging its wheels into the ties. So we waited there for a good long while. A muddy, misty, three-mile walk. The mud is not only everlasting, but also persistent. Work for me, who am to be a brick mason, for the present is held up for the moment on account of mortar without lime being thought insufficient, although if ever they could persuade some of this mud to dry I am sure it would make excellent mortar. So this afternoon I turned my hand to a species of rough carpentering, and have evolved a cross between a desk and a table and a cupboard and a bookcase. It keeps everything I own. . . .

Everybody delightful and all of the best.
T. P. COPE, JR.

WHAT GOES ON AT 20 S. TWELFTH STREET?

Every business day more than one hundred letters from all parts of this country and from abroad make their welcome arrival at our office. Every day we send out an average of more than two hundred letters. Many times we have been asked the question, "What goes on at 20 South Twelfth Street?" We know considerable about the work at Gruney, Sermaize, Ormans, Buzuluk, but we know almost nothing of the place where all our letters concerning Friends' Service are received, answered and filed. We at the office have felt that any description of our work would be a misuse of time and space, with so much of thrilling interest being done on the field, which is the objective of all of our efforts. Perhaps this brief statement, however, may be appreciated. We are greatly helped by special reports which come to us from Local Service Committees. We wish there were more of them,—for our own use and to pass on to others. In like manner this information as to the routine work of our office may be of interest to Friends in local communities.

In the first place we are twelve in number. Six of us are secretaries, four are stenographers and two are clerks. Only ten are regularly at 20 South Twelfth Street, since one secretary wanders around over the field and one is in charge of the store-room at Fifteenth and Cherry Streets. There are many others who do not work regularly, but assist frequently in extra work both at the office and at the store-room. In fact, there are always extra workers at the store-room. Members of the Unit during their brief stay in Philadelphia en route to France render valiant service in the heavier tasks of the shipping department.

"What are the three hundred letters a day about," we are asked. We must leave much of it to your imagination. A typical morning's mail will contain many remittances of funds; requests for Friends' Service emblems, literature, patterns and other supplies, requests from local committees or sewing clubs for information on a score of matters; bills of lading and express receipts and sewing club reports of shipments; newspaper clippings from our Clipping Bureau; correspondence concerning membership in the Reconstruction Unit in all of the ten or twelve stages of that devious and difficult journey between an American farm and a shattered French village; pages upon pages of reports from abroad; letters from Friends in camp or about to be ordered to camp; bills and invoices ranging all the way from paper clips to a thousand blankets; letters from affiliated or unrelated organizations, such as the Red Cross, Mennonites, Brethren, other war-relief agencies, the War Department, etc. Appearing frequently in this regular routine will be cables from France, Russia and England, telegrams concerning special difficulties in camps or with Draft Boards; correspondence concerning Henry Scattergood's lectures; reports from Paul Furnas and from the Yearly Meeting Service Committees,—but you have grown tired in the reading, if indeed you have persevered thus far.

We are in touch through our own correspondence with a thousand communities of Friends representing over a hundred thousand persons and maintain a more constant contact with about five hundred communities that are organized for our work. Over three hundred communities are regularly engaged in sewing and knitting for Friends' Service. There are about a hundred Friends who are segregated as conscientious objectors in camps and several hundred others have taken up draft problems with us. The duties connected with maintaining abroad over one hundred and fifty workers and with sending three hundred more are, of course, the most numerous and complex.

The active period of sewing and knitting work has been during the past four months. During that time we have shipped abroad 120 large cases of clothing, containing over 25,000 separate garments. The Clothing Department now receives each week an average of about sixty packages or boxes from communities scattered through about half the States of the country.

Other supplies to be used or distributed by the Unit have amounted to many hundred cases,—ranging all the way from small cases of drugs to auto trucks, tractors, and threshing machines.

In addition to the first class matter, we have issued more than twenty bulletins, ranging from four to twelve pages, and in editions of three to forty thousand. These have totalled more than 150,000 copies and more than 800,000 pages. Only a few of these have gone to every family. Five of them have been solely for drafted Friends, and in many cases only one or a few were sent to a meeting. In addition to this literature, other supplies such as Friends' Service buttons, pledge-cards, patterns, etc., have been distributed totalling over 60,000.

One pleasant part of the work has been this task of filling an average of about twelve pages each week in the various Friends' papers.

Contributors naturally wonder what proportion of our funds goes into the overhead or administration expenses mentioned above. The heaviest item of expense is printing and postage, owing to the large donations of personal service, office and store-room space and supplies, the Secretaries receiving only enough to cover their expenses. These overhead expenses have been less than three per cent. of receipts and less than five per cent. of expenditures. We have spent much less upon administration expenses than many Friends throughout the country have urged us to spend. We have been gratified and encouraged by considerable comment from persons acquainted with the budgets of other similar enterprises to the effect that our overhead expense is phenomenally low.

Office and store-room facilities worth a rental of several hundred dollars a month have been donated. Modern office furniture of about $500 value has also been donated. A score of Friends in Philadelphia volunteer their services for any department of our work upon a telephone notice and for almost any length of time. Friends throughout the country should thus not hesitate to write us for fear of burdening the office with too much work. With every little proportional increase of expense we can increase our points of contact with local communities to any point necessary for efficient, co-operative work.

Many complaints of inadequate attention at our office to communications are entirely valid as applied to last Summer and early Fall. They are not valid as applied to the present, however. During the early stages of the work it increased more rapidly than we were able to develop a staff and an organization to handle it. We could not afford to neglect the opening up of the work in France nor the training and sending of the first Unit, since so much of all our future work depended upon this and these matters were forced to receive precedence. Even at that time the only delay was in the acknowledgment of applications for the Unit.

At the present, however, with an adequate number of workers and a more highly developed organization no phase of the work is subject to undue delay—except, of course, the receipt of supplies from our manufacturers and the obtaining of permits for passports from Draft Boards. These matters are governed by tides far beyond our control. All communications, excepting letters of recommendation for applicants, and excepting letters completely closing a matter, are promptly acknowledged. We have been greatly concerned over some rumors to the contrary, and thus we ask all readers of this statement to explain, if occasion may arise, that such complaints are applicable only to the earlier period of the work when we could not promptly acknowledge all applications for the Unit.

Next week we shall publish an account of the task of getting a man off to France and keeping him there. The U. S. War Department, the American Red Cross, the French Steamship Line, the French Government, the British Army, the English Friends' Expedition—all of these must be dealt with until we are enveloped in a maze of red-tape and engulfed by a flood of papers.

V. D. N.

REPORT OF SOCIAL ORDER COMMITTEE.

To Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends:

The Committee appointed by the last Yearly Meeting "to consider the part which the Religious Society of Friends should take in the present day application of efforts to promote the Kingdom of God on earth, particularly as it relates to social, political and industrial conditions," has held twelve meetings during the year.

The first five meetings were devoted to a consideration of what the aims of the Committee should be and the best method of procedure in the work to be undertaken. In order to obtain the ideas of individual members of the Committee, groups were appointed to discuss at successive meetings different aspects of the social and industrial order and to give opinions regarding the practical steps toward improving present conditions which could be recommended to the Yearly Meeting.

During this preliminary period, sets of books on social and industrial problems were distributed to nineteen Monthly Meetings and a letter was addressed by the Social Order Committee to the Young People's Conference at Westtown.

In the Tenth Month a two days' conference of the committee was held. At this meeting it was decided to divide the Committee into groups according to their special interests—these groups to associate with themselves those not members of the Committee with a view to the co-operation of larger numbers of the Yearly Meeting in our efforts to discover right principles of action. These groups are as follows:—

1. Business Problems Group.
2. Farmers' Group.
3. Household Problems Group.
4. Property Group.

An Extension Committee was appointed to carry on educational work by means of lectures, study classes, etc.

So far, the Farmers' Group has been most active, having held five meetings at which papers were read and discussed on such subjects as the Character of Farm Laborers; Neighborly Good-will; Extension Work in Agriculture, Domestic Science and Hygiene; the Rural School and Church, the Rural Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., Methods of Marketing, Co-operative Associations, etc.

The Household Problems Group has held two meetings.

Its expectation is to take up the various problems of household and personal expenditures by obtaining, if possible, itemized budgets from housekeepers; to discuss hours and wages of household employees; the responsibilities of consumers and the proper channels for philanthropic effort. This group is planning a conference to discuss these subjects, to which all Friends will be invited.

The Business Problems Group has organized and aims to include in its membership representatives from businesses controlled by members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. It has as its concern all relations between employers and employees in industry—such as problems involved in the democratization of business, welfare work for employees, the establishment of co-operation instead of competition, etc.

The Property Group has for its field problems that involve the right and responsibility of surplus income, the moral obligation of investors, and other problems related to the acquisition and use of property.

Under the auspices of the Extension Committee, meetings on aspects of the social order have been held at West Grove, Moorestown, Philadelphia, West Chester, Lansdowne, Germantown, Haddonfield, Media and Wilmington. Several study circles have been encouraged and one or two groups outside our membership have been addressed by individual members of the Committee.

Through the interest of Isaac Sharpless, Dean of the T. Wistar Brown Graduate School, the benefit of a course of lectures on social and industrial problems was offered the Committee. These lectures have been given once a week at Friends' Institute by Bruno Lasker, an editor of The Survey. Members of the Graduate School as well as of the Social Order Committee attended the course.

A message from the Social Order Committee has been carefully prepared and distributed throughout the Yearly Meeting.

As we have thus made a beginning in our deliberations and undertakings, with an earnest desire for Higher Guidance, the possibilities of the future usefulness of such a committee seem to widen and enlarge. We therefore recommend that a committee be appointed to continue the work under a three-year tenure of office.

When the early Friends were gathered into a conscious group they were not professors of a certain creed or preachers of a particular doctrine, but they were men and women who had experienced the realities of religion. They had known the presence of God, they had followed the leadership of Christ, they had heard the voices of the Spirit. They knew that there was a world lying in wickedness and darkness and that they had been called out of it into Christ's marvelous light. In their conduct of life, both among themselves and in the community about them, they rejected many of the customs of society, the ways of the world, and developed a manner of living according to the leadings of the spirit and the clear teachings of the New Testament.

By the time the Society had been gathered for a generation they had established among themselves a very distinct social order. It is fairly familiar to us all, but we would bring to mind a few of its features. It recognized the essential equality of all the members of the group, both in religious and social matters, and the responsibility of the group for each of the individual members. No one was to be in want, even when 4000 of their working members were in prison. Suitable conditions of living were to be enjoyed by all and every child was to receive a sufficient education and be brought up under conditions favorable to a spiritual life. They practiced a business integrity founded on justice and quite above common custom or the requirements of the law.

For reasons as much from without as within, Friends were for a long time content to try to hold themselves up to their own ideals. In their relations with others they were generally kindly and helpful, and in public benevolences they were often leaders. But in general they followed the tradition which John Dewey says has fostered the tendency to locate morals in personal relations rather than in the control of social situations.

With a notable exception in the matter of slavery and some effort toward other reforms, our Society has accepted the world order as it has developed, seemingly unconscious of any sense of responsibility for the crushing burdens of poverty, ignorance and disease to which that order has condemned so large a proportion of our fellows at the same time that it has brought comfortable circumstances to most of us and heaped vast wealth on a few. Economists tell us that in this country one per cent. of the population has a larger income without working than fifty per cent. at the other end of the social scale secures by its labor; that on the average, ten per cent. to twenty per cent. of the families in this country have less income than is necessary to meet the minimum requirements of even small families for the necessities of life with proper provision for childhood, old age and sickness. These maladjustments and inequities in the distribution of wealth find their expression in the deplorable conditions of our city slums, childhood condemned to monotonous labor at too early an age, and without proper education for the duties of life, in wasteful and soul-destroying friction often approximating real war, between workers and employers, and in many other ways. Have we not, both as individuals and as a society a full share of responsibility for these conditions, no matter how blameless according to current standards our personal relations may be?

(To be concluded.)

IF WE ONLY UNDERSTOOD.

If we knew the cares and trials,
Knew the efforts all in vain,
And the bitter disappointment,
Understood the loss and gain—
Would the grim eternal roughness
Seem—I wonder—just the same?
Should we help where now we hinder?
Should we pity where we blame?

Ah! we judge each other harshly,
Knowing not life's hidden force:
Knowing not the fount of action
Is less turbid at its source;
Seeing not amid the evil
All the golden grains of good;
And we'd love each other better
If we only understood.

Could we judge all deeds by motives
That surround each other's lives,
See the naked heart and spirit,
Know what spur the action gives,
Often we should find it better,
Purer than we judge we should,
We should love each other better
If we only understood.

—RUDYARD KIPLING.

FRIENDS COURT-MARTIALED.

Albert W. Nissen (Newcastle P. M.), in course of his court-martial statement at Whitley Bay on the 26th ult., said:—

"My refusal to bear arms or in any way assist in the prosecution of the war, directly or indirectly, is based on the fact that I am and have been a conscientious objector to military service for a period of eighteen or nineteen years. About seventeen years ago I was accepted as a member of the Society of Friends, one of whose basic principles is, 'to bear witness against all war,' and in other ways to work for peace and international brotherhood. In taking my present stand I am absolutely convinced that I am acting in the highest interests of mankind, and that I am in spirit and in truth following the dictates and example of the author of Christianity. The acceptance and living in this spirit of love as taught by Christ is to my mind the only way in which to eliminate war and hatred from the human heart."—The Friend (London).

THE GERMAN DRIVE AND FRIENDS' WORK.

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD.

Friends will be interested to learn that the recent German offensive has not greatly affected Friends' work. Our work in this Somme region was the newest and smallest part of our work in France. Because of the military operations and because of larger opportunities elsewhere we had been expecting to have to transfer all of our workers from this region and plans had been made with this prospect in view. Recent letters from Charles Evans, written before the German drive, stated that the important development for Friends would probably be in the region of the Marne. In a part of this region where almost no reconstruction work has yet been undertaken, Friends have been asked by the French authorities to assume entire charge of the work. This region lies considerably to the east of the present offensive, and because of its lack of strategic value has been the scene of almost no important military operations since the failure of the big swing toward Paris in the fall of 1914.

The work we have done during the past winter in the region now re-invaded can in no sense be considered as lost. The people had to live somewhere and it was a choice between our temporary, portable houses and cellars, piles of ruins or the frightfully-congested tenements of the cities. By means of these dry, light, sanitary houses we have made health possible for scores of families. Better than health has been the sympathy and comradeship our workers have brought to these people, and it is a thought to stir anew all of our hearts that our workers have been able to help in this new calamity those with whom they have become such close friends.

The lack of any direct cable information from Charles Evans indicates, presumably, that all of the workers in the Somme regions are safe, since in such a case, "no news is good news." We hope shortly to be able to give to Friends an account of the service our representatives were able to render in helping the refugees who were forced to such a quick flight. The following is a statement by J. Henry Scattergood, who spent five months in France as the organizer of the work of the American Friends' Unit.

At first many of our Friends may be disheartened that the new German invasion should have again swept over the region in which a small part of our work has been done. The situation is, however, by no means discouraging. The region lost is not only the most recent district into which our work has been extended, but the whole Somme section forms only a small proportion of the total work of the Friends in France. We had erected, perhaps, seventy-five or one hundred portable houses in some dozen villages near Ham, but the actual material loss of all this is very little as compared with the loss to the unfortunate French people who had returned to occupy them and to plant their crops and start their farms once more.

To many the words "reconstruction work" signify permanent rebuilding of the destroyed sections. This is, of course, quite at variance with the actual conditions—as all know who are familiar with war relief work—for no permanent rebuilding is possible during war time because of a shortage in labor and materials, nor does the French Government encourage it. All of our construction work has been of a temporary nature to make possible an early return of the people to the land, so greatly desired by the people themselves as well as the authorities. Of course it is unspeakably sad to think of the abandonment in this region of all of this work by our own and other organizations, but it must not be overlooked that when the French people began to return to this region after its evacuation by the Germans a year ago, somebody needed to help them, and that it was our privilege to have had a part in this work of relief. For it must be remembered in general that it was relief work such as ours that is even more largely a work of rehabilitation of the people than of property. The building of the portable houses and the making of repairs have been of course an especially important part of the Friends' program because of our ability to furnish men workers in ways that others have not had the opportunity of doing, but even with us it has been only one part in our efforts to help the people to make a fresh start in life. Our medical department has looked after the sick ones, the relief department has distributed scores of thousands of garments and large quantities of furniture, besides finding employment for refugees, and our agricultural department has distributed seeds, tools and helped greatly in direct work in plowing, threshing, repairs of implements, etc. By far the greatest proportion of this work has been in other parts of France than the one now re-invaded, and only about fifty English and American Friends were in the Somme region out of a total of about three hundred and forty in France.

By far the greatest contribution of the Friends had been in the old battlefield of the Marne, east of Paris. In this region of the Marne and the Meuse nearly fifty thousand people have been helped in more than three hundred villages, and five hundred houses have been erected. Although no region in the war zone can be said to be absolutely secure, yet the French authorities are inviting our workers constantly to enlarge the work in this district, and great possibilities are opening especially in the Verdun section. Even before the recent German drive it had been a question whether all of our workers in the Somme would not be compelled to leave there on account of the military situation and the greater opportunity elsewhere. We can rejoice that all of our eight hospitals and homes for the aged or for children are in safe regions and also that our two hut building plants at Dole and Ormans and all of our relief work (except the small amount at Ham) can continue undisturbed.

We rejoice in the cabled advices to the newspapers from the American Red Cross in Paris that all of our workers in the Somme region, as well as those of the Smith College Unit and other relief organizations are not only safe, but also have been doing splendid work in helping the refugees in their migrating to safer parts. Many Red Cross auto trucks were rushed to their help and made possible a much easier journey than in the early days of the war.

As to actual loss, the French people themselves have been the real sufferers. Our hearts go out to those poor souls who after making their brave efforts to get a fresh start, are now once more forced out of their homes. Fortunately, their number is comparatively small, because probably not more than twenty per cent. of all the population of this previously destroyed district had found it possible to return. This was especially true in the villages within six miles of the front, occupied before this drive, where no civilians at all had been able to return. The same applies to the old "no man's land" region, several miles wide, where the fighting continued for two and a-half years. Hence the losses at this time involve only the limited number who had returned into this devastated region since a year ago.

We can be thankful that our workers were in a position to aid these newly-stricken French people, and that this and other opportunities for immediate service make it all the more incumbent on sympathetic Americans to extend the much-needed help.

— "WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"

"Oh Watchman, what of the Night?"

"No guiding stars we mark—
Confusion reigns o'er war-swept plains.
The Night is very dark."

"Oh Watchman, what of the Night?"

He said, "I cannot see—
But cruel foes lurk 'neath mist and murk—
'Mid direst agony."

"Oh Watchman, what of the Night?"

Faintly through pain and dread,
He made reply, "There are those who cry
'Twere better we were dead."

"What of the Night?" A calm voice spoke,
"Beyond those crimes abhorred,
Our eyes are bent on a Night far spent
And the coming of our Lord."

—L. C. W.

LATEST NEWS FROM OUR RUSSIAN "FRONT"

DATED AT ANDREAFKA, IN SOUTHERN RUSSIA,
First Month 21, 1918.

Here I am at Andreaka again, having come up from Efmooka last week in order to start off early yesterday morning to a village about thirty miles from here, to make a distribution of clothing to refugees who haven't had anything, and who are awfully hard up. But when morning came a Coran was blowing—like our blizzards, only ten times as bad, so we couldn't start. We have made a bundle of clothing for each family—after getting a list of the names and ages of all the refugees there, and we give a padded coat to each family, a pair of trousers and a shirt to every man, a skirt and waist to every woman, and about the same to every child. We had a lot of men's vests which came in the bales from England, and as we ran out of men's shirts, we gave them vests instead, or else pajamas to be cut over and made into shirts!

About dinner time the storm cleared off, but too late to start, as it is a five-hours' journey with a heavy sledge. Then followed a thaw and even rain! (an unheard of thing for this time of year). This morning the thermometer is down again to eight. So far I have been comfortable, just wearing a sweater under my fur coat, with, of course, valinki (native felt boots) and a fur cap, which are absolutely indispensable. I think I told you that they had made for us shubas and tooloops, long coats made of sheepskin like the peasants wear, but so far, I've only worn mine when driving. Then we wear everything we have! My parties at Christmas for the refugees went off very well, though the only ones I enjoyed were those for the little boys and girls.

The aptek (dispensary) being closed I could use that room, which was very nice for the purpose, as it was absolutely empty except for benches, which we needed. The room wasn't nearly large enough, but I was so glad to be able to have it away from the house! We asked the boys under twelve to come at two o'clock, and at eleven they began to arrive! We played games, and then had tea, bread, some little hard cakes, sweetened with a black kind of molasses, sunflower seeds and sugar. Then at dark they went home. The little girls came the next day and we had for them the same kind of a party. The mothers and children under six came the next day, but there was such a swarm of babies that we couldn't do much playing. However, they certainly did seem to enjoy it, and though we had three samovars, and they were all filled twice, I thought they would never stop drinking tea! They had each brought a cup, and though they all brought the biggest they possessed, I know we filled each cup four times!

Then for the last day I had asked the boys and girls over twelve and up to eighteen, that was the only party I didn't enjoy! All the people for every party had been given a ticket but if we could have taken them in, I think there would have been at least three times as many at each party, for we had to guard the door! There weren't any late comers, either!

But I think I enjoyed the mornings much more, for then I asked any of the native peasants who cared to come to see the Christmas tree. The refugees always have one in their church and at school, when they are in their homes, but as one old Russian woman said: "I am sixty years old, but I've never seen anything like that!" and her face just lighted up, she thought the tree was so beautiful, and the next day brought her children and grandchildren. You see, they haven't many trees around here, and so have never seen even a fir tree.

The week-end after Christmas I went to Lubimooka to spend with Esther White, as we had a praznik (or holiday) on the thirtieth as well, the Russian New Year.

Esther washes out eyes and ears and dresses wounds like an old hand, and now even gives the anesthetic for operations. I went into the aptek to help, because these are their busiest days, and I certainly did like it.

I have been feeling sorry that Esther was taken out of the relief work for the nursing, but I am ready now to envy her. I always did like to see results, and it's so much fun to see the people go out feeling so much better. We did four operations one day in the dispensary, and one in the hospital. It seems so queer to put a person under ether, cut them open and then send them home, perhaps for a thirty-mile drive across the steppe. The last operation, upon a man who had tried to commit suicide by cutting his throat, finished me and I had to leave suddenly, but Esther just went on giving the anesthetic like an old hand.

The first of the week I came back to Efimooka and opened the work-rooms, for we had given the women a holiday on Christmas week, and paid them the week's wages as a Christmas present.

My friend has returned from her trip to Moscow, it must be a wonderful old city. There is a chance of Huna Haines going to Moscow and Petrograd to interview the Red Cross, to get money for this famine fund from them, but it isn't decided yet.

At last Committee meeting we recommended that at least three American young men should be asked for to work in the dispensaries and thus get a chance to learn the language in preparation for the real reconstruction work in the west, when the refugees go back. We get so little news here, lately no mail scarcely has come from England, either, so we are all hard up for news from home, but the rumors of peace are constantly being heard.

Some of the people are leaving here next month, and will go home by way of Philadelphia, and then you will get a chance to know what the life out here is really like. It is so much more comfortable than I expected, and in some ways I think we're too luxurious, but the English are used to it and must have it.

[Signed] EMELE C. BRADBURY.

MINUTE OF EXERCISES ON THE STATE OF SOCIETY

ISSUED BY PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, 1918.

The Yearly Meeting now drawing to a close has been occupied with matters of unusual moment, which are calculated to give it a distinctive place in the annals of these gatherings, and which we trust may be the forerunner of greater things to come.

In considering the condition of our Society, we were asked to examine the foundation of our faith, as well as what we build thereon. We were brought to realize that the success of our gathering together in worship can only be made sure by our being, or striving to be, in the right attitude toward our Lord, so that we shall receive the full and loving response from Him. As we dwell near His life, the everlasting life, we shall not find our meetings, as some, or indeed all of us at times, have found them, to be seasons that are dead and uninteresting, but shall find them to be springs of joy and inspiration and service. In His pure light we shall receive a ministry free and fresh and powerful, which will indeed find access to the hearts of men when forms and ritual are unavailing.

To those of insight there appears in our day a vision of increasing unity everywhere. As it was a century ago that Joseph Hoag saw his lamentable vision of a spreading disunity about to come; so now there is a sense of an ever-widening unity, spreading first within our own borders between young and old, and between all those of the name of Friend; now reaching out to help the toiling masses of humanity around us, and across the seas to those in darkness, and so we trust to lay hold of all the nations, and ere long unite them also in a great universal bond of Brotherhood.

Turning to the thought of our own membership, the reading of the fifth query addressed to the Ministers and Elders, a query of former times just revived, with the answers to it now read to this body, evidenced a growth of spiritual life among us, with a deepening and convincing of the truth especially among the young. This is a testimony to the deeper condition of the Society and was an encouragement to all. The dedication and right activities of the young people called forth expressions of gladness and thanksgiving, and also of thoughtfulness. We were commended furthermore to see that the caretakers of our younger children are persons of serious and religious motives and influence, that so the foundation of the young lives committed to them may early be laid with security in the truth.

We have been greatly favored in the environment of our homes and schools; how is it then that with all our careful training we have not proved more effective in reaching the people about us? Few of our number or of those drawn to us really belong to the laboring classes; few of us know the real interests and organization of labor. We must learn to reach out in sympathy and simplicity, to the less favored masses of society, to do them good by sharing the blessing we receive. If we consider all the patience and thoughtful toil that have been expended upon us, without which we ourselves could hardly have been led into the right way, we must feel impelled to exert the same long-suffering care in behalf of others, whether of the indifferent among ourselves, or of those in the larger world around; and thus should we at last lead them also into the same way of blessing. With the vision of a great unity and Brotherhood before our eyes, shall we not also behold the outreaching and expanding power of our Lord, whereby may go forth from our meetings and from us a contagion of blessing and of life in which others will learn to know that He is good?

Once more the all-sufficiency of our Lord has been clearly set before us. He must be the Master of our assemblies; in Him will be found outreaching love and unifying brotherhood; from Him will proceed effectual ministry; by Him our daily life will be controlled and in His strength we shall meet all things that must still be suffered or endured.

The counsels we have heard have been sound and true. "If we know these things, happy are we if we do them." Herein is the way of growth for the Kingdom of God and for eternal life.

With feelings of thankfulness to an All-wise and loving Father in Heaven for the continued favors granted us throughout the sessions of this Yearly Meeting, the meeting closed to convene again next year at the usual time if consistent with the Divine Will.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RECORDS AND CHANGES IN MEMBERSHIP.

To the Representative Meeting:

Reports from the Recorders of the different Monthly Meetings have been summarized as follows:—

The total membership reported last year was 4457. Corrections by two Monthly Meetings added four (4), so that we assume 4461 as the membership at the beginning of the period covered by this report.

The changes indicated are:—

GAINS.
Births	32
Certificates	63
Requests	74
Total Gains	169
LOSSES.
Deaths	70
Certificates	62
Resignations	14
Dropped or Disownments	5
Total Losses	151

Apparent gain for the year—18, and total membership for Twelfth Month 1, 1917, as indicated by these reports—4470, the same as reported two years ago. The membership is thus divided:—

Adult males	1558
Adult females	1000
Minors	1021

On behalf of the Committee.

WATSON W. DEWEES,
Clerk.

PHILADELPHIA, First Month 16, 1918.

NEWS ITEMS.

CHARLES EVANS CABLES "WHOLE UNIT SAFE."—The following cable was received last week from Charles Evans:

"Whole Unit safe. Re-distribution to fresh fields of work going on. Unusual devotion shown by both men and women members of Unit. (Signed) CHARLES EVANS."

Although we have had no great fear as to the safety of the workers, it is very comforting to have this cable of reassurance.

This brief message forecasts the full account we expect to receive later of increased need for our work in new fields. Our work fundamentally is a work of relief for the refugee population of the devastated regions. The greater the distress of these people the greater the need for our work. This new calamity to some of the people our workers have learned to know so intimately has imposed increased responsibility upon Friends.

An essential part of this work of relief is the building of temporary houses. The fact that some of these houses have been destroyed is no cause for feeling that even this part of the work has been wasted. The people had to live somewhere and it was usually a choice between our temporary houses and almost unbearable conditions in the congested refugee districts of the cities. By means of these dry, light, sanitary houses we have made health possible for scores of families. Better than health has been the sympathy and comradeship our workers have brought to these people, and it is a thought to stir anew all of our hearts that our workers have been able to help in this new calamity those with whom they have become such close friends.

VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

THE recently enacted Executive order concerning Non-combatant Service has by no means relieved the situation as it affects Friends and others (C. O.'s). The service outlined is military, and these men cannot perform it.

Conditions at Camp Dix on the 6th inst. might be stated briefly; at some other camps they are even more acute.

At Dix, the C. O.'s, with exception of one who had arrived at camp within a few days, were in the Guard House for disobeying military orders; no communication could be had with them while there. The Friend who was a late arrival had been severely grilled on the 6th and was likely to be lodged in the Guard House soon. Superior officers were visited, who gave courteous attention to pleas made on behalf of the men in question; and there seems no doubt that our men would as a result of our visit receive much less drastic treatment than had been anticipated; the situation, though depressing, has its hopeful outlook.

W. B. H.

NOTICES TO PROSPECTIVE APPLICANTS FOR THE RECONSTRUCTION UNIT.

TERM OF ENLISTMENT.—It has been found advisable to change the term of enlistment from nine months to one year. Considering the long time consumed in actually getting into the work and the heavy expense of equipment and transportation, nine months' service has been found to be too short a term. A one year term is shorter than that of most other forms of war-time service. It does not seem necessary to discard the application blanks issued under the former policy, and we ask each future applicant to make the change upon his blank.

ALLOWANCES FOR PERSONAL INCIDENTALS TO ALL MEMBERS OF THE UNIT.—A new policy in this matter has just been adopted. Each member of the Unit will now be granted an allowance for all necessary personal incidentals. The details as to amount and as to time and manner of payment must be decided by the Field Committee in France. Men who do not wish such an allowance can, of course, return it as a contribution to the committee.

RECENT SAILINGS (Fourth Month 4, 1918), for Reconstruction Camps Abroad.—Philip R. Bailey, Portland, Maine; Thomas Arthur Benson, Seattle, Washington; Lewis C. Clark, Lawrence, Kansas; Henry Davis, Guilford College, North Carolina; Arthur D. Fulton, Baltimore, Maryland; Herbert Arthur Hill, Pasadena, California; Laurence Hollingsworth, West Branch, Iowa; Joseph J. Hoskins, Leesburg, Ohio; Benah A. Hurley, New Hope, Penna.; Truman R. Johnson, Pasadena, California; Harlan Thomas Jones, Allen, Nebraska; Richard A. Larkin, Greenfield, Ohio; Charles L. Outland, Woodland, North Carolina; Stephen Vlas-kamp, Munich, Indiana.

Eleven states from Maine to California and from North Carolina to Washington are represented by the above fourteen workers.

REFERENCE was made in THE FRIEND a few weeks ago to J. Henry Scattergood's visits to Friends' centres in this country in the interests of the Reconstruction work abroad. Having gained additional facts concerning the extent of this undertaking, we are going to share them with our readers, feeling confident that we are not abusing a privilege that has come our way. At the present writing he has addressed eighty meetings; the audiences have varied from one thousand to seventy-five, an estimated count of the total number who have heard him is about thirty thousand.

Naturally the largest number of meetings have been held in Pennsylvania. He has also spoken in Maryland, Washington, D.C., Virginia, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas and Missouri. Probably the largest meeting was held at Muncie, Indiana, where eleven hundred were present. A meeting held in Boston, in the Old South Church, one of the evenings of our Yearly Meeting week, was an enthusiastic occasion, attended by many influential Bostonians; the audience numbering one thousand.

The westernmost point visited was Haviland, Kansas, where seven hundred attended and the most eastern point, Boston, just referred to.

He has still other sections planned for, which will include the principal Friends' centres in North Carolina, some points in Virginia, three or four cities in Maine and additional places in Massachusetts. Fall River, New Bedford and Boston are the cities of Massachusetts thus far visited.

A majority of the lectures were given in Friends' Meeting-houses or in halls connected with Friends' schools or colleges. A notable exception was in the case of the Boston meeting; another at Marshalltown, Iowa, where the house planned for being too small, they used a church near by kindly offered; at Blacksburg, Va., the meeting was held on Friday morning, all the congregations in the town joining on this occasion; the lecture being given in a hall of the State Military School. At Christiansburg, but five miles distant, a union meeting, of like character was held on the evening of the same day; the attendance at the two meetings that day being fifteen hundred.

We will leave others to moralize on the cumulative effect that must grow out of this work of our friend. He does not call them Peace meetings, neither are they, but the lessons they teach are the only peace lessons an audience will listen to these days; the fact that three hundred and fifty Quaker boys and girls, young men and young women, have willingly given up home comforts and have, in many cases, interrupted promising business or professional careers in order to render service to the humblest of their fellow-beings in the desolated villages of Eastern France, this fact gains a great hold on the feelings of an American audience, and satisfies the man who would scoff at what he has called the Quaker sackers, that Friends are rendering a very constructive kind of service; that while they can not fight for conscience' sake, they can do that which lacks all the glamor of war and which is in its nature the very humblest of all service.—Eds.

THE following is taken from a private letter and dated at Barnesville, Ohio, Third Month 29th:—

I went to Camp Sherman First-day evening to see our men there and to make sure that they had received a copy of the new order. We were not surprised to find that our members as well as the Monanite Brethren, etc., of the various branches, constituting the segregated group numbering forty-five, were to a man firm in their conviction that they could not do despite to their tender spouses; . . . trusting that way would be made through lenient interpretation and sympathetic administration of the furlough bill to enable them to serve their country and times with freedom of conscience.

I was pleased to find that there were Mennonites and Friends from Wilmington at the Camp consulting with the men, and very solicitous for their welfare.

The young men picked up here and there over the country and gathered more or less closely together under the unifying influence of a common cause and bound with a gratifying measure of the Bond of Peace certainly constitute a living testimony that His cause has not altogether been abandoned in these times of military fervor.

We are not a little concerned about the "compulsory training" bill as also about the similar Compulsory Training Amendment to new registration bill. Our Committee (speaking for the meeting) has at no time entertained any thought of sending any delegation to Washington that would in any way complicate C. O. matters, either from your or the official viewpoint. . . . At the present I feel sure we fully unite with thee to allow matters time to develop without any over-zealous or undue outside influence. . . . Our boys were interviewed yesterday at Camp Sherman by the "faithful and considerate officer," accompanied by a doctor, who made a physical examination prior to the report at Washington tomorrow. The boys report a satisfactory and courteous interview, the results of course are to them unknown.

The segregated group when I was down was located in a section composed of ten tents, each of which was large enough to hold five cots around the sides. They are provided with a stove for each tent and some fuel, so they can be fairly comfortable unless the weather is very severe. The location of their tents places them much apart from most of the activities of the Camp; they still go to Base Hospital for meals as heretofore and continue to receive courteous and considerate treatment.

CHARLES LIVEZEY.

THERE now hangs upon one of the walls at our office (Friends' Service Committee) a very interesting map of the United States. Small tags of different colors indicate the number of communities in each State that are connected with the various departments of our work. The four kinds of tags represent the following information for each State: 1—Number of men appointed on the Reconstruction Unit. 2—Number of women appointed for service abroad. 3—Number of communities contributing. 4—Number of communities engaged in sewing and knitting. On each State is pinned one of each of the tags upon which is written the number of communities. For example, New York has thirty-three men and two women on the Unit, thirty-eight communities contributing and nineteen Sewing Clubs. California has twenty-five men and one woman on the Unit; eighteen communities contributing and nine sewing clubs. If any Yearly Meeting or local Service Committee wishes to make such a map, we shall be glad to furnish the statistics.

THE Mennonite Church has recently sent another check for $2,000 for our work. This is the fifth check for this amount which they have sent us during the past few weeks.

FRIENDS' SERVICE NOTES.

WE take a great deal of pleasure in announcing the arrival in this country of Robert Tatlock, of England, who has been head of the Friends' work in Russia. He spent one year with the Friends' Mission in France, and is now en route to Russia, which he left last Twelfth Month. He expects to spend several weeks in this country lecturing on Friends' War Relief Work in both France and Russia. He has traveled up and down Russia for thousands of miles, assuring the great stream of refugees, passed on from village to village. He knows present conditions in Russia as few men do. Through his lectures we have an unusual opportunity of obtaining authentic information concerning that great land of mystery which promises to play so important a part in the future of the world. His lecture is illustrated by a number of extremely interesting pictures. His time in the United States is limited, but we shall endeavor to have him reach at least one or two places in each Yearly Meeting. The arrangement of these meetings is in the hands of the Yearly Meeting Service Committees. The following is a Minute of the Meeting for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting, held Third Month 1, 1918:

"Robert R. Tatlock, of Glasgow, a member of our Religious Society, who has rendered valuable service in connection with the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee, first in France, then amongst the Serbian Refugees in Albania, and for nearly two years in Russia, has told us that he feels called to pay a short visit to the United States and Canada, to place before Friends and others some of the present needs and conditions in Russia, and to tell of the vast work of reconstruction that must be faced as these millions return to the devastated regions where their homes once stood.

Whilst mindful of the need of reconstruction in the physical sense, we also look forward to a work of spiritual reconstruction which we believe lies open to the Society of Friends and in both we hope to have the continued comradeship of our brethren in America.

This meeting warmly commends Robert R. Tatlock to the sympathy and support of all those amongst whom his service may be.

J. F. ELLIOTT,
Clerk.

REPORT OF THE TREASURER OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, FOR WEEK ENDING FOURTH MONTH 6, 1918.

For Armenian and Syrian Relief	$ 23.00
For Supplies	35.00
For 26 Meetings	5,890.93
From 15 Individuals	1,396.00

$7,344.93

CHARLES F. JENKINS,

Treasurer.

CORRESPONDENCE.

L. B., in a letter to the Office of THE FRIEND, concludes:—

SAPPHO, Second Month 28, 1918.

"I have a mind to write a page (of THE FRIEND) about the topography of Japan. That is one of the things which no one has written up for THE FRIEND, so far as I know. There is not much here that is like home, but most of the really interesting things have been discussed by so many writers that one hesitates to add, fearing to be thought superfluous.

"We are well and busy. We have found good friends here and are as happy as we could be at twelve thousand miles from Philadelphia.

Thine cordially,

LLOYD BALDEISTON."

NOTICES.

LECTURES AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—A cordial invitation is extended to our patrons and friends to attend the following School Lectures:

Fourth Month 12, 12.40 p. m.—Mary Taylor Blauvelt, Teacher, Author, Lecturer, of Hartford, Conn.—Subject: "Abraham Lincoln."

Fourth Month 26, 12.40 p. m.—Dr. Edward A. Steiner, Grinnell College, Iowa—Subject: "The Making of Americans."

Fifth Month 11, 9 a. m.—Walter W. Haviland—Subject: "The Wonders of Oregon," illustrated.

MEETINGS FROM Fourth Month 14th to Fourth Month 20th:

Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Western District, Twelfth Street below Market Street, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 17, at 5 p. m. Business session, 7 p. m.

Muncy, at Muncy, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 17, at 10.30 a. m.

Haverford, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 18, at 7.30 p. m.

DIED.—On the sixth of Third Month, 1918, at the home of her son, Elwood D. Mott, in South Pasadena, California, ABIGAIL B. MOTT, in her eighty-third year; a member of Pasadena Monthly Meeting of Friends, California.

—, on the third of Fourth Month, 1918, at his home in Chester, Pa., JOSEPH WARNER JONES, aged seventy-seven; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa.

—, on Second Month 23, 1918, at the home of his son, J. Rowland Haines, Colerain, Ohio, CLAYTON HAINES, in his eighty-first year; a member and Elder of Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting, New Jersey.

—, on Third Month 25, 1918, at his home near Norwich, Ontario, Canada, GEORGE POLLARD, in his eighty-fourth year; an Elder and member of Norwich Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at Haddonfield, N. J., on Third Month 18, 1918, LYDIA S. BALDING, widow of Joshua T. Ballinger, in the eighty-third year of her age; a member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting.

—, at his home, Melrose Park, Pa., on the twenty-fourth of Third Month, 1918, EDWARD LIPPINCOTT, aged sixty-seven years; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting.

Woolman School

A Friends' School for Social and Religious Education.

Six Weeks Summer Term:
Seventh Month 1—Eighth Month 10, 1918.

For Information, Apply to
ELBERT RUSSELL, Director,
WOOLMAN SCHOOL
SWARTHMORE, PA.

W. J. MacWatters

Let Me
Help You

In Selecting Your

RUGS AND CARPETS

Domestic — — — Oriental

ALL WEAVES

The Home of Bundhar Wilton
"DURABLE AS IRON"

HARDWICK & MAGEE CO.

1220 Market Street

GLASLYN-CHATHAM

PARK PLACE

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

A Family House of Established Reputation.
Open Throughout the Year.

NATHAN L. JONES.

Pocono Manor Winter Inn

POCONO MANOR, PA.

SPRINGTIME in the Pocono Mountains is ever a delight to those who admire and study nature. The Birds and Flowers are numerous and varied, and the Trout Fishing in the Swiftwater is wonderful.

J. W. HURLEY, Manager
(Pocono Summit Station, D. L. & W. R. R.)

FRIENDS AND THE INDIANS

1655-1917.

By Rayner W. Kehey,
Suitable for use by Study Classes.

FOR SALE AT $1.50 BY
FRIENDS' BOOK STORE

304 Arch Street PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RESIDENCE: 224 S. 44th St. BELL PHONE: BRIDGE 2084-Y

WILLIAM OAKES

Plumbing and Heating Contractor
ALSO LEAD BURNING

260 SOUTH TENTH STREET

PHILADELPHIA

BELL PHONE: Filbert 2060.

Hajoca

porcelain - enameled
Bath

This newly designed Hajoca tiled-in Bath is a model whose simple, graceful lines and sanitary equipment foretell its wide popularity.

Come to our Show-rooms and see our model bathrooms, they are within easy reach of City Hall. A visit will amply repay you. Write for the Hajoca Book, free.

HAINES, JONES & GADBURY CO.
1110-1144 Ridge Ave.

(at 12th and Spring Garden Sts.)

W. B. WEAVER

UNDBERTAKER and EMBALMER

550-552 N. 5TH ST., PHILA., PA.

Special Attention Given to Funerals
In and Out of the City. Also Chapel
Accommodations for Funerals.

BELL PHONE ESTABLISHED 1880

To enjoy good health and a sound digestion use
PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT BREAD
made from the entire wheat grain ground on a stone mill. A perfect food and natural regulator. Sold by all good grocers in Philadelphia.

Write for particulars to

PERFECTION WHOLE WHEAT CO.
10th & Susquehanna Ave., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WALL PAPERS—All Grades

Custom of Friends Specially Selected

FRANK C. BUEHL

Successor to S. F. BALDERTSON'S SON
902 SPRING GARDEN ST. - PHILADELPHIA
Store open until 10.30 A. M. Any other times by appointment only
Opposite Spring Garden Station, Phila. & Reading R. R.
ESTABLISHED 1849. BELL PHONE.

M. GATCHEL

126 N. 21st St., PHILA.

MILLINERY, PLAIN AND FANCY

PHONE, Spruce 3632

OUR aim is to make our customers feel that the Holmes Press is in their plant. We have room for a few more such proprietors.

THE HOLMES PRESS
J. Linton Engle, Pres.
1336 Cherry Street, Philadelphia

JOSEPH G. FOGG

FUNERAL DIRECTOR and EMBALMER

S. W. Cor. Sixteenth and Race Streets
Special attention given to Friends' Funerals
Bell Phone Spruce 1646

SHETLAND PONIES

Oldest Herd in United States
Established 1883

Specially attractive prices just now owing to change in business arrangements
HARTZELL BROS., - SEBRING, OHIO
Importers and Breeders

FOR RENT - EIGHT-ROOM FURNISHED COTTAGE, bath, open plumbing, hot and cold water, town and spring water. Several meals daily, half hour ferry service to Newport and Narragansett Pier. Excellent opportunity where there are one or more invalids in family. Meals must be taken at Maplewood.
Apply DR. W. LINCOLN BATES,
Jamestown, R. I.

WANTED—A POSITION IN FRIENDS' SCHOOL, either in upper grades or Junior High School, by an experienced woman teacher, a Friend.
Address B. "THE FRIEND."

WANTED—FOR THE ACADEMIC YEAR, 1918-1919, an experienced teacher of Arithmetic for grades three, four, five and six; a Friend preferred. Ability to teach French also is desirable.
Apply to "SCHOOL", care of "THE FRIEND."

FOR RENT FROM SIXTH MONTH 1 TO NINTH Month 30, 1918, furnished home on Haverford College campus. Nine rooms, two baths, garage.
R. W. KELSEY, HAVERTFORD, PA.

FRIENDS' SCHOOL, AT ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. will need three experienced teachers for year 1918-19 for seventh and eighth grades, fourth and fifth grades, and Kindergarten. Apply to Principal,
HELEN L. FORSTERIE,

WANTED—BY A COLLEGE WOMAN, WHO makes a specialty of private teaching, a position as tutor or companion, preferably in a family of Friends. Excellent reference given. Address "THE FRIEND", care of "THE FRIEND", 207 Walnut Place, Philadelphia.

WANTED—A POSITION AS GOVERNMENT AND mother's helper in a family of refinement.
Address "THE FRIEND", 207 Walnut Place, Phila., Pa.

WANTED—BY ONE OF EXPERIENCE, A POSITION as companion nurse for invalid, or managing housekeeper for elderly persons or couple.
Address M. "THE FRIEND."

SCHOOL PRINCIPAL WANTED AT FRIENDS' S. Academy, a boarding and day school for boys and girls, located at Locust Valley, Long Island, N. Y. A married man, who is a member of the Society of Friends, preferred. For particulars address FREDERICK E. WILLYTS, President, Glen Cove, N. Y.

WANTED—MIDDLE-AGED FARMER (FRIEND) of education and wide experience in his line desires position as manager of large farm or country estate.
D. W. BRUCE, BRIDGE 1040, R. I.

A YOUNG FRIEND WITH SOME EXPERIENCE IN bookkeeping and office work desires clerical position.
Address MARGARET FRANK,
Y. M. C. A., 52nd and Sanson Streets.

FOR RENT—OCEAN CITY, N. J. LARGE FURNISHED Cottage for Seventh and Eighth months. Five chambers. All conveniences. Garage.
W. HAROLD THOMPSON,
114 Yale Avenue, Swarthmore, Pa.

Cheyney Institute

offers an opportunity each year to one hundred picked colored youths to train themselves in leadership. No people have a more just claim on the sympathy and help of others than those colored people who have faith in the future of their race through wise training.

Cheyney Institute offers this training and has proved by its graduates that it merits generous support.

The Managers endeavor to administer the Trust they have assumed, but must look to Friends and others for financial assistance in the work for these one hundred young men and women.

The Institute also offers a unique course for teachers in its Summer School. Most of the Eastern and Southern States are represented at this School and testimonials of the advantages gained from the Summer courses would satisfy the most skeptical.

Leslie P. Hill, Principal, is always ready to offer timely suggestions to any who have it on their hearts to assist in the laudable work that is carried on at Cheyney.

Because of the conditions which must be met, if the School is to continue its good work, the Board of Managers feel free to request Friends to include Cheyney among the charities to which they contribute, and ask that checks shall be drawn in favor of and mailed to

WILLIAM BIDDLE, Treasurer,
119 S. Fourth St., Philadelphia.

SEE WALKER & KEPLER

FOR

Good Electrical Work

531 CHESNUT ST. - PHILA.

HARRY S. LEE

313 WALNUT STREET

PAINTER AND GRAINER

ANTIQUE and OFFICE FURNITURE RESTORED
JOBGING PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO
ESTIMATES

Philadelphia's
Representative Store

ELKINS, MORRIS & CO.

BANKERS

REPRESENTATIVES

PAUL W. BROWN
JAMES P. MAGILL

LAND TITLE BUILDING
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITY BONDS

FOR

CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT.

FULL PARTICULARS ON REQUEST

Painting Problems Worked Out

NO CHARGE EXCEPT FOR THE MATERIAL THAT WE SELL

CONSULT

YARNALL PAINT COMPANY
MANUFACTURERS
PHILADELPHIA

Letchworth Cottage Spring Lake Beach, N. J.

Open for the Season 1918

A. C. & S. H. Letchworth

WM. H. PILE'S SONS

BOOK AND JOB PRINTING

422 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE

PRINTING OF BOOKS AND CATALOGS

R. C. Ballinger Ernest R. Yarnall John A. Stratton
TELEPHONES

Bell—Spruce 17-81 - - Keystone—Race 637

R. C. BALLINGER & CO.

CONTRACTORS and BUILDERS

218 N. Thirteenth St. Philadelphia.

Friends Arch St. Centre

304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Provides comfortable accommodations for guests by the day or week. Meals at moderate prices.

AMELIA D. FEATHERSTONE, Matron.

PHONE—MARKET 1571.

ALFRED C. HAINES

Building Glass and Paints

56 N. Front St., Philadelphia.

TO ADVERTISERS.—THE FRIEND is now open for selected advertisements at the following rates: One inch, 50 cents, or 4 cents a line; no insertion for less than 25 cents. Long term rates given on application.

Friends having real estate to rent or sell, also those desiring board or rooms, should find THE FRIEND an excellent medium for reaching interested parties.

Standing business cards are also solicited.

If you are interested in Government Bonds
Foreign Government Bonds
Railroad Bonds
Municipal Bonds
Public Utility Bonds
Industrial Bonds, or
Short Term Notes

the facilities and assistance of our various departments, each specializing in one class of securities, are at your command.

When requesting offerings or information
please mention PF-157.

The National City Company

Correspondent Offices in 24 Cities
Philadelphia—1421 Chestnut St.
Telephone—555 Locust

Bonds Short Term Notes Acceptances

GIRARD TRUST CO. BROAD and CHESTNUT STS.

CAPITAL
AND
SURPLUS } $10,000,000

Acts as Executor, Trustee, Guardian,
Administrator, Assignee and Receiver.
Safes to Rent in Burglar-proof Vaults.
Interest Allowed on Deposits. :: ::

E. B. MORRIS
PRESIDENT

Premier Duplicating Co.

Mimeographing, Multigraphing, Printing, Typewriting, Addressing, Mailing, etc.

630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

PUBLIC STENOGRAPHER

GEORGE B. COCK, Liberty Building

Established 1899. Experience 40 years. Medical 13

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. 91.

FIFTH-DAY, FOURTH MONTH 18, 1918.

No. 42.

THE FRIEND.

Published Weekly. Price $2.00 a year in Advance.

Publisher, DAVIS H. FORSTYHE.

Editors { J. HENRY BARTLETT,
DAVIS H. FORSTYHE,
MARY WARD.

Make remittances payable to

THE FRIEND,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE, PHILADELPHIA.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"Think how the faith of far-seeing men that slavery could be abolished necessarily preceded its abolishment; and consider the need today for men who really are confident that war can be done away, that industrial injustice and political corruption can be stopped, that the brotherhood of man is a possibility, and that the world can be Christianized."

—H. E. FOSDICK.

FROM points as widely separated as the westernmost and easternmost towns to which THE FRIEND goes weekly come words of warm welcome and cordial endorsement of the initial number of THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT.

The second number will speak for itself as it reaches our readers.

There is a universal expression of satisfaction that a new monthly or weekly has not been launched upon the Quaker public, but that an old organ, now within nine years of its one hundredth birthday, has proven itself sufficiently elastic to expand to this reasonable request of the day.

The management of THE FRIEND is very desirous of extending the circulation of the paper and will welcome lists of names, either long or short, of those to whom it is advisable to address sample copies.

THE patience of some of our subscribers exceeds our own. We know that THE FRIEND frequently is late in reaching you, and that at points near Philadelphia it is sometimes not received until three or four days after being delivered at the Philadelphia post office.

The papers always leave our office before 3.30 o'clock every Fifth-day afternoon, this is the earliest that we can be sure of delivering them, though often they go out soon after noon. A copy is addressed to our office at Walnut Place, and with two exceptions, some time ago, it has never failed to reach us before noon on Sixth-day, a few times it has arrived the same day as delivered at the post office. We also have positive information in regard to its distribution from other Pennsylvania post offices thirty miles from Philadelphia and one office in New Jersey and one in Eastern Ohio. With very rare exceptions it reaches these offices on time and is promptly handled.

Our treatment received at the Central Philadelphia office has always been very courteous, and we have filed complaints with them when they have been forwarded to us, but it is more than probable that much of the annoying delay occurs either en route between the Philadelphia office and the home offices of our subscribers, or at these home offices.

We would suggest that an interview be had with the home office before a note of complaint is forwarded to us, and we would also remind our readers that other weeklies are subject to a like annoyance, and certain weeklies and monthlies which in normal times used to reach us with clock-like precision, now are often two or three days overdue.

SOME LESSONS OF THE YEARLY MEETING.

In looking back over the recent annual gatherings of Philadelphia Friends, a number of outstanding features easily fix themselves on the memory. Amongst them is the notable mark of Divine guidance even through the expression of apparently opposing views. Another is the deep undercurrent of peace which flowed through the various sittings (I speak of the men's side of the house) and which finally overflowed and baptized the assembled company as the Yearly Meeting drew near to its close.

The human element was of course in evidence also, and this is as it should be, for Divine wisdom utilizes the human. Only we are reminded at times that the human has its limitations, and therefore must not exalt itself if it would be the elect vessel of the Divine, lest it be left to itself in its insufficiency. But the remembrance of the exposure of our nakedness will produce wholesome exercise and deepen the channels for the inflow and outflow of the Divine.

If I apprehend aright the direction in which the Yearly Meeting was guided, both by the expression of its concerns and by the articulated feeling pervading the sittings, I would say Friends heard a threefold call.

There was first of all the call to veneration. By this I mean the avoidance of that temper which would make a church forget or slight her own past or rashly strike out in directions of activity which cannot be linked on with the clear leading traceable through her particular history. There is a certain service committed to Friends and woe to them if they become weary of it, or if they seek to render it by methods which are a contradiction of their proper testimony. It is not the first time that a church has had to confess: "They made me keeper of the vineyards, but mine own vineyard have I not kept." I do not think this is likely to become our lament for yet awhile. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is firmly rooted in the soil of her own Divinely-shaped history, whatever growth upward and outward may be required and brought forth in this day of wonderful opportunity for a more extended and aggressive witness to the world.

Then there was also the call to catholicity. And by this I mean that spirit which embraces and utilizes every one of the various expressions of the Christ-life, which recognizes gratefully the manifoldness of Divine operations in the Church. In so far as we stand for a revival of "primitive Christianity," to use William Penn's oft-repeated definition of the testimony of early Friends, we must cultivate this catholic temper, for it is beyond dispute that primitive Christianity was roomy enough to permit more than one type to express itself. And when in Corinth it began to be said: I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas, I am of Paul, I am of Christ; the apostolic censure came: "Are ye not carnal and walk as men?" They were in danger of losing the spirit of catholicity in the attempt to divide the household of faith into rival parties. But we cannot but record that far beyond a colorless toleration which has lost its discernment, to which there is nothing right and nothing wrong, we were baptized into that Spirit in which there is unity in diversity, harmony in variety, and that oneness which yet allows the intensest individuality.

Finally, I think, there was the call to universality. The presence of Friends from afar certainly emphasized this call. The epistle from Japanese Friends in their new Yearly Meeting capacity brought it home to us. The appointment of a committee to consider the future relations which should exist between the Yearly Meeting as such and those of our members who have felt constrained by the love of Christ to leave friends, home, native land and earthly prospects, to live and labor in the midst of a far-away pagan environment, exhibited this spirit. For many more must yet come "from the East and from the West" (not that the East should come to the West) to sit together in the kingdom of God where the fellowship of the saints in light witnesses to a more wonderful relationship than those ties which are only natural. The Jewish church at Jerusalem had a glorious start, but afterwards discouraged this spirit of universality and was thus denied the privilege of carrying the Message of Christ into the pagan world. The Gentile Church at Antioch was chosen instead. The reason is not far to seek. A universal spirit prevailed there. At Antioch a landed proprietor like Barnabas; a Negro, like Simeon, called Niger; and Manaen, who was a foster-brother of Herod—men who but for Christ would have been socially taboo to each other—were laborers together in happy fellowship. And such a Church could become the medium for a new departure of the outreaching love of Christ.

I believe a breath of this spirit came into the recent Yearly Meeting and made the hearts of many of us expand with a new hope. And we shall find a glowing Church will be a growing Church.

MAX I. REICH.

QUIETNESS IN LIFE.

A short time ago I was speaking with one who had attended one of our meetings for the first time. She said to me, "Your silence was like a benediction."

To our children the explanation of the meaning and need for the silences in our form of worship must often be as a blank page, but there comes a moment in every child's life when for the first time the feeling of that silence sinks in and an indelible impression is made that can never be wholly erased. The true significance of the spiritual meaning of the intense quiet may not come for a number of years, but every fleeting touch that plays upon the sensitive soul of the growing child is so much gain towards the certain hour when the power of a speaking silence will grip the inner life with a strength never to be lost.

In these days of turmoil and uncertainty when the very foundations of our known life are shaken, we have a greater need than ever before to cultivate a quiet spirit in our homes. The solving of future problems will be in the hands of the children of to-day, and it is our privilege and duty to give these very children the atmosphere of quiet strength wherein there is the absence of nerve and mind tension which seem a part of the very air we breathe.

I do not mean an entire avoidance of topics uppermost in the hearts of us all, for every child should have some understanding of the seriousness of the present crisis, but I do mean that the horrors of war should be lightly touched upon in the presence of little children and the talk around the home table should be of the sweet and wholesome things of nature and our daily life. After the children have gone to bed can come the hour for the discussion of the vital questions of the day.

This is a high ideal for parents to strive after, and it can only come in a greater or less degree according to the character of each individual. The need facing us all is how to attain unto that "quiet mind" which can allow the non-essentials to pass by unnoticed, and which will give us the strength to grasp and use the essentials in the ordering of our days.

In the face of the necessity to send succor to the war sufferers overseas it seems almost selfish to consider the needs of our own sheltered households, and yet they are vital. The wounds of the world conflict will not heal during our own generation, and it is our duty to see that our children are fitted to take up our present work. We must conserve their strength and energy physically, mentally and spiritually.

Nothing can more effectively accomplish this than the right home atmosphere. An over-zealous attendance on meeting or charitable committees is likely to send a mother home tired out, and the insistent demands from the little ones may be met with an irritation of manner the sense of which runs through the house like an electric shock, leaving no corner unstirred. It may give us food for thought that the monotonous home plodding is building as surely for reconstruction as the more thrilling public service.

How then can we instill into our children this habit of quietness? To me it seems an important part of the weekly training and as necessary as meeting-going on First-day.

To the dwellers in the country the task is comparatively easy, for it is not hard to make a very little child stand quiet while he watches a nesting bird and listens to the song of its mate, and an older child quickly understands that if he is to see the ways of the woods folk he must be as motionless as the log on which he is sitting. The city child is more of a problem, but there are the small parks in reach of all where there are tame squirrels, and a little tot soon learns that even a sparrow will not come for crumbs if the thrower of them is restless.

One of my boys asked for a picture of the Matterhorn, for his very own, to hang beside his bed. Just why he wanted it I do not know, but it surely is the embodiment of silent majesty and I can only hope that its spirit of calm strength will sink into his very soul as a lasting influence. Such gifts are in the reach of us all and should not be denied.

This is the physical side of the lesson and must come first. But while being quiet and watching and listening to the sights and sounds of nature there is unconsciously absorbed the spiritual teaching which all created things must give. I believe our Heavenly Father means us to learn in this way to listen to His voice, and being thus prepared, in the speaking silence of our worship we can hear the message that is given to us.

A Friend, in the face of a crisis demanding careful decision, said afterwards, "I never before so appreciated my early Quaker training that enabled me to sit quiet and think." This is a heritage that must not be lost and we should guard jealously our ability to be calm. To this end let us all cherish as a great gift our visions. In the midst of stress and strain what can be more quieting and refreshing than the sudden memory of a silent forest and valley, seen from some favorite hill-top,—the inner hearing of the song of the wood thrush at twilight or the call of the whip-poor-will through the pulsing night? With these there will inevitably come the still, small voice saying clearly and distinctly, "This is the way, walk thou in it."

ANNA SHINN MAIER.

"THE mistake of many Christians is that they endeavor to prove Him instead of obey Him."

EDELWEISS.

(Translated from the German of Hermann Lingg by Frederick L. Hosmer)

On the rock and girt with ice,
 Neighbor to the circling star,
 Bloomest thou, dear edelweiss,
 From all other flowers afar;
 By their joys spring unblent,
 Lonely on the rock's cold breast.

Where the lightnings have their home,
 And the startled chamois listen,
 Where the plunging waters foam,
 Eagles reign, and glaciers glisten—
 Death and terror everywhere—
 Pure and glad thou bloomest there.

So stands he in noble pain,
 Lone anear the arching heaven,
 Lonely proud, who worldly gain,
 Smiles and honors, all has given
 Freely as his freedom's price—
 As thou bloomest, edelweiss!

—From the Transcript.

UNDERMINING THE PEACE TESTIMONY OF FRIENDS.

WILLIAM L. HULL.

It is, unfortunately, a familiar experience that some of the "explanations" of Christianity which we hear or read succeed only in explaining it away. Especially in years of test and trial, we meet with explanations to the effect that Christian ethics should not be mixed with politics; that the Christian ideals were intended to be applied only to individual and not to national conduct; that they are valid only for normal and not for abnormal times; that they are capable of solving only the usual and ordinary, but not the unusual and extraordinary, problems of life; that they were applicable to the simplicity of the first century, but impracticable in the complex life of the twentieth; that they are obviously intended for the millennium and the kingdom of God, but not for our world of practical realities; that the new testament is invalidated for our world of Occidental thought and conduct, or should be taken by us only in a "Pickwickian" sense, because of its "Oriental setting;" that although Christ would act in entire accord with His teachings and would not Himself do certain things, for example participate in war, He would permit and even require us weak, unworthy human beings to act contrary to His precepts and example, &c., &c.

Strangely enough, justification for this making of Christianity a myth, a shadow, a sham, is sought for in the New Testament itself. The advocates of intemperance and the opponents of prohibition have justified their position on the ground of Paul's advice to Timothy to use a little wine for his stomach's sake; and Paul's attitude toward women is sufficient reason in the minds of some twentieth century Americans for opposing the suffrage of women and for forbidding them to take part in public worship. The advocates of slavery and opponents of abolition or emancipation preached eloquent sermons on Biblical texts in support of their opinion, and made of the Christian Church one of the chief bulwarks of slavery and the slave-trade. The defenders of an iniquitous industrial system have appealed in its defense to the declaration that "The poor ye have always with you." The defenders of war—of whole nations being arrayed against each other engaged in mutual and indiscriminate slaughter of combatants and non-combatants, the innocent and the guilty alike—find their justification in the story that Jesus drove either some animals or some merchants and money-changers from the Temple at Jerusalem because they had made of God's house a den of thieves. Verily, mighty pyramids have been set on infinitesimal apexes by those who find it hard to kick against the pricks of conscience!

Quakerism, in common with Christianity in general, has experienced this same fate. It too is charged with being untimely, other-worldly, impracticable, purely individualistic, sentimentally platitudinous, etc., etc., etc. And as the explainers away of Christianity have taken as their weapons the teachings of Christianity itself, so have the explainers away of Quakerism utilized for this purpose the fundamental Quaker doctrine of the inner light and the supremacy of the individual's conscience. In the course of generations of struggle on the part of the Society of Friends in behalf of temperance, the emancipation of the slave and of women, honest business dealings, and peace between nations, members of the Society who have opposed one or another of these testimonies have fallen back upon the supremacy of their individual consciences as a justification of their opposition to the Society's position.

The Society, of course, regards the inner light or the voice within not merely as an illumination or a sound, but as a light or a voice pointing out a way of life, and demanding obedience expressed in outward conduct. When it believes that the light has guided it along a certain pathway towards temperance, freedom, peace, or some other ideal of human conduct, it does not hide that light under a bushel, but does its utmost to lead its own members and mankind along the pathway towards the goal. It must not and does not attempt to coerce the consciences of individuals; but while it strives and patiently awaits for the light to prevail with all, it refuses to be disloyal to that which it believes it has itself received. It is not only an aggregation of individuals, but it is an organic Society, and as such it possesses a corporate conscience and a corporate duty. Its conscience cannot coerce the consciences of individuals, nor is its duty to persecute them for non-conformity. But it would be recreant to its trust were it to lower its standard because some of its members were not willing or able to live up to it. It realizes that the individual's highest duty is to seek Divine guidance for his conscience, and then to live up to the light which he has received. It also realizes that its own highest duty is to help the individual in whatever way it can to see the light more clearly and to be more responsive to it.

The individual's duty in relation to his Society is obviously not to attenuate or explain away the corporate ideal; but when he finds his own conscience at variance with that of his Society, his normal attitude would be expressed by the prayer, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief." If he cannot do otherwise, God having helped him, then he must stand steadfast if necessary against all the world; then he must do his utmost to convince his Society that it is wrong and he is right. If he is really on God's side, he will, ultimately, prevail. But let him not begin his task by declaring that his Society does not really possess the standard which it has set up, because he finds it at variance with his own; nor strive to nullify it for others by explaining it away.—From Friends' Intelligence.

REPORT OF SOCIAL ORDER COMMITTEE.

(Concluded from page 546.)

We believe that if Friends now in this time of stress and change, would endeavor to catch the spirit of the principles which actuated our founders and to dwell under its influence, they could hardly fail to see how different it is from the selfish spirit which has led up to the present condition of the stricken world. Let us repeat the following characteristics of the Society they organized, which we would all wish to see universally prevalent:

1. Essential equality of all, especially in opportunity.
2. The responsibility of the group for all its members.
3. Useful work available for and incumbent upon all.
4. Decent conditions of living for everyone.
5. Adequate education and opportunity for the children.

We believe in these things for ourselves entirely and unitedly and many of us long to see them extended to all about us.

As we endeavor to carry this desire into action, two courses will be open to us.

The first is along lines of individual responsibility. Let us query of ourselves something after this manner.

1. Are we careful not merely to live within the bounds of our circumstances, but to avoid all extravagance, ostentation, and the luxury which imposes burdens on others?

2. Do we seek in buying goods or making investments to know something of the labor conditions on which mercantile businesses and securities are founded and to avoid all cheapness and rates of interest that take advantage of the necessities of others?

3. Is it our aim to pay such wages to those in our employ as shall secure them comfortable living conditions?

4. Do we who are landlords know that the houses which we control are in such condition as to make respectable living possible, and that our tenants are not engaged in occupations which are detrimental to society?

5. Do we make every effort to extend the Christian principles which we profess to the business in which we are engaged?

The second course of action is co-operation with other agencies working for a just and Christian state. Quite fundamental changes may be necessary and only collective action can bring them about. In these activities we must have a new economic point of view with its major emphasis on human worth and personality rather than on economic wealth. Along these lines are work in Consumers' Leagues, on commissions for better housing, in support of legislative measures for limiting the working hours of women and for the abolition of child labor. They will include the more difficult subject of an eight-hour working day and numerous questions that are urged by the friends and representatives of labor. They may also reach matters which come close home to some of us, the taxing of the unearned increment of land, heavily graded taxes on large incomes and inheritances, and the various measures which seek to prevent the control of natural resources and of the accumulated wealth of the country from falling into the hands of a small and dominant group.

Toward some of these questions we are now adopting a mental attitude and we may soon be called to vote upon them. Many signs indicate that we have already entered a period of great social and industrial change. Since the Society of Friends would not claim that it had had much to do with establishing the present industrial order which is avowedly founded on the principle of selfishness, of each person's doing the best he can for himself without regard for the interests of others, and since many Friends have lived above and beyond selfish principles, there is no reason why we should dread or regret a change.

The Christian Church has lost much in the past by its conservatism. New ideas come forward from time to time, and in spite of great opposition, take their place among the beneficent influences of humanity. When the Church has opposed these movements, the leadership of them has sometimes fallen upon those who made no Christian profession. To-day, for instance, of those opposed to war in principle, far more are outside the Christian Church than within. With fearlessness and indifference to the judgment of the world, let us try to know our duty in opinion as well as in action, and endeavor in all ways open to us, to extend to the people about us the favorable conditions of living which we have secured for ourselves.

Let us seek that unprejudiced point of view and that power which enabled the sensitive soul of John Woolman to see so clearly to the very heart of these problems. These observations which we quote from his "Words of Caution and Remembrance to the Rich" apply to our times as they did to his, for judged by his standards most of us belong to the class to which the caution is addressed.

"Were all superfluities and the desire of outward greatness laid aside, and the right use of things universally attended to, such a number of people might be employed in things useful that moderate labor with the blessing of Heaven would answer all good purposes, and a sufficient number would have time to attend to the proper affairs of civil society."

"If more men were usefully employed, and fewer ate bread as a reward for doing that which is not useful, food and raiment would on a reasonable estimate be more in proportion to labor than they are at present."

"Wealth is attended with power, by which bargains and proceedings contrary to universal righteousness are supported; and hence oppression, carried on with worldly policy and order, clothes itself with the name of justice and becomes like a seed of discord in the soul. And as the spirit which wanders from the pure habitation prevails, so the seeds of war swell and sprout and grow and become strong until much fruit is ripened. O, that we who declare against wars, and acknowledge our trust to be in God only, may walk in the light, and therein examine our foundation and motives in holding great estates. May we look upon our treasures, the furniture of our houses, and our garments, and try whether the seeds of war have nourishment in these our possessions."

"To set at liberty them that are oppressed" was proclaimed by Jesus to be a part of His mission. And John Woolman, after warning against the insidious power of "even the smallest degree" of oppression ends his message with this challenge to us all: "To labor for a perfect redemption from this spirit of oppression is the great business of the whole family of Christ Jesus in this world."

Signed on behalf of the Social Order Committee,

THOMAS K. BROWN,
AGNES L. TIERNEY,
BERNARD G. WARING.

PHILADELPHIA, Third Month 26, 1918.

LETTER FROM RUSSIA.

DEAR MARY:— Tenth Month 28, 1917.
I forgot the heading to my letter this time, probably, therefore you will never receive this.

Some of your letters, I am afraid, have been lost, as I have not heard from anyone for almost a month now.

To-day has been my birthday or thereabouts, and we have been celebrating it? by having a gathering of every one of the workers south of Buzuluk (who are not going back to England next week) to talk over plans for future work. The meeting was called very hurriedly, and the Canadian doctor, who lives here, invited them all to come here; which made a pleasant little surprise for me, considering I'd had the housekeeping only four days.

There were eighteen people for a house usually holding four. But the servants here are nice, and quite happy to show off their abilities, so we filled one entire room with hay and tacked canvas down on top of it (the canvas will later be used for padded coat's lining), and seven men slept there, under coats and lap-ropes; the other bed-rooms, which usually housed three women, housed nine. We had brought over all the spare beds from the hospital (hard things they are, merely boards on iron bars, and a straw filled ticking over, but they are not so bad as they sound). I had expected somehow that we would always be sleeping on damp floors or under the stars, here in Russia, so our usual comfort is a surprise.

The meeting didn't amount to much more than we already knew, but it gave us all a chance to see one another. Two sheep were bought, and pumpkin pie was inaugurated by Gulda and me, a fair success. Gulda doing the pie, and I the pumpkin. Do send me a cook book, and a weekly newspaper, perhaps the Sunday Ledger, the English people have an awful idea of our yellow journalism, and I think that might help them a little.

You can't imagine how hungry one is for current news here; we see a poor imitation of a paper about once a month. It is printed in Petrograd in English and has nothing vital at all in it, but we almost memorize it.

I'm still hoping to be able to study a little Russian some time, but my days and evenings are still pretty full.

The nurse here and I entirely revolutionized the house the other afternoon, changing around all the bed-rooms, and turning one beautiful big one into the main living and dining-room. It's a better finished house than the other place I was in, being all done in white plaster throughout. Our main room now is about twenty feet long by fourteen feet wide, with three big windows facing the East, so that at breakfast we watch the sun rise. The floors are painted a sort of yellow ochre—very popular with all official buildings here, and we have yellow benches around the walls, a couple of sheep-skin rugs on the floor, and a couple of bright colored woven ones. The former are dirty and the latter a hideous mixture of magenta and orange and bright blue, but never mind—they do make one feel hot to look at them. Then on the walls we have a few water color sketches (pretty poor), my screaming orange ash from Japan—which also makes one warm to look at, and a crude shelf for our few books—also I forgot the unforgettable icon, or religious picture, which must always be in one corner of a Russian house. It doesn't have to be a picture, but must be a religious article, and ours is not so bad—a brass figure of Christ, with a dark frame.

Our centre-dining table I despise. It's a poor thing of boards, knocked together and covered with elderly blue checked oil-cloth, and the chairs are not used to weights such as mine and groan fearfully. The men here usually sit on stools.

Our bed-rooms are simpler affairs—two beds usually, one, often with a woven spring and cotton mattress—this is always occupied by a hony person. I really prefer the hard ones, as you know where you're at, on them. Then a table with a tin basin, an earthenware pitcher, and whatever comes handy for a tooth mug; some times it's a real tumbler, more often a mug of local manufacture, which being unglazed, won't hold water very well, and being unsteady on its seat, frequently spills in a second what it otherwise might contain for the necessary length of time. If one has a rear room, one throws the used contents of the basin out of the window, but if you face on the front street you keep up appearances and have for wash water a leaky tin bucket. We can't buy any more buckets anywhere, and what we shall do when these are impossible, I don't know.

Our dishes are even funnier, by now nothing matches—we eat soup out of anything—from a wash basin to a cream jug, and when we have company we have to share knives and forks. It isn't that we're poor, but they can't be had.

I must close and write for more kerosene and apricots and beans—it's a bit inconvenient having the corner grocery fifty miles away.

Ten years ago I had a birthday in Garfield, and now my thirty-first is in Russia, the intervening ones, I think, have all been at home. Where will the forty-first be, I wonder?

I would like to write saying that the coming winter will see me comfortably settled here, with one doctor and one nurse, both of whom are quite nice; but as soon as one plans something, circumstances unite to change it, so I desist.

Nancy and Lydia are to be joined by Amelia F., as things have had to be re-arranged, owing to the shrinkage in nurses. We have in the Unit now only two fully trained ones.

With love,

ANNA J. HAINES.

NOTES FROM JAPAN.

ELIZABETH BINFORD.

TRAVELING THIRD CLASS.

Going up to Karuzawa on business recently the train was crowded with people all beyond middle age or old—now a silk garment on a single one—all dressed in the cotton homespun of the country folk. Every one I saw looked tired and all looked like hard-working people. Getting into conversation with the man who crowded next me I gathered some interesting details of this excursion.

"Yes, four hundred of us—more women than men, although not many more. It is an eighteen days' trip—yes, we are now on our way to Zenkōji, a famous temple in Nagano. We stay the night there. Three days in Kyoto, one in Osaka, three in Tokio, three in Nikko, etc. Yes, we visit all the great temples as far south as Osaka. O, yes, we see many other things." Just then the guide—a young man of twenty-five, in a foreign suit and unlit cigarette—called the attention to a mountain—Miyōgi San—and at once came questions—"Is there a god there?" "Yes," said the guide, "there is a god there and a temple, but it is a hard climb," and then passes a lunch to each one, consisting of two new pine boxes—the lower one containing rice and the upper various things such as a bit of lotus root, egg, small dried fish, radish, beans, etc.

My friend continues, "Yes, we paid the money down before we started," (thirty yen apiece), but "we all have to buy many extras so that the average cost will be fifty yen each on this trip. Yes, twenty thousand yen—twenty thousand yen! Very interesting figures!"

Ten thousand dollars spent by a group of four hundred men and women of the supposed poorer class—all from one district in Yamagata Province—Tendo machi—to go to worship at temples!

Coming down from Kaurizawa our car was almost empty. A nice looking man came in—much under the influence of strong drink. He saw Herbert Nicholson, Gurney Binford and myself and he rubbed his head—"Am I right? I've made a mistake perhaps." He then walked clear outside again to see whether he had really gotten into a third class car! "Yes, it is. Why are foreigners in third class?" He tried to listen to our reading—he interrupted—I dropped a wafer on the floor. He picked it up and handed it to me. I said, "Yogorite imasu, irimasen." (It's dirty, I don't want it.) Then he warmed up to Gurney. "I can't understand what you are reading, but I understand your wife's English. She said, 'Yogorite imasu,' and I understand that. Unfortunately I understand very little English—'katsuretsu' (cutlets), 'raisu kare' (rice currie),—and oh yes, 'biru han daz' (half dozen bottles of beer)." A pathetic vocabulary!

WAITING FOR LEADING.

GURNEY BINFORD.

It was the last week in First Month and my co-worker and I had been talking about what we should do on the last Sabbath of the month. Finally, Seventh-day evening, Totsuka San said he felt like staying at the Mito meeting the next morning. Then I said I would be free to go to Minato, though I did not know what work the Lord had for me there.

I took the early morning boat so as to get there in time for the children's meeting. Soon after getting off the boat some one called me by name from behind and looking round I could not remember the young farmer until he told me his name. Then I recognized him as an inquirer whose name I had gotten at a one-day tent preaching in Mito about three years ago. A little more than a year ago he was at a tent meeting in Minato and we talked with him for nearly two hours and nearly led him to decide for Christ.

I saw at once from his face and manner that his heart was sad and that he seemed to have found me when not looking for me. He did not answer my questions as to his present condition or why he was there in Minato. His home is about ten miles from this town. So I had to feel my way in talking with him as we walked along. I asked him to come in with me to the meeting place.

There was quite a group of children playing around, but they said there would be no Sabbath-school that morning. I asked if their teacher was sick and one answered, "No, his convenience is not good!" I was a little troubled, but said nothing, for I was so interested in talking with my friend, the farmer, who had entered the room with me. We soon had our Bibles out and he was asking questions about things he could not understand. I was pleased, for it showed he had been reading his Bible.

Soon the little sister of the teacher came in with a note from him saying, "I have committed sin and cannot teach the children this morning, but must spend the time in prayer." I put up a secret prayer for him and went on talking to my country friend. After about half an hour the teacher came into the meeting place, looking flushed and almost angry, but when he saw me earnestly talking with an inquirer his face changed, and, after salutations and introduction, he sat and listened. Soon he had entered into the conversation. After about an hour together we knew that the young farmer was away from home for two or three days of quiet thought, separated from his family troubles. In trying to help him the teacher was himself helped; for was not his own sin impatience in his own family with wife and children, mother and sisters? By this time two or three others had come in and the teacher, with tears and sobs, acknowledged his own sin and begged God's forgiveness and mercy with him until he could overcome his weakness and make a truly Christian home with happiness unbroken.

Another one of the group is the postmaster, who is an earnest Christian and has special gift in prayer. After the meeting he and the teacher had soon arranged that the farmer inquirer should stay in the meeting-place and they would introduce him to places where he could get meals cheaply and they would teach him and pray with him.

I had to leave at one o'clock to go to another appointment, but have since heard that the inquirer remained two days and before he left they had taken him to the homes of two other Christians and with their help and prayers had led him to repentance and prayer and faith which gave him peace and joy, and he returned to his home with courage to believe that in his own village he could do a work to help to bring to it salvation.

A failing First-day school teacher and an almost hopeless young farmer blessed by following the leadings of the Spirit as to the place and way to go for that day. That same evening, in Takahagi, our most northern station, I presided at a meeting in which four school children made public confession of faith and signed their names in the believers' book of the station.

Truly the Lord is good and giveth leading and assurance of blessing to those who humbly seek His guidance.

A STARTLING DIAGNOSIS.

NOTE—The following article has been offered to The American Friend by the author, who writes, "In various matters my own tastes agree with the Friends, though I am not one denominationally."

"Human thought is in an alarmingly paranoiac condition," a Californian astronomer wrote two years ago, and added by way of explanation, "A paranoiac is liable to become violent at any time."

It is a little surprising to have an opinion like this come from an astronomer. Such a diagnosis might be expected from a physician, as a paranoiac condition is a diseased condition, in which as in other diseases, organs and tissues are perverted from their normal functions. The mind in this state loses its power to act with love, faith, patience, humility, and all other enduring virtues, and expends its energies in fitful gusts of misdirected and frantically violent effort, that call into action the violent intervention of others.

An astronomer's opinion on any subject of such importance as the prevailing condition and trend of the human mind is especially worthy attention, as his point of vision is trained in lines very different from the general mass of mortals, and for that reason the masses should not scorn his opinion.

The astronomer's eye is trained to read celestial messages and signs; and when after years of communion with the celestial, he turns his vision back over the terrestrial world, and tells the inhabitants how they appear in celestial light, it is well to listen. His opinions may coincide with other heavenly messengers that have come at different times. In this instance the astronomer agrees with the prophets of Jehovah who years ago recognized the similarity between tendencies to violence and disease.

During the two years that have passed since this astronomer made his diagnosis from the celestial atmosphere of his observatory, events have transpired which prove him authoritative. The paranoiac condition of the public cannot now be denied. Every citizen of America has been led to feel the prevalence of violent motives that have been displayed in Germany. In the [First Month] number of the Atlantic Monthly, Adele and Russell Phillips describe the change that came over the German people in the course of a few months. A similar change is affecting the once tender expressions of the American citizen.

Violence is found to be increasing, even in the most quiet neighborhoods. The newspapers of this country echo and re-echo the murderous ambitions and threats commenced by one barbarously inclined monarchy across the water. Into the most remote hamlets these echoes permeate, and the germ seems to increase sporadically; even the home, the pulpit, and the professing Christian press have not escaped the contagion. Insidious temptations come to gain one's end by violence, in small matters as in great.

An immense body of toiling mortals calling itself a church supports officials whose oath of office binds them to combat opponents of their religion with violence and force of arms whenever necessary. By such paranoiac methods this church (?) plans to convert the world.

The vital tissues of humanity are being woefully wasted by this disease, and from the wastage what myriad germs rise to perpetuate the contagion! What a way for a church to seek to gather into the Divine Kingdom "every kindred, every tribe on this terrestrial ball" by force of arms! What a way for parents to gain what they want of their children, and children to gain their way with their parents, by continued recourse to violence! No wonder society is diseased; scarce a house from which the infection is not spreading!

But listen! The eye trained in Christian faith can see the remedy without the aid of the mechanism or the training of the astronomer. The remedy is in the teaching of Christ, the Great Physician, who came to heal all manner of disease among the people.

Already the United States Government is planning what use to make of certain resources when the war is over. To hasten this glad day every home, every church which accepts the name of the Great Physician, should contend, clad in the whole armor of God, against the insidious temptations of violence. May the thousands of Christians who are praying for the end of present bloodshed work in harmony with their faith to wipe out the paranoiac germs.

PRINCETON, Massachusetts.

MY ORCHESTRA.

These are my violins—the Mignonettes,
The Lilies-of-the-Valley, the Jasmines white.
The Roses are my harps; and much delight
Their odorous chords afford, soothing regrets
And bitter memories. The Violets,
They are my flutes whose tones both soft and bright,
Soaring silverly in melodious flight
Weave all the other strains in perfumed nets;
Each blossom in my garden hath its notes
Whose wondrous music through the summer floats
In sweet and dream-alluring symphonies.
O, weary-heart, come share my great content,
Come listen to my orchestra of scent
Led by the voiceless baton of the breeze.

—SAMUEL MINTURN PECK, in the Transcrip't.

To make the world a bright and pleasant place where only the good can enter and where no one need distrust himself or be miserly of his gifts—that is the essence of a woman's hospitality.—LILLIAN HART TRYON.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT

Vol. 1.

FIFTH-DAY, FOURTH MONTH 18, 1918.

No. 2.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT.

A MONTHLY SUPPLEMENT TO THE FRIEND.
DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF YOUNG FRIENDS.

Editor—EDWARD W. MARSHALL.

Associate Editors.

JANE C. MOON IRVIN C. POLEY
A. DOUGLASS OLIVER EDITH STRATTON
ALICE TRIMBLE.

EDITOR'S ADDRESS—20 SOUTH TWELFTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

PUBLISHED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF
THE PHILADELPHIA YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Standing out clearly against a dark background of war conditions at home and abroad, the Yearly Meeting just concluded seemed like a steady beacon of strength and guidance to us. With its stirring, clear-cut messages still fresh in our minds, we believe that it will be remembered in years to come as a Yearly Meeting of unusual breadth of vision, one with a far-sighted conception of the position which the Christian Church must take in the future if it is to continue to minister to the spiritual needs of the world.

The Young Friends' Annual Conference, held on the preceding Seventh-day, proved to be a fitting introduction to this Yearly Meeting. Probably between five and six hundred Young Friends—almost one-half of the total number of Young Friends in the Yearly Meeting, and an Elder or Overseer from each local meeting—gathered together in the afternoon and evening to consider the subject of the Conference, "Mobilization of Young Friends for their Spiritual Task."

It was a time of the utmost inspiration to those present. A spirit of sympathy and fellowship was apparent from the first, and when, one after another, representatives from various sections of the Yearly Meeting told of the spontaneous growth of a group of Young Friends in their midst who were drawn together by a mutual desire to know more about things of the Spirit, a feeling akin to enthusiasm overspread the meeting at the vision of a widespread Young Friends' Movement progressing—not as the result of systematic organization—but as the natural outcome of a common spiritual unrest impelling Young Friends to seek together for Light. And as time went on this feeling was succeeded by the deep religious sense assured by the better appreciation of the spiritual tasks confronting Young Friends and by the insistent call to a complete personal consecration which was sounded again and again by different speakers.

Early in the meeting, an impressive message from the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee was delivered by Francis R. Taylor. This message, which is printed in full on another page, was surely of help to many of us whose sympathies, interests and natural impulses in regard to the war and military service conflict with our convictions on the subject. The paper should be read seriously and with searching of heart by every Young Friend in our Yearly Meeting.

The Young Friends' spiritual task was further outlined by Henry Tatnal Brown in a message from the Yearly Meeting Social Order Committee. He presented in a clear, convincing way the importance of a better understanding of the problems of the social order and our responsibility in aiding in their solution. His address will appear in our next number.

J. Passmore Elkinton, Chairman of the Young Friends' Committee, gave an enlightening definition of the functions of that Committee. He brought out the fact that an elaborate organization of Young Friends is unadvisable at this time and that the Young Friends' Movement would be of more service if allowed to develop normally in the various meetings, as it is already doing without any strong outside influences. The Central Committee will act in an advisory capacity, to the local groups, stimulating their interest in their meetings and Fellowship activities. The Committee will also continue its present general work for the Young Friends' Movement as outlined hereafter in an article headed "The Constituency and Present Work of the Young Friends' Committee."

The proposed plan of increasing the interest of Young Friends in mission work through the merging of the Young Women's Auxiliary into a more representative organization with a broader scope was described by Rebecca Carter, President of the Auxiliary, and is also printed on another page.

One of the features of the Conference was the series of short talks by representatives from organized groups and unorganized communities. These reports proved to be intensely interesting as evidencing the surprising strength of the Young Friends' Movement in the local meetings. The experiences of the various groups, their accomplishments, the religious spirit back of it all, the earnestness and sincerity of the speakers and their evident belief in the great good arising from their gatherings impressed the hearers, and gave them a clearer understanding of the true intent of the Young Friends' Movement than they could obtain in any other way. Many left the Conference with a feeling that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting must, sooner or later, feel the power of the spiritual Life which is stirring among these Young Friends and drawing them together with a common bond. A summary of the various reports is contained in the article on another page entitled "The Results of the Questionnaire." An interesting paper was presented by Wendell Oliver, a C. O. at Camp Dix. This paper also appears in this issue.

In the final address of the afternoon, Edith Stratton pointed to the three spiritual tasks previously mentioned, peace, social order and mission work. She defined the word mobilization as "calling into active service" and made a strong appeal to Young Friends to listen to the call, to enter upon active service for the Kingdom of God, the prime essential for which is power from above. She urged Young Friends also to establish vital connections not only with their local meetings and every member of them, but with the Yearly Meeting as well. In closing she quoted that wonderful passage by George Fox, "I saw an ocean of darkness and death; but over the ocean of darkness and death, I saw an infinite ocean of light and love and therein I saw the goodness of God," and then called upon Young Friends to become devoted messengers of this light and live torch-bearers in a dark world. This session was closed with a short period of silent worship.

In the evening, emphasis was laid on the fundamental importance of a complete personal consecration and the joyous spirit of adventure which it creates.

The first speaker, Janet Payne Whitney, of London, England, dwelt upon the latter aspect of the subject in her address on "Quakerism, a Religion of Adventure." She told of the seeming recklessness which was a characteristic of early Christians, beginning with the disciples sent forth by Christ to preach without money or provisions for the journey, and continuing until the Church finally sank into a rut after compromising its principles for political power; how centuries after, George Fox found the secret of Life in his own soul after he had failed to find it elsewhere, and was led by the Spirit to engage in a life-long adventure.

She spoke of how much courage is abroad in the world to-day because of the war; how the young men of England enlisted cheerfully and enthusiastically to risk their lives for their ideals; how many young English Friends wanted to show their mettle by an alternative method and in many cases reached the conclusion that the only alternative service which would involve a sacrifice equal to that of a soldier would be an enlistment for life in the service of Christ. The fact that this and all it involved seemed to them such a real sacrifice, showed that the Society had, in a way, "gone to seed" and lost the early Friends' conception of a Christian's duty.

She related the great dangers and hardships faced by a woman-author who ventured across submarine-infested waters into the unsettled Balkans to study first-hand the terrible conditions there and publish an exposé of them; how this woman had the adventurous spirit which every Christian should have. Patriotism inspired her bravery, should not Christianity do at least as much?

In concluding, she reminded the meeting that in the days of George Fox one Quaker was said to have "shaken the country for seven miles around," and that the Society of Friends could shake the whole world to-day if it should be "reborn" and should go forth with the same spirit of adventure as its founder.

George L. Jones, of Westtown School, in his address on "The Unprecedented Call for Personal Consecration" touched the same underlying note from a different standpoint. He spoke in substance as follows:

All humanity in these days is on a new quest of adventure. For centuries the quest was for new territory, for unknown lands, but it now is a quest for a religion, a Christianity which will satisfy the heart, as the heart of George Fox was satisfied years ago. No matter how advanced religiously we may be, our souls are still yearning for the unfound.

We are proud of our civilization, of our country, our schools and colleges, our great organizations and our national wealth. We live in comfort—many in luxury. And yet, "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Our civilization alone is insufficient. The things of the soul are infinitely more important than the things of the body. Will anything short of a complete personal consecration satisfy us?

A life of consecration means that we lay before Christ our life plans asking, "What wilt thou have me to do?" It means a life of sacrifice for which, however, He gives much in return.

The world is hungering for this life, although it does not appear so. Everywhere there is a longing for the something which the world and often the Church does not give.

If we can exemplify the Christ-life, the leaven in the lump, we will manifest the religion which the world needs. But Christ demands a high type of consecration, one which will stand up under any trials. We must visualize Jesus, and try to make Him occupy a place in our lives above all others. We must try to believe like Him and to sacrifice like Him—not merely giving, but giving up. He made it clear that He did not want half-hearted followers. He wanted men of tremendous convictions who would stand for the things He stood for. And to-day He wants just such men and women with deep convictions to follow His advice above any earthly advice, to undertake the greatest adventure of all in His name.

E. W. M.

THE AMERICAN AND THE ENGLISH C. O.

A CONTRAST.

I have been asked to contrast briefly the position, as far as it can be ascertained, of the conscientious objector to military service in England with that in the United States.

It is not very easy to do, partly because as a new-comer to this country I may not be fully aware of the attitude that Friends and others in many places may be taking up, and partly because the attitude of the government is not as yet perfectly manifest, and consequently the out-and-out conscientious objector is more or less in a position of waiting to see where his duty lies. I suppose this is an intentional policy, to weed out the men whose objection is not so much to the principle of war as to personally engaging in fighting and killing—the dirty work of warfare—from those others who are against the whole business of war, and believe that it will not be eliminated until "the consent of the governed" cannot be given to the most indirect participation in it.

This latter position is the one officially taken by the Society of Friends since the beginning of its history, and re-affirmed in terms to suit the modern situation by the London Yearly Meeting each year since the outbreak of the present war.

The Society of Friends is a very individualistic body as a result of its central doctrine of the Inner Light "that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." It lays down no laws for its members, but only seeks to remind them by weighty "General Advices" and searching "Queries," read at stated intervals in the meetings, what the experience of the Society has taught it to consider the primary indications that a soul is living in the true Light. This emphasis on corporate experience, as a guide and corrective to merely individual experience, keeps the democracy of the Society of Friends from degenerating into anarchy, but it does not enforce unanimity. To the outside world, however, and probably even to itself in time of peace, the testimony of Friends against all war was so apparently unanimous that frequently the outsider's sole knowledge of "the Quakers" was that "they were the people who didn't fight." It remained to be seen how this essential corollary to the doctrine of the Inner Light would stand the test of a national war—national on a hitherto unprecedented scale, and defended by the press as a war for liberty and democracy against tyranny, autocracy and militarism. "The war to end war" was the favorite slogan which called young idealists to the colors in the early days, but of which one hears very little now on the English side of the Atlantic. The cry is now for military training in the schools to prepare for the next—possible—war, against some new aggressor.

In times of sudden crisis the action of an individual is largely determined by the habits of thought and action which he has formed during the days of comparatively ordinary life. The light he sees, no matter how earnest his swift search for it may be, is limited and modified by the amount and kind of light that he is accustomed to seek and find. There are members of the Society of Friends—as of every other church—to whom what they term “mystical religion” has no meaning. They do not understand even the first elements of the mystery of prayer, and they do not seek spiritual guidance in the common things of life. If they did not happen to be of a Friends’ family they would not be Friends at all, but their religious convictions are not great enough to cause them to cut loose from their familiar environment and family tradition and join some other church, or to belong to no church at all.

There are others who have strong religious instincts, but who keep their religion in one compartment and their business and political life in another. They are apt to consider “the Church” and “the world” as very separate spheres, and to require the world to come, little by little, into the Church, rather than the Church to reach out into and transform the world—socially, politically, internationally—like leaven working in dough.

People of these two classes probably form a substantial majority of church membership in England, outside the Society of Friends. There were enough of them within the Society of Friends to form a minority who took the popular view about the war. Those of military age mostly enlisted in the army or navy, during the first year of voluntary recruiting. The exact number is not yet ascertained, but since there is much evidence that it has been greatly exaggerated, the Society of Friends in England is now taking a questionnaire of its members of military age to place on record for the present and future generations the action during the war taken by each one. The opinion of the Friends’ Service Committee (English), the best informed body, was that the number of Friends in military service does not exceed two hundred. Of these most (if not all, but it is difficult to make a sweeping statement when every individual fact cannot be known) had evinced little interest in the Society of Friends, of which they were probably birth-right members only, and had taken little or no part in the Young Friends’ Movement.

There were men outside the Society of Friends who joined the army in a strong wave of religious emotion, sometimes individual, sometimes stimulated by the preaching in their churches; much the spirit in which men of old joined the Crusades. I think something of this feeling, in one way or another, touched those young Friends who enlisted, and personally I am glad they did it, rather than stand by what was to them a dead tradition.

But I am still more glad that they were a small minority, and included none of those young Friends who had shown qualities of spiritual leadership, or marked dedication of life.

If it had included these I should be forced to think—as many do hold—that the same Light led in different directions, which would be too bewildering for faith.

The privately organized ambulance unit, somewhat daringly called the Friends’ Ambulance Unit (it has never been adopted by the Meeting for Sufferings or the London Yearly Meeting, but is still conducted by a private committee) absorbed at first some of both groups, but most of the extremists on both sides left it after the first eight or twelve months, some to join the army, and some to join the ranks of the out-and-out conscientious objectors. This was partly because the work of the Unit was made difficult by the authorities in the early days, and the men frequently ate their eager hearts out in idleness for days with the consciousness of dire need almost within reach; and partly because the organization of the Unit became more and more affected by military influence. From the beginning the men wore a military uniform; the present head of the Unit is not a Friend, nor in much sympathy with Friends’ views, and holds an honorary captain’s commission in the British Army. There are many things which now make it impossible for a man of sensitive and logical conscience to accept work in the F. A. U., even if the alternative, as it often is, should be imprisonment.

It is necessary at this point to mention the passing of the First Military Service Act, early in the second year of the war. This was an unsavory measure to democratic England, though

I firmly believe the militarist argument that you cannot conduct modern warfare efficiently without conscription. You must obtain power to organize the nation, whether you have the ability for it or not. Because of the amount of popular and Parliamentary opposition to it, however, the final form of the Act made it seem as fairly framed a measure as a conscription act could be. Its two best clauses were the total exemption (not the conditional exemption) of all conscientious objectors to military service that could make good their case before the Local Tribunal; and the appointment of Local Tribunals of influential citizens, with one legal adviser and one military representative, to hear personally all claims for exemption in their district—industrial, physical and conscientious.

If the Act had worked as smoothly as those who framed it intended, there would have been no conscientious objector problem in England—or at any rate, not enough of one to harass the government. The conscientious objector would have made his claim before his Local Tribunal, bringing reputable witnesses to the truth of his statement that his open objection to war had antedated the present conflict by many years, or even by a lifetime. He would have received his exemption, and would have retired from public notice, in most cases to perform some work, in spare time or as his career, for the service of his fellows. In any case, he would not have been a dead weight upon the country, both as a non-productive agent and as a being fed and clothed and housed (however wretchedly) at the country’s expense, with the glory of religious persecution about him, willy nilly.

The latter condition has been brought about partly by ill-chosen tribunals, who far from holding a level balance between the citizen and the military, were anxious to prove their patriotism vicariously by pushing as many men as possible into the army; partly by the military authority, who did not believe that genuine conscientious objectors to war existed—or if they did, that they could not be overcome by a sharp course of physical suffering—and therefore required the military representative on the Tribunals to appeal against every “conscientious” exemption, as well as against most others.

Both have learned their mistake by now, but dignity will not permit them to amend their ways. Only if a well-known conscientious objector seems about to die in prison, he is quietly released to recover, for fear of public outcry. Some less-known men have died in prison.

Two attempts have been made by the government to patch up the situation created by their subordinates. One was the creation of the Non-combatant Corps, which was to be under military discipline and wear the uniform, but was not to bear arms, and was to work on railway construction and other non-combatant work where required. A member of this corps might be ordered to dig trenches, lay barbed wire, etc.—do any odd job that was not fighting.

The other attempt sounded a good deal more intelligent in its comprehension of the C. O. point of view. It is called the Home Office Scheme, and purported to give work of national importance, but quite unconnected with the war (as far as anything now-a-days can be said to be that) and under civil control, to all proved conscientious objectors. The work was to include agriculture, teaching, industrial work, etc. Men already imprisoned as C. O.’s were allowed an equal opportunity to accept this scheme with those still going before the Tribunals. Many did so, but some afterwards rejected it and returned to prison, as the work of national importance they were allotted was the same as their prison work—making mail-bags—and they felt that to accept a scheme so administered was to beg the question. The idea of the scheme was probably more as a panacea to public opinion than a genuine attempt to meet the case of the C. O. Three thousand odd men in prison for conscience’ sake was—and is—beginning to tell on England’s “Non-conformists’ conscience,” including such leading High Churchmen as Lord Hugh Cecil.

I suppose the number of Friends in prison is about the same as the number in the army, or at any rate between two and three hundred. The majority have been more fortunate in having chosen work with the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee—reconstruction work in France, Russia, etc., or with the F. A. U. or with the Italian Ambulance Unit, several of the leaders and organizers of which are Friends. Although the law made no distinction between Friends and others, in practice many Tribunals expected "Quakers" to be conscientious objectors, and were ready to meet them half-way; but for this fact, the number of Friends in prison would probably be greater than it is.

One young Friend was closely interrogated by the Colonel of the regiment to which an unsympathetic Tribunal had consigned him.

"You're a Quaker," said the Colonel, "Well, I don't want Quakers here. They're of no use to me. I'll get you transferred to the Home Office Scheme for work on the land." The Friend said courteously that he would be unable to accept it. "Why not?" said the Colonel. "It's not fighting!"

"No," said the Friend, "It's substituting. I'd sooner go and fight myself than make it easy for some other man to be forced into the army." "Upon my word," said the Colonel, "You're the first genuine conscientious objector I've met!"

It is very inadequate to run over the situation in England so sketchily as this, but I must sum up by making the briefest possible contrast of the position there and here.

1. Friends in England had one free year in which to pour themselves out in service without the complications of conscription.

Friends in America have to deal right away with a Selective Draft Law.

2. Friends in England were able, during that year, to think out their position afresh, and count the cost of resistance to the government if that became necessary.

Friends in America have had three years for the same exercise, and the observation of the position in England as conscription progressed there.

3. Friends in England had to deal, not only with the problem of direct military service, but with that of substitution, under a system that finally conscripted every man between the ages of nineteen and forty-one.

It seems to me that the present selective nature of the Draft law here, and the vast resources of the country in men, lessens this danger if it does not entirely do away with it.

4. There is no such thing as a pro-German party in England. I am assured by reliable people that there really is one in the United States, which complicates the issue for the genuine conscientious objector.

5. On the other hand, the President and the Secretary of War seem anxious to do justice to the genuine C. O. and in the long run to allow him to choose some form of service to his fellows which will consort with his best aspirations. The recent declaration of the President will not, in its specified forms of non-combatant service, satisfy the man whose objection is to the principle of war. It will only meet the case of the man who does not mind what others have to do, or what he does, so long as he personally does not have to fight.

But it seems probable that the man who is sincerely determined to do nothing that will compromise his principles or cause another to do so, will in the end meet with more sane and reasonable treatment from the American Government than the English could compass.

I do not believe that anyone, however, can hold out in a struggle of this kind, even in the absence of physical cruelty, unless, like his brother in the trenches, he is prepared to go the whole length of dying for his faith.

The only faith that is strong enough to face death, against and not with the popular stream, is a faith that has already been tested by life.

JANET PAYNE WHITNEY.

THE PEOPLE AT HOME.

[Extracts from a letter written by one of our members engaged in Reconstruction Work. By request, his name is not given.]

I am afraid that last Summer I was very narrow-minded in my view of "life as usual." While I am still of the opinion that the only course open to me was to come over, I am quite convinced that for most people, especially at this late date, preparation for after the war activity is the most urgent call.

Nothing is farther from the truth than to think that those at home are doing nothing while we in Europe "are doing so much." I should like to repeat that a hundred times, to impress it more strongly on all your minds. To suppose that, because one is on the east side of the Atlantic one's work in the aggregate is of more benefit to humanity, is a great, great mistake.

The answer to one's personal problem is not comparative but absolute. It is not what someone else is doing, but what is right for the individual.

A MESSAGE FROM A C. O. IN CAMP.

I come from one of the greatest colleges in the land. It is not a college whose halls are marble-floored. It has no imposing buildings in which the sciences are taught. Its foundation does not date back to the early days when the country was in its infancy. In those things that make the campus of a great university so attractive it is decidedly lacking.

Indeed, the college I come from has none of these things. It is a new college. But a year ago, upon the gentle slopes of its campus the lowing cattle peacefully were grazing. Now what a change. Chanticleer no longer calls the sleeping world about him to be up and doing; the reveille of war has taken his place. Many of the fertile fields where the farmer so recently toiled have been ruined by the ashes of many furnaces and the subsoil of the trenches. In place of the picturesque and homelike farm buildings has arisen, as in a night, the buildings of the college I come from, a college where sentiment and home life are banished and in their stead the stern hand of militarism reigns supreme. Such is the contrast—peace and war.

Though the buildings are unkempt and plain, though the campus be devoid of those things that go to make college life so enjoyable, the college I come from is one of the greatest in the land. For there we learn the stern realities of life. We see the consequence of man's trust and man's distrust in man. But primarily it is man's distrust in God that is our most important object lesson. We see him vainly pursuing humanity's greatest illusion, and casting aside that Power which alone can bring the desired ends of peace on earth and good-will to men—everlasting peace, which is the avowed purpose of the great disaster.

It is a wonderful lesson to those of us who are taking the special course because our consciences will not allow us to enter the prescribed course in which the college specializes. It is such a wonderful lesson that I dare say there is none of us but who will thank God all the days of his life that he has thus been entered and educated in this, one of the greatest colleges in the land.

Ours has been the lot to study the crisis in its Christian aspect. We have been favored to get more light on the situation than we ever had before. We have the solution of the great problem of the prevention of war, which to many is as abstruse as the fourth dimension. Trust in God is the solution. The application of His teachings in everyday life will settle all disputes. Christ in business will mean equality for all, and the despotic rule of none. In the knowledge of these things have we been educated.

All over the country are other colleges just like the one I come from. In almost all, I believe, are those who are taking a special course like ourselves. What an immense storage battery is being charged. Fortified with the knowledge that the hope of the world lies in the love of Christ and the application of His teachings to everyday life, in business and in government, may we go forth after our graduation and spread this knowledge throughout the length and breadth of the universe. May we be active agents in the great work of bringing nations together in the alliance of love, that through the universal love and practice of the teachings of Christ, international good feeling rather than narrow nationalism may be the ruling spirit of the world.

DR. JOHN WATSON says that there are only two provinces of absolutely sure knowledge; one is pure mathematics, and the other is the experience of the soul.

WENDELL OLIVER.

CAMP DIX, N. J., Third Month 25, 1918.

OUR SPIRITUAL TASK.

A MESSAGE FROM THE PEACE COMMITTEE.

With the world on fire, Friends have been granted practical exemption from service under the Selective Service Act. In no other great war since the origin of our Society have we been so well understood. And conversely, probably no crisis in the world's history has ever found us more willing and able to serve humanity.

But this situation has grave and subtle dangers—all the more so because the dangers are of a spiritual nature. We are neutral by tradition, by training, and many of us, by conviction. Since our own beloved country entered the Great War, the question of the major loyalty due to the God and Saviour, who loves not nations, races and peoples, but mankind as a whole, has become so complex a problem that its true solution lies in prayer alone. The sublimity of America's undertaking, her fervent and sincere disavowal of ulterior motives, and the lofty tenderness of devotion with which her young men have responded to her call, inevitably bring the hot tears of generous admiration welling up into our eyes. That wonderful stirring of patriotic emotion deep down in the very centre of one's being is a marvelous and precious experience. I freely admit that the sight of marching men, the inspiration of martial music and above all the sublime symbolism of the most beautiful of banners impress me with a mighty influence of grandeur and sublimity, at times almost irresistible.

And then over against the tramp of the marching thousands and the fluttering of the purest of national emblems, comes the vision of the Man of Galilee,—the despised and rejected of men, and of those hours in Gethsemane, the supreme sacrifice and the paramount victory at Calvary. And again I hear the tramp of thousands—dusty, raucous, cursing, reviling; soldiery and civilians; coursing around the three crosses. "He saved others, himself he cannot save." And above it all, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Then down through the centuries those footfalls crowd thick and fast as His martyrs follow the way of the cross. Stephen, Savonarola, Galileo, Wyclif, Huss, Luther, Laud and Parnell, and in the confused sound of the footfalls, and the dust of the mobs that did them despite, the sign of the cross rises supreme over every other earthly symbol or consideration.

I have in a small way, during these terrible days, learned a little—oh, a very little, of what these men suffered in their martyrdom, and above all, what I realized in a new way, the significance of Gethsemane. Is there any one here, who has experienced, as I have, during the past few months, a weird and unhappy sense of loneliness? We have felt it to-day; we can feel it this moment, in the ominous dispatches from the other side. Will the broken line reform itself or will the forces of militarism triumph? We can have no part in the deadly struggle ourselves; far less part even than most of our countrymen and countrywomen, whose hearts and prayers are with their sons on that battle front. Is it any wonder that thee and I feel lonely in view of our voluntary withdrawal from participation in the sacrifice of those who have given and are giving their sons or themselves for their ideal? And as thee has struggled with this experience, has thy loneliness deepened into perplexity, until with tears in thy eyes, and a blind prayer in thy heart, thee has wandered out into the night and under the stars, prayed the Father in Heaven, that if it be His will, this cup—thy little cup, be taken from thee, and from the sin-sick world thee lovest? If so, my friend, thee has been on the borders of Gethsemane, and thy Saviour has been very close to thee.

The way of the Christian pacifist is to-day a lonely one, but how inexpressibly sweet does it make the communion with kindred spirits, and with the greatest of Comforters. If 'twere only martyrdom, 'twould be easy; but we are not called to martyrdom, we are granted exemption.

And with that thought I return to the grave and subtle dangers that threaten us. We are to-day not driven by the fervor of persecution or even serious misunderstanding. To others, rather than to us, comes the call for the surrender of their young men to dangerous service; but on that very account, to us more than to them, comes the summons to re-vitalize to the world the agony of Gethsemane. It is good for us to get under this burden of the world, to know and to feel the unhappiness of our social order, to appreciate the significance and seriousness of the economic forces operating in our midst to-day, and to cry out, not in despair, but with the Christian's dependence upon a loving and all-wise Father, and in the fulness of complete faith—"remove this cup from us."

We may devise plans, schemes and panaceas without number; we may legislate, we may organize for co-operation and uplift, but unless the spirit of the living God actuates the hearts and minds of men, political and social expedients, looking toward reform, are but husks and hulls without substance. The need lies far deeper than to make the world safe for democracy, for democracy itself still needs the vitalizing influence of Christianity to prove its right to permanence.

Herein, then, lies our task, a perilously subtle task, because no fires of persecution drive us to it. We must do it, because we want to, not because we must; we must assume it, because the power of God forces us, as of old, it forced Paul, who said, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel."

That Gospel is the same to-day as it was then. Our problems have changed, our world is different, but in every age His faithful have found it sufficient to solve their problems and to confirm their faith. Nay more, through their little Gethsemanes, that Gospel has led them, as through the world's agony of to-day it must lead us, to the foot of the cross.

FRANCIS R. TAYLOR.

RESULTS OF THE QUESTIONNAIRE.

As young Friends we are grateful to the Editors of THE FRIEND for their kind words in the editorial of Third Month 28th about our Conference held at Iwelfth Street the Seventh-day before Yearly Meeting. We have felt that loyalty to the Society and the deepening of the religious life were two notes that had been prominently struck also by the young Friends who represented local groups.

Thus far the Young Friends' Local Group movement, if such it may be called, has grown gradually and naturally according to the desire and needs of each meeting group. There has been no comprehensive plan nor have there been rules or regulations of any kind. Some start out as Round Tables; some as Fellowships; one calls itself a Christian Endeavor; another a Study Circle; but each has very definitely in mind the strengthening and helping of its own meeting.

Three questions have been sent out by our Secretary, Edith Stratton, to each group leader selected to speak at our Conference with the hope of obtaining thoughts that might enable us to work out a constructive summary. We give the questions and answers as follows:

1.—Is there any official connection between the Young Friends' Group and the Monthly Meeting?

Summary of the answers. In Moorestown, Wilmington, Media and Lansdowne Young Friends' Groups there is as yet no official connection; of the remaining four, the West Chester Study Circle was definitely started by a sub-committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting; the Haverford Round Table is operated under a local Young Friends' Executive Committee appointed by the Monthly Meeting to which it submits a written report, four overseers act as Advisory Committee and one overseer as moderator at each meeting; at Twelfth Street and Arch Street the representative on the Young Friends' Committee is appointed by the Monthly Meeting, and at the latter different overseers are invited as guests to meetings of the Fellowship.

2. As far as thee is able to judge, has the group Fellowship affected the vitality of or the interest in the regular meeting for worship? If affirmatively, has it manifested itself in vocal ministry, or in what way? If negatively, can thee explain why?

Answers:—

HAVERFORD—Not definitely, except an increased general interest in meeting.

MOORESTOWN—Probability that some vocal ministry has resulted; deepening of lives of those attending apparent.

WILMINGTON—Too soon to judge.

TWELFTH STREET—Too soon to judge.

ARCH STREET—An increased interest in meetings.

LANSDOWNE—Some evidence of increased responsibility, but very difficult to measure.

WEST CHESTER—An increased interest in and attendance of meetings. Some vocal ministry from members of the group.

MEDIA—Meetings deepened spiritually and more thoughtful interest taken in them.

(NOTE.—The above article refers only to organized local groups. At the Conference representatives from three other communities and two college groups made report as follows:—EDS.)

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.—The fact that this is a farm community and membership scattered makes it quite impracticable to get together when roads are bad. However, there are some Friends who are hungry for closer fellowship and who have the will to overcome difficulties.

HADDONFIELD.—With a nucleus of two small groups of young Friends already engaged in Bible study and with increased interest in religious matters manifested as a result, it seems probable that a local Fellowship will be formed.

GERMANTOWN.—A class of young married Friends of both branches who are studying Quakerism and Problems of the Social Order reported.

(NOTE.—There is in addition a very active Bible Class of younger Friends who send a representative to the Young Friends' Committee; and a number of young Friends in the community not reached by either group.)

COLLEGE GROUPS.

WELLESLEY.—This parent Friends' meeting of the colleges not under the care of Friends is struggling along with a faithful "two or three." It may seem wise to turn the meeting into a study group with the worship element retained, however, as an essential feature. The girls appeal for help in meeting the difficulties of the situation.

STATE COLLEGE.—One of the most virile Friends' meetings of Pennsylvania is probably that of the young Friends at State College, who were reported by a graduate. Their Quaker loyalty in these searching days and desire for closer connection with our Yearly Meeting and the Young Friends' Movement should stimulate a large response.

(NOTE.—We understand there is a Friends' meeting at Cornell and we should like to get into direct touch with other college groups organized or unorganized. Address Secretary of the Young Friends' Committee, 208, Twelfth Street, Phila.)

3.—How much conscious connection is felt between the group and the Central Young Friends' Committee or the movement at large? Would more be desirable? If so, how could it be effected?

Summary of the answers. In general there is little conscious connection felt between the local groups and the Young Friends' Committee or the movement at large; most of them feel that it is desirable to establish such connection though there is no desire apparent for a Yearly Meeting organization.

At first thought, when considering the welfare of these most cheering evidences of life and interest among the younger members of our Yearly Meeting, we naturally turn to organization as a means of furthering their growth. Friends know well how to organize and develop institutions as evidenced by successful hospitals, schools, summer resorts, shelters for the poor and needy. It is reasonable to suppose that if they set their hands to the task of organizing the Young Friends' Movement and its local Fellowships that success would crown their efforts. But would not such success be largely in terms of well-oid committees and sub-committees, complete "on time" reports and other earmarks of Quaker organizations? It is absurd to belittle organization, we all believe in it in its place, but as a result of the questionnaire and of the free expression at our inspiring Conference, we are convinced that when dealing in terms of group and personal consecration, when considering ways and means that young Friends may strengthen their own local meetings, organization as such is not one of the essentials.

We need our Young Friends' Executive Committee as at present, and if all its members were appointed by the meetings officially, it would strengthen still further that responsibility for regular meetings which local fellowships seem to be developing. We need our local groups and we look with favor upon their autonomy. We need our Young Friends' Conference just before Yearly Meeting. We need to encourage our Young Friends to go to Cedar Lake, Northfield and our own West-town Conference, where the spiritual side of the individual and the meeting are prominent parts of the deliberation. And then to co-ordinate these activities, we need, as we now have, an executive secretary with broad vision, and with a knowledge of Quaker fundamentals, one who will steer and encourage rather than organize and drive. Some one has said, "you cannot build from the outside a lasting reform." And so there is great hope in the knowledge that our Young Friends' Local Groups have grown of themselves because of a real local need, rather than because an executive committee thought and planned thus and so.

D. ROBERT YARNALL.

A NEW LIFE FOR THE AUXILIARY.

This winter the Young Women's Auxiliary found itself face to face with unusual conditions caused by the turbulent state of the whole world. We asked ourselves whether our present organization justified its existence. It became clear that it was illogical in that it included only half the young people of the Yearly Meeting instead of all. It emphasized only a part of the task of our Church instead of the whole. We realized that we needed as never before more personal interest in Foreign Missions, a clearer presentation of their claims and a stronger support of their activities.

At a time when we long to devote our best efforts toward educating public thought along international lines, foreign missions stand as one of the best possible channels through which to accomplish this end. We realized also that we have the opportunity as never before to find through fellowship together a message of Quakerism which can be expressed in terms of 1918 thought.

A group composed of representatives of the Foreign Missionary Association, the Young Friends' Committee and the Auxiliary has been meeting at intervals throughout this winter. From their deliberations the following plans have resulted:

A committee of ten is to be formed, composed of young men and women who believe that interest in foreign missions is one of the vital issues of the present time. They shall constitute a standing committee of the Young Friends' Committee and report to it. They shall meet with the Executive Committee of the Foreign Missionary Association and take part in its discussions and activities. They shall keep in touch with all our Student Volunteers. They shall assume all present responsibilities of the Young Women's Auxiliary. They shall meet by themselves for formulating plans. Upon them will rest the responsibility for developing missionary interest among all the young people of our Yearly Meeting. We shall look to them to find better methods of presenting the whole great subject and to inspire more hearty support of activities already undertaken. The Executive Committee of the Auxiliary at its meeting last Fourth-day, directed that the organization of the Auxiliary be dissolved and that its present interests be cared for by this new committee of ten.

By means of the plan just outlined, the young people of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are entering upon a new form of service. The spirit of the Auxiliary has found new life and a wider field. Whether that spirit can develop as it should, depends not on the Foreign Missionary Association Board, nor on the Young Friends' Committee, not on this new committee of ten nearly so much as it depends on you and me. A few people can plan and organize; they can draw the outlines. It is for us, the young people of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, to show that we have caught a glimpse of a great service. Shall we not become a group of clear thinkers whose interests will include the needs of humanity everywhere. Shall we not aim to become world citizens, filled with that spirit which knows no bounds of nation or color, but partakes of the love that includes all. This Committee of Ten aims to be the machinery to develop this interest and this devotion.

REBECCA CARTER.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, 1918, AS IT SEEMED TO SOME YOUNG FRIENDS.

[A few Young Friends were asked to write their impressions of the recent Yearly Meeting, and the following papers resulted:]

A stranger entering Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for the first time would undoubtedly be impressed with the spirit of reverence in which all the proceedings are conducted. She would almost certainly respond to the sense of fellowship which arises from the sight of seven hundred women drawn together in a great deliberative body.

Let us suppose that our visitor knew that Friends are essentially a democratic Society, that all power is vested in the meeting itself, and that on the individual member rests the responsibility for all discussions and for every decision. Would not such a visitor be astonished to note that less than fifty spoke freely on matters of business? She might be told that members are not supposed to "speak to business" without first weighing the matter in hand and earnestly seeking for guidance in all their expressions of opinion. She would naturally reply, "Why then does guidance come only to a few? Are all others seriously engaged to discover the truth for themselves that they may contribute their share to the judgment of the group? Again, is it possible that a few women are actually led to speak on every subject that presents itself? Is it not possible that in so doing she may take the time of someone else whose light on the subject may be clearer than her own?"

Our visitor might add in conclusion, "You have a message that the world longs to hear. Urge your members to feel the privilege and the responsibility of your business meetings. Let all your members come to meeting with an intelligent understanding of the business to be considered and with a sincere desire to learn the will of the Head of the Church for them and for the meeting. Some will feel less certain that their opinions are of value and many others will be willing to offer the best they have for the help of all.

The things that impressed me at the Yearly Meeting were not the customs or methods of conducting the meetings or business, but the business which was done and the spirit in which it was done.

The kind, liberal and brotherly interest, which was manifest by the Meeting as a whole towards the "other branch of Friends" and the Five Years' Meeting, was a surprise to me. I always had the idea that Philadelphia Friends were self-centered, that they gloried in their past and cared little for anything present except themselves. Instead of this I found that they were not radically different from Friends in other parts of the country. They were alive to the opportunities of the present as was shown by the reply to "those one hundred and twenty Friends" who had publicly renounced the Friends' peace views. That they have visions and are making plans for the future was shown by the studies of the Social Order Committee and the character of some of addresses given.

In short, I found Philadelphia Friends eager and willing to help and co-operate when the way is clear, thus making a hopeful prospect for a more united Quakerism in the near future in America.

A WESTTOWN UNDERGRADUATE.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL, Fourth Month 2, 1918.

EVERY young man and woman who can possibly do so, ought to attend regularly, year after year, the sessions of our Yearly Meeting. The quiet assembling of so many substantial persons is itself impressive; the moments of special solemnity that from time to time unite the body might affect even indifferent young persons. It is a liberal education in tolerance and willingness to forego one's pet ideas, to see how the knotty problems on which there is much difference of opinion, are finally threshed out and proceeded upon in substantial unity.

Yearly Meeting last year witnessed probably the last of the obvious compromises between the older element of Friends and the younger middle-aged group of men and women in whose hands the power of our meeting now clearly rests. We had this year no such striking debate as marked the fortunes of the proposal to send delegates to the Five Years' Meeting. There were no compromises this year, although there was ample opportunity for them.

Perhaps the two most striking matters that marked the sessions this year, striking because they mark a definite expansion into new, untried fields, were the appointment of a committee to investigate all the missionary activities of our Friends, and the receiving of the first report of the Social Order Committee. After nearly forty years of quiet, earnest effort, at first against much opposition, or in the face of indifference, and latterly on a great wave of vigorous support, the missionary interests are now firmly established as one of the principal efforts of our Yearly Meeting. The Committee that was appointed cannot, considering the great and growing interest in missions among our younger Friends, do anything but recommend a positive, constructive, statesmanlike scheme of incorporation next year.

The acceptance of the Social Order Committee's report again illustrates the changing tides of influence in our meeting. Our policy of isolation is definitely abandoned, and a large body of our younger business men, with the support of the meeting, is attacking the problem of industry and labor; it is reading the most radical literature on those topics, and such hated words as socialism and government ownership and single tax are becoming commonplace in our conversation.

Very impressive, although quite in line with our traditional views, were the exercises brought out upon the subject of peace. This was inevitable, considering how many of our young people are engaged in various sorts of work occasioned by the war; but the ringing re-affirmation of our testimony and the recognition of the efforts of President Wilson to establish democracy among nations was a support to a good many of our young men.

Inspiring also to the younger and middle-aged generation, who do not inherit certain old fears and animosities which have up till now dictated the policy of our Yearly Meeting, was the cordial sympathy expressed for other Yearly Meetings and other types of Quakerism. The coming together for beneficial co-operation of all branches of Friends is to be as marked a feature of the next twenty years, as the flying apart was a few generations ago.

Taking it altogether, the Yearly Meeting was marked by deep feeling, weighty concern, unity, a reaching out beyond our borders and a look to the future.

C. I. B.

It should be counted a real privilege to be able to attend all the sessions of our Yearly Meeting. If even one day is omitted we lose the trend of the business, and what is more important we get out of touch with that wonderful spirit which binds together the individuals of that large assembly. The way in which the spirit of worship pervades the business of the meeting, has much impressed me in the nine years that I have attended regularly. The exercise of patience, forbearance and love must be shared by each individual in a meeting where there is such liberty, or it could not be to our profit. Occasionally the pressure of business puts something of a strain upon the meeting. Too many long reports of the activities amongst us which are of greatest interest to those personally concerned, may become burdensome, if they leave no time for those periods of living silence when God's spirit may have free course amongst us, and for the exercise of that ministry which He appoints. Uniting thus with worshippers from far and near we receive spiritual refreshment, and are made to feel that our Yearly Meeting is a time of blessing to us.

M. ELIZABETH HAINES.

Two books by an English writer were published in 1916, which depicted the adventures of a band of people who had the vision and courage to try the weapons of "Love Omnipotent" in their efforts to secure a better world; to establish democracy and freedom, industrial and political. A call to such an endeavor seemed to be the dominant note of the last Yearly Meeting, from the Young Friends' Conference until the close of the sessions on Sixth-day.

The uncompromising statement of our position on Peace indicates that we have not entirely lost our faith, not only that there is a God, but that he is like Jesus. The report of the Social Order Committee, and the expressions from many in the meetings indicate a growing feeling that we must bring all our relations, business as well as international, into harmony with the spirit of the teachings of Jesus. The greater proportionate participation by those in the body of the meeting, than in any recent year, with the possible exception of last year's interesting but stormy session, gives great promise for the future. The practical unanimity of all not only relieved the feeling of antagonism which has sometimes been felt in the past, but bound us all together with a sense of spiritual solidarity which will be a great help in the times of testing which seem imminent, for those of us who have not already had a taste of them.

All these have combined to make this Yearly Meeting the most inspiring and helpful of any in recent years. May we be given strength and courage to try "the Great Adventure" to which it has called us.

E. A. V.

As we think back over Yearly Meeting we cannot but feel that it was a wonderful week—one of call to dedication for service. We, as a meeting, have bravely faced big things. We have been concerned not only with our own affairs, but with the sorrows and problems of the world. Our hearts have gone out in loving interest to all—to the C. O.'s, those in the armies, and to the sorrowing women the world over. We have felt the wider love for all, which has come from a closer fellowship with other groups of Friends. When we heard the Social Order report, and when we answered the Queries, we felt anew the importance of our living as Christ would have us, and our responsibility that others might so live.

Realizing our absolute inadequacy to meet the demand of the times, we have seen the need for that power and strength which come alone from following with trust the guidance of our Heavenly Father. We have felt that loyalty to Jesus Christ and a sense of His love is the only remedy for this needy world.

Having seen, may we with courageous faith "enlist for life, in the service of Jesus Christ."

MARY J. MOON.

THE CONSTITUENCY AND PRESENT WORK OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE.

CONSTITUENCY.

The Yearly Meeting is divided for the purpose of representation on this Committee into fourteen geographic sections, consolidating the smaller Monthly Meeting groups with a representative from each section chosen locally where possible. These official representatives, with a term of office of two years, are as follows:

Birmingham, (West Chester)—Margaretta Leeds.
 Chester, N. J., (Moorestown)—Henry Roberts (Treasurer).
 Chester, Pa. (Media-Chester)—Edith A. Hoopes.
 Falls (Fallsington)—Jane C. Moon.
 Frankford—Edith W. Hall.
 Germantown—Elizabeth P. Smith.
 Haddonfield—M. Louise Bell.
 Haverford—Hannah G. Dewees.
 Lansdowne—Elizabeth Pennell.
 Philadelphia (Arch Street)—Thomas W. Elkinton.
 Philadelphia (Twelfth Street)—Edith K. South.
 Western Quarter (Kennett, West Grove, Colorado)—Mary Palmer (Bertha Balderston).
 Westtown—(Not chosen).
 Wilmington—John S. Downing.

A Committee of six appointed annually by the Friends' Institute serve in advisory capacity to the General Secretary and are likewise members of the Young Friends' Committee. They are as follows:

Henry D. Allen; Lucy B. Roberts; Robert Balderston; Hannah P. Morris; Edward C. Wood (Vice Chairman); Ethel M. Whitson.

The following are members ex-officio during term of office: Rebecca Carter—President Y. W. A.
 Edith Stratton—General Secretary, Friends' Institute and Y. F. C.

Edward W. Marshall, Editor of THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT.

In addition there are the following members-at-large:— J. Passmore Elkinton (Chairman); Elizabeth Thomas; Robert Dann; Henry J. Cadbury; Eleanor Stokes; Horace Webster.

NOTE—Sub-Committees are chosen from the Yearly Meeting at large, irrespective of membership on the large Committee

PRESENT WORK.

- 1—Holding Westtown Conference and other conferences during the year.
- 2—Stimulating interest in local meetings.
- 3—Encouraging local Fellowships and Quaker Study groups.
- 4—Maintaining an organ of publication, THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT TO THE FRIEND.
- 5—Contributing toward Cedar Lake Conference and the Board of Young Friends' Activities.
- 6—Co-operating with other organizations and stimulating to service in the different lines of work at home and abroad.

WORK and prayer are two eyes on the same face. The man who works only, without praying, has one eye only; and the man who prays without working only has one eye, too. The man who neither works nor prays has no eyes, and walks in darkness.—SERBIAN PROVERB.

FIFTEEN OUT OF ONE HUNDRED.—To make the SUPPLEMENT possible, the YOUNG FRIENDS' Committee has guaranteed one hundred new subscriptions to THE FRIEND, or the financial equivalent. Fifteen of these have been secured. We must have eighty-five more to pay our way. Subscriptions to THE FRIEND ($2.00 per year), which include the SUPPLEMENT, should be sent to THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT, 20 S. Twelfth Street. Checks should be made payable to THE YOUNG FRIENDS' SUPPLEMENT.

SHARING SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCES.

MARY BARTON.

I rejoice in being able to feel that there is in the Society of Friends an increasing number to whom the appeal in this paper does not apply. The subject is one which has frequently claimed my attention, and in the hope of helping some one, I have felt willing to bring it to your notice. I am sure there are in this audience some, who, like myself, are convinced that our growth in the spiritual life would be increased if we were not as reticent as some of us are about mentioning spiritual matters to others. Have we ever stopped to query why we are? It seems to me we might with profit ask ourselves three questions. In an endeavor to answer these, perhaps we can be of service one to another.

The first question—do we hesitate to speak of spiritual things because they seem too sacred to share? I can appreciate that feeling, but should we not remember that we must give as well as receive the good things? If any pleasure of a material nature comes to us, if we have had a pleasant trip, or attended a picnic which we enjoyed, do we not delight in telling our friends about the pleasure we have had? If, on the other hand, we have attended a meeting for worship in which blessings have been bestowed upon us, or if uplifting experiences have come to us in any form, should we not be just as willing to share our joy as we were in the case of the picnic?

The second question—do we hesitate to speak of spiritual matters because we feel our conduct so frequently does not measure up to the standard our words would imply, in other words, because we are not good enough to talk about religion? True humility is a real virtue. I would not for a moment overlook that fact, but it seems to me we must appreciate that we are all human and therefore have our ups and downs in our religious lives. If we were never willing to share our best thoughts, I fear this world would be in an even sadder condition than it is. Then let us not hesitate because of our imperfections.

The third question—do we hesitate to speak of spiritual matters because we fear the criticism of those about us, because some one will think or say we are religious? I imagine this fear is for some a great check, whether they are quite conscious of the fact or not. Much easier would it be to acknowledge our allegiance to our Master if we could know that in every little religious act we had the sympathy of those from whom we crave sympathy. But dare we hesitate to speak for fear of criticism? I recall particularly a passage from Acts which says, "Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision, Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee."

A few months ago, some of us listened to an appeal to the parents of young children to consider seriously the injunction, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not." It was a beautiful plea, and must have aroused in the hearts of parents a renewed sense of responsibility. It seemed to be there might be another application for those words of Christ. I wondered whether our meetings are as fully as they should suffering to come to Christ those who feel themselves to be children in the religious life. Are there not scattered here and there in our midst those who are hungry for a few words of encouragement, sympathy, interest or perhaps advice from their meeting? I believe there are and that the meeting's responsibility to them is great. But let us not forget that each meeting is composed of its individual members and that therefore this responsibility rests not necessarily on some one else, but perchance on thee or me.

I bring this appeal to you this afternoon with full consciousness of my own shortcomings, but with the conviction, which has grown year by year, that the Spiritual life in ourselves as individuals, in our various meetings, and in the Society of Friends as a whole would be strengthened if we could overcome the tendency to withhold our better selves from others.

MESSAGES FROM THE MOORESTOWN CONFERENCES.

The Conference of young Friends held at Moorestown, Second Month 2nd, has been reported in a previous number of THE FRIEND. However, we cannot dismiss this significant Conference without some further mention. One of the papers, written by Mary Barton, we are printing in full because of its practical message. This one (including two others) was read again at the Fellowship Meeting of Women Friends, held Third Month 10, 1918. From some of the remaining papers we have chosen a few stimulating paragraphs:

FROM HELEN P. COOPER, ON BIBLE STUDY.

We stand without the portal of a vast store-house containing sixty-six rooms great and small, opening one into the other, and each containing priceless treasures. The key of Prayer is in our hands; the Holy Spirit ready—waiting to be our Guide; we cross the threshold of the Ages and find "In the beginning God."

As we walk from room to room (meeting familiar friends, Abraham, Moses, the prophets), we are conscious of an exquisite strain of melody and words that seem to whisper to us, "He is coming." We have traveled to the thirty-ninth room and the growing dusk has deepened into night. The lights of the temple of Solomon have gone out one by one. The Temple itself lies in ruins and before us stretches a passageway of four hundred silent years. Yet as we watch, out of the darkness there trembles one shining star and clear and sweet rings out the Angel voice "Unto you is born this day, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." "He had come," swells the music in triumphant strains as we enter the doorway of the New Testament. Before us lies the untold wealth of twenty-seven precious rooms. Here we see the Master Himself surrounded by His disciples.

FROM JAMES WILLITS, ON SERVING OUR NEIGHBOR MOST EFFECTIVELY.

One of the greatest things which hinders us from serving our neighbors effectively is worry. Few of us realize how much we are handicapped by this. Gordon says that he used to carry the burden of the world's need, as he saw it, all day on his shoulders, and then lug it faithfully to bed every night. But he found that Jesus was able and willing to carry his burden for him, and after that he slept better, felt better and could accomplish more.

I think all of us understand Christ's meaning of neighbor. He surely did not mean simply the man who lives next to us or merely the people of our own nation, or the people who speak the same language we speak. He meant all mankind the world over. In summing up this paper I would say that the way to serve our neighbor most effectively is to keep in constant communion with Jesus and be continually guided by Him. Then we will be enabled to say with Paul: "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

FROM WM. H. RICHIE.

If we measure our lives with the early Apostles, we realize how lacking we are in power; though the source is just as available. With the Apostles—when a message was to be given or a service performed—they looked to Christ and the power was forthcoming. As was said, "Triumph came not through self-consciousness, but through Christ-consciousness." This is what the world needs to-day when rack and ruin, sin and suffering, toil and trouble are everywhere. Every Christian should be a living witness to this "Christ-consciousness," and then will the life be well balanced and full and rounded out, an honor and a glory to the name of our Lord, Jesus Christ.

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PEACE COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.

In presenting its second annual report, the Peace Committee looks back over a period in which ideals of brotherhood and good-will have found practical expression in service. In response to the demands of a constantly changing world situation, new tasks have been undertaken and old ones, for the time being, laid aside.

One year ago at this time the Committee was laboring, in conjunction with other pacifist groups, to stem the tide of military preparedness, which was sweeping over the country. Shortly afterward, when the United States entered the war, and began to marshal its military and naval forces, the Committee did what it could, at first to prevent the passage of a draft law of any kind, and later, when such an act seemed inevitable, to modify its provisions. In this matter, the Committee felt a concern for all conscientious objectors and desired to co-operate with organizations working on their behalf, as well as to face the situation squarely in its relation to our own membership.

Since the Eleventh Month, when the responsibility for the drafted young men was assumed by the Representative Meeting under the care of a special secretary, such action as we have taken has been in conjunction with him and with the American Friends' Service Committee. But during the Spring and Summer of 1917, the Committee was active and especially just before and just after the passage of the Selective Service Act. By this act, men who were members of religious organizations opposed to war, were entitled, if they were also conscientious objectors by conviction, to claim exemption on religious grounds from combatant service only.

Every young man of the Yearly Meeting was thus obliged to decide for himself what form of non-combatant service, if any, he could conscientiously accept. In order that no decision should be reached without careful consideration of the issues involved, explanatory literature was sent out; and all our young men of draft age were invited to attend meetings at which the whole subject was open for discussion. Realizing fully the strength of the forces that were hurrying men on to hasty and often ill-advised action, every effort was made to provide opportunities for emergency service. Many young Friends, who were unwilling to engage in any compulsory service, were anxious to express a humanitarian spirit by entering as soon as possible upon some form of voluntary service.

The minds of a number of young men and boys turned at first toward farming, increased food production being recognized as absolutely necessary if the nations of the world were not to starve. It was too late in the Spring to accomplish much in the way of additional planting; but a special secretary was appointed, who aided twenty-five young men in finding positions for all or part of the Summer on the farms. One young man gave his vacation to leadership in a camp of city boys sent out by the Y. M. C. A. to help the farmers. A similar camp of from ten to sixteen young Friends was maintained at Westtown for a part of the summer and a group of boys in Moorestown raised a quantity of vegetables on an acre of ground loaned by a member of the Committee.

It does not seem likely at present that the agricultural work will be organized under a special secretary this year. Some of those who responded last Summer to the call of the farms, are interned in military cantonments; and others, if they perform any agricultural service, will be cultivating the fields of France as members of the Reconstruction Unit of the American Friends' Service Committee.

This Committee originated to meet the need of American Friends in war time. A great vision of all Friends in this country, standing together for a common conviction, undertaking, if possible, a common service, inspired its founders. To discuss the possibility of so organizing and to outline a policy, a little group of Friends from all over the country met in Philadelphia shortly after the entrance of the United States into the war. Of these, one-third were members of the Five Years' Meeting; one-third represented the seven Yearly Meetings of Friends, whose headquarters are at Race Street; and one-third were appointed by the Peace Committee of our Yearly Meeting. In reaching a decision as to what American Friends could do, the experience of English Friends was naturally an inspiration and guide. There seemed no necessity, however, to undertake the relief of alien enemies, as had been done in England, nor was it practicable to form an ambulance corps similar to that of English Friends. The activities of the War Victims' Relief Committee among the civilian population of areas devastated by the war, seemed best adapted to the needs of our situation. This work offered an opportunity for our young men and women who were eager to render unselfish service in this great crisis. Possibilities of co-operation with English Friends were investigated and the movement started. An office was set up in this city and a training camp for the first unit of men was opened at Haverford. Later on, when the making of garments for war sufferers became organized on a national scale, a warehouse was also established in Philadelphia.

